PROCEEDINGS AND DEBATES OF THE SIXTY-FOURTH CONGRESS, FIRST SESSION.

SENATE.

THURSDAY, March 16, 1916.

The Chaplain, Rev. Forrest J. Prettyman, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, God of all the nations and of all people. Thou knowest our thoughts afar off and there are no secrets in our hearts hidden from Thee. We lift up our hearts to Thee and ask if there be anything in them of an offense to any of Thy children that Thou wilt take it from us and remove our sins far from us. With clean hands and pure hearts may we address ourselves to the tasks of the day and meet the tremendous responsibilities that are upon us now as a Nation. Let Thy light shine upon the pathway of our national progress.

We remember to-day those who represent this Nation who have crossed the international boundary and who are in places of great danger. O God, guide Thou our boys; and we pray that out of the present unrest there may speedily come peace, brotherly love, and friendship. We pray that the gospel of Thy Son may follow the conflicts of men and bring through its blessed ministry an end of war and reestablish the nations of earth in mutual confidence and good will. We ask for Christ's sake. Amen.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

ESTIMATES OF APPROPRIATIONS.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting estimates of appropriation for increases in the office of the Supervising Architect, Treasury Department (S. Doc. No. 358), which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

He also laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a letter from the Captain Commandant, United States Coast Guard, submitting estimates of deficiencies in the appropriations for the Coast Guard for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1916 (S. Doc. No. 359), which, with the accompanying paper, was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

PENSIONS AND INCREASE OF PENSIONS.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the action of the House of Representatives disagreeing to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 10037) granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent children of soldiers and sailors of said war, and requesting a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

Mr. McCUMBER. I move that the Senate insist upon its amendments, agree to the conference asked for by the House, the conferees on the part of the Senate to be appointed by the Chair.

The motion was agreed to; and the Vice President appointed Mr. JOHNSON of Maine, Mr. HUGHES, and Mr. McCUMBER conferees on the part of the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the action of the House of Representatives disagreeing to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 11078) granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent children of soldiers and sailors of said war, and requesting a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

Mr. McCUMBER. I move that the Senate insist upon its amendments, agree to the conference asked for by the House, the conferees on the part of the Senate to be appointed by the Chair.

The motion was agreed to; and the Vice President appointed Mr. JOHNSON of Maine, Mr. HUGHES, and Mr. McCUMBER conferees on the part of the Senate.

DU PONT DE NEMOURS POWDER CO.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Mr. President, I am not much of a believer in having articles from newspapers read from the desk, but some time ago a Member of this body sent to the desk and had inserted in the RECORD an article, which appeared in Harper's Weekly some time during the year 1914, grossly libelous, upon some eminent and highly respected citizens belonging to a distinguished family in my State.

On yesterday in one of the courts of New York Judge Mayer, in determining a case brought by the author of these articles where their truth was a material question, dismissed the suit, rebuked the plaintiff for his action, and gave a judicial determination of those facts which were most libelously alleged against these citizens of my State.

I ask that the report of this case and the judge's opinion as contained in the New York Sun of to-day be read by the Secretary, and I should like to say a few words when the reading has been concluded.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

[From the New York Sun, Thursday, Mar. 16, 1916.]

DU PONTS ABSOLVED OF TREASON CHARGE—COURT DISMISSES $50,000 LIBEL SUIT INVOLVING UNITED STATES POWDER SECRETS—JUDGE REBUKES WRITER.

After hearing strong testimony for the defense from such witnesses as Hudson Maxim and Rear Admiral William M. Folger, former Chief of Ordnance of the United States Navy, Judge Julius M. Mayer, of the Federal district court, yesterday dismissed the $50,000 libel action brought against E. I. du Pont de Nemours Co. by Charles Johnson Post, a magazine writer.

Post was the author of several articles published in Harper's Weekly in May, 1914, in which he accused the du Pont interests of giving out to German powder manufacturers secrets concerning the manufacture of powder for the United States Government. The du Pont company sent a letter to magazine editors throughout the country condemning the articles as "outrageously libelous," and declaring that the editor of the magazine which published them had become convinced of their unfairness. Post contended in his suit that the letter had injured him by prejudicing the magazines against his work.

In his sharp rebuke to the plaintiff, delivered from the bench, Judge Mayer said that Post instead of having been libeled had committed libel per se against the du Pont interests by holding the officials of the company up as traitors to their country without having first made a fair investigation.

THE COURT'S OPINION.

"I hold as a matter of law," said the judge in dismissing Post's suit, "that no man has a right to accuse an American citizen of such a horrible crime as treason without knowing what he is talking about. The plaintiff in two articles charged the defendants with being spies of foreign Governments. That is the gravest crime of which an American could be charged, and I consider the accusation libelous per se. When the defendants in their letter said that Post had grossly libeled them they stated the truth. They came right back like real men, and I should have despised them if they had not taken that course."

The burden of the testimony given by the witnesses for the defense was to the effect that the contracts entered into between the du Pont company and the United Rhenish Westphalian Mills in November, 1889, were not only known to the United States Government but approved of by it; that the interchange of powder-making formulas between the American and German companies rather than being injurious to this Government was beneficial, as the German companies were making far better powder; that the United States Government had no secrets to lose; and, finally, that the du Pont company had always aided the United States Government even to its own injury.

FOLGER ON STAND.

Rear Admiral Folger, retired, testified that the international powder agreements had been entered into by the German and American concerns while he was the Chief of Ordnance under the late Gen. Benjamin Tracy, then Secretary of the Navy. It was at the request of Gen. Tracy, the witness said, that one of the du Pont family was sent to Germany to get the formulas for making brown prismatic powder. The contract which the du Ponts entered into with the Rhenish Westphalian Mills, he said, was examined and approved by Gen. Tracy. It was regarded as highly satisfactory, as the making of brown prismatic and nitrate of ammonia powder had been very unsuccessful in this country up to that point.

Hudson Maxim, although admitting that the United States Government maintained laboratories for powder experiments, declared it to be untrue that the smokeless powder in use now was the result of experiments made by officers working in these laboratories. These officers, he said, had taken out some patents, but they had never been used. The du Ponts, he said, were the greatest powder manufacturers in the world.

"Yes," he replied to a question from Edgar A. Ryder, attorney for Post, "I am at present an employee of the du Pont company, but I don't own any stock. I wish I did."

Col. E. G. Buckner, vice president of the du Pont company, and head of that concern's department devoted to the manufacture and sale of military powder, was put on the stand by Martin W. Littleton, chief counsel for the defense, to refute Post's charge that he had ever done anything to injure the Government. He denied that he had ever transmitted to any foreign Government any secrets concerning the manufacture of smokeless powder which his company manufactured under contract for the American Government.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Mr. President, I suppose if I were controlled by political considerations possibly I should be glad to see the people who have sometimes been chiefly interested in this great company labor under all the false charges that might be made against them, but it seems to me to be my duty to say a word for these very eminent and respectable people who have performed their patriotic duty toward the country which their great great grandfather adopted more than a century ago; and being my constituents, I think this article should be inserted, as I have been permitted to insert it, in the RECORD.

Those great powder manufactories were started more than a hundred years ago and for the past hundred years have contributed to the safety and the welfare of this country. The son of the man who came originally to this country—who, by the way, was a very distinguished and illustrious Frenchman, Pierre Samuel du Pont, who is well known in the history of France and somewhat in the history of this country—finding that the powder manufactured in this country was very unfit for ordinary use, returned to France and there visited the great chemist Lavoisier and studied powder making in his laboratories. Returning here, practically the first great work that the company did—it was then a firm—was to supply our ships on Lake Erie with powder, and by that means they aided in the great victory of Commodore Perry.

Ever since that time these works have continued to supply at fair prices, according to the testimony of the officials of the Government, and in cooperation with this Government whatever was needed of them. Lafayette, Jefferson, and other distinguished men were instrumental, I think, in obtaining the establishment of these works, and were friends of the people who established them.

Never in any war since they have been Americans has any member of this family, so far as I know, ever failed to perform his full and patriotic duty; and knowing the heads of the firm and of the company personally, as I have, in many cases very well, men who have been the heads of that company for the past 50 or 60 years, I know their character, attainments, reputation, and patriotism, and I am very glad to have an opportunity to insert this judicial opinion in regard to the libelous article which, undoubtedly unknowingly, was inserted by a Senator some time ago in the RECORD of the proceedings of this body.

PROHIBITION IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, I desire to give notice that on Saturday, at the conclusion of the remarks of the Senator from Georgia [Mr. HARDWICK], I shall submit some remarks with reference to the proposed referendum on prohibition to the people of the District of Columbia.

VOCATIONAL EDUCATION.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, we have upon our calendar reported with the unanimous approval of the Committee on Education and Labor the bill providing for vocational education, which was prepared by the joint commission under a joint resolution last year. The bill will be brought to the attention of the Senate in the near future, and I wish to have printed in the RECORD certain resolutions that have been passed with reference to it.

The bill was submitted to the department of superintendence of the National Educational Association; also to the American Home Economics Association; and also to the educational committee of the American Federation of Labor. All of these organizations have given, through committees, careful study to the bill, and they have indorsed it with one exception.

The bill as presented to the Senate provides for a board of control consisting of Cabinet members. The department of superintendence, National Education Association, and the American Home Economics Association each recommend that the board of control should be members selected outside of the Cabinet. I ask that the resolutions be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the resolutions were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

RESOLUTIONS.

[Department of superintendence, National Education Association, Feb. 24, 1916.]

Resolved, That the department reaffirms its approval of Federal aid to vocational education as proposed in the Smith-Hughes bill and now before Congress. It believes, however, that the work to be done is so important and so diversified as to require the creation of a Federal board to administer the act, who shall give their undivided attention to the subject and who shall be representative of the educational interests to be served.

[American Federation of Labor.]

Resolved, That the executive council of the American Federation of Labor indorse the Smith-Hughes bill for industrial education, with the declarations made by the National Society for the Promotion of Industrial Education, as contained in the quoted parts of the letter to Congress of January 27, 1916.

[American Home Economics Association, Feb. 25, 1916.]

The American Home Economics Association, assembled in Detroit, reaffirms its approval of Federal aid to vocational education, as provided for by the Smith-Hughes bill, recommended by the President's Commission on National Aid to Vocational Education and now before Congress.

The association believes, however, that the ends to be served are so important and so diversified as to require a Federal board, the members of which shall give their undivided attention to the administration of the act and shall be representative of the interest to be served.

IMPORTS OF MERCHANDISE.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I have a table compiled by Mr. C. H. Brown, chairman of the hosiery manufacturers' legislative committee, in reference to the imports of merchandise and agricultural products on October, 1915, October, 1914, and also October, 1912, which I ask to have printed in the RECORD without reading.

There being no objection, the table was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

A TARIFF TALE.

Imports of merchandise and agricultural products in October, 1915 and 1914, under the Underwood law, and October, 1912, under the Payne law, using for comparison products which are subject to the most severe competition.

Total, 38 products	48,911,991	44,989,989	3,922,002	40,016,749

In the monthly comparisons for October, 1915, Mr. C. H. Brown, of the hosiery manufacturers' legislative committee, uses 38 products, 11 of which are breadstuffs, clocks, watches, nets and nettings, hides and skins, perfumeries, seeds, artificial silk, vegetables, laths and shingles, and wool and angora hair, and which show an increase in imports, compared with 1914, of $13,483,723, the totals being in October, 1914, $16,556,408, and in October, 1915, $30,040,131, while in October, 1912, they were $17,131,328.

The following 27 products, aluminum scrap, aluminum manufactures, automobiles and parts, cotton cloths, embroideries, lace and lace articles, cotton stockings, knit goods, eggs, handkerchiefs, yarns, fish, fruits and nuts, plate glass, other glassware, cutlery, enameled ware, tin plate, leather and tanned skins, leather gloves, meat and dairy products, oilcloth and linoleum, paper and manufactures, films and plates, silk manufactures, wood pulp, and wool manufactures, show a decrease from $28,433,581 to $18,871,860, being $9,561,721.

The total imports of the 38 products in October, 1915, were $48,911,991, compared with $44,989,989 in October, 1914, an increase of $3,922,002, the total imports in both years being much larger than under the Payne law in 1912, which were $40,016,749.

With the exception of three months, during the past two years imports of the products we have used have been heavier than in the same months under the Payne law; and while total imports of all merchandise have decreased, such has not been the case with many products having severe foreign competition; and where a decrease in products of this class has been shown, it has been slight, rarely falling below the imports of the same products under the Payne law.

Farmers should be interested in the increase in imports in October, 1915, covering products which they supply. Breadstuffs show an increase of $1,596,657; hides and skins, $6,100,767; wool and angora hair, $5,170,182, making an increase of over $12,000,000 in farm products alone.

With the foreign war in full swing, and imports supposed to be much restricted, it is not very encouraging to those who supply the above products to know, as disclosed by the figures, that foreign manufacturers can send us more merchandise than under the Payne law, a fact that seems to prove our contention that the Underwood law always has been, and is now, a menace to American industry, and fully justifies the alarm felt over the conditions that must prevail when the war ends, and which can only be prevented by some form of tariff legislation which will protect the home producer.

The hosiery and knit-goods industries are now practically in complete control of the home market, as imports are too small to cut any figure in the trade, but, unfortunately, they are unable to take advantage of the opportunity presented, owing to the scarcity of dyes, and at this time nothing indicates that there will be any immediate relief from the dye situation. Hosiery and knit-goods manufacturers have been able to advance selling prices to some extent, but not to prices anywhere near the increased cost of production, due to the high price of dyestuffs and higher wages, resulting from labor legislation.

DEALING IN COTTON FUTURES.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I have here a resolution from the Presidents' Association of the Farmers' Educational and Cooperative Union of America in regard to the cotton-futures bill, which I ask to have printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the resolution was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

To the Senate and House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.:

Whereas when the cotton-futures act, known as the Smith-Lever bill, was passed, section 11 was injected for the expressed purpose of forcing all foreign countries to accept the American standard of grades by levying a toll of 2 cents per pound, or $10 per base, for each transaction in hedging by American dealers in foreign cotton exchanges and as now amended by the subcommittee, it is proposed to levy the same toll on all transactions by foreign dealers in American cotton exchanges; and

Whereas believing as we do that any and all tolls of whatsoever nature levied on such transactions, either on American or foreign dealers, is a burden directly borne by the cotton producers; and

Whereas if the American standard of grades, under such penalty, be adopted by foreign exchanges, the adoption would be without benefit to the producer and dearly purchased by the cotton raisers: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That we, the members of the President's Association of the Farmers' Educational and Cooperative Union of America, and members of the marketing committee of said organization, in convention assembled at New Orleans, La., this the 9th day of March, 1916, most respectfully urge that you immediately reenact into law the Smith-Lever bill, omitting section 11 and section 11a, thereby saving an untold amount to the producers of cotton;

Resolved further, That a copy of these resolutions be furnished to each Senator and Member of the Congress of the United States, and that copies be furnished to the press.

O. P. FORD,
President and member of the Marketing Committee Farmers' Union of Alabama, McFall, Ala.
J. L. SHEPARD,
President and member of the Marketing Committee Farmers' Union of Florida, Greensboro, Fla.
O. W. TAYLOR,
President and member of the Marketing Committee Farmers' Union of Oklahoma, Roff, Okla.
I. N. MCCOLLISTER,
President and member of the Marketing Committee Farmers' Union of Louisiana, Many, La.
H. N. POPE,
President and member of the Marketing Committee Farmers' Union of Texas, Fort Worth, Tex.

Whereas the State of Alabama, through its legislature, in September last enacted a measure in favor of legitimate transactions in cotton-future contracts, which at the same time prohibited, under severe penalties, bucket shopping, which is gambling on the price of cotton, with no intention on the part of the gamblers to either receive or deliver the cotton claimed to be called for; and

Whereas legitimate business on the exchanges in legal contracts is a help as a price insurance to the farmer in disposing of his products, while the bucket shop is a curse to the country, encouraging petty gambling by irresponsible parties: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That we, the members of the Presidents' Association of the Farmers' Educational and Cooperative Union of America and members of the marketing committee of said organization, in convention assembled, at New Orleans, La., this, the 9th day of March, 1916, most respectfully urge that every cotton State adopt a measure similar in form to the Alabama law.

Resolved further, That attention be called to the fact that the Alabama law is an indorsement of the act of Congress known as the United States cotton-futures act, which act is the result of years of study in the interest of the producers of cotton by the best brains and the ablest men representing the Southern States in both branches of Congress; further, that its practical trial during the past year has demonstrated that (excepting sec. 11, which restricted business with foreign countries) it meets the needs of the cotton growers, eliminating evils which have heretofore been complained of.

Resolved also, That the farmers of the South claim the right to dispose of their cotton either by future contract or otherwise, as they may deem proper, and that they claim the right to buy or sell legitimate or legal future contracts at home or abroad whenever or wherever they may consider their best interests demand; further, that they are opposed to any law or laws that may in any manner restrict them in the free exercise of their judgment in reference to the handling of their business.

I. N. MCCOLLISTER,
President and member of the Marketing Committee Farmers Union of Louisiana, Many, La.
H. N. POPE,
President and member of the Marketing Committee Farmers' Union of Texas, Fort Worth, Tex.
O. P. FORD,
President and member of the Marketing Committee Farmers' Union of Alabama, McFall, Ala.
J. L. SHEPARD,
President and member of the Marketing Committee Farmers' Union of Florida, Greensboro, Fla.
O. W. TAYLOR,
President and member of the Marketing Committee Farmers' Union of Oklahoma, Roff, Okla.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by D. K. Hempstead, its enrolling clerk, announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills and joint resolution, and they were thereupon signed by the Vice President:

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. ROBINSON presented a memorial of sundry citizens of Little Rock, Ark., remonstrating against the enactment of legislation to limit the freedom of the press, which was referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

Mr. PHELAN presented a petition of Local Union No. 120, Butchers' Union, of Oakland, Cal., praying for the enactment of legislation to prohibit interstate commerce in the products of child labor, which was referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

He also presented a petition of Local Union No. 228, Cigar Makers' International Union, of San Francisco, Cal., praying for the printing of the report of the Commission on Industrial Relations, which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented a memorial of the Trades and Labor Council of Vallejo, Cal., remonstrating against the proposed repeal of the so-called seamen's act, which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. GALLINGER presented petitions of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union of Alton; the Orient Club, of Manchester; the King's Daughters, of Jefferson, and the Woman's Christian Temperance Union and Mothers' Club, of Cornish, and of sundry citizens of Meredith, Danville, Epping, and Brentwood, all in the State of New Hampshire, praying for national prohibition, which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented a petition of the Shakespeare Club, of Manchester, N. H., praying for an investigation of conditions surrounding the marketing of dairy products, which were referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

Mr. STERLING presented a petition of Fredens Baand Lodge, No. 54, International Order of Good Templars, at Sioux Falls, S. Dak., praying for national prohibition, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. SHEPPARD presented petitions of the Christian Endeavor Society of Rockport and the congregation of the Christian Church of Alpine, in the State of Texas, and of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union, No. 2, of Washington, D. C., praying for national prohibition, which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented a petition of sundry citizens of Camp County, Tex., praying for the adoption of certain amendments to the so-called cotton futures law, which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

He also presented a petition of sundry citizens of San Antonio, Tex., praying for the placing of an embargo on munitions of war, which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

He also presented a petition of the congregation of the Garden Memorial Presbyterian Church, of Washington, D. C., praying for prohibition in the District of Columbia without the referendum, which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. NELSON presented petitions of sundry citizens of Minnesota, praying for national prohibition, which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. STONE presented petitions of sundry citizens of Missouri, praying for national prohibition, which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented petitions of sundry citizens of Spickard, Norrisville, Booneville, Clinton, Springfield, Blackwater, Marshall, and Helena, all in the State of Missouri, praying for prohibition in the District of Columbia, which were ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented a petition of sundry citizens of Moniteau County, Mo., praying for Federal aid in the construction of good roads, which were ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. JOHNSON of Maine presented petitions of sundry citizens of Maine, praying for national prohibition, which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. LEA of Tennessee presented petitions of sundry citizens of Clifton and Westport, in the State of Tennessee, praying for national prohibition, which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. JOHNSON of Maine (for Mr. BURLEIGH) presented petitions of sundry citizens of Maine, praying for national prohibition, which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. WADSWORTH presented petitions of sundry citizens of New York, praying for national prohibition, which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented a petition of sundry citizens of Onondaga County, N. Y., praying for the enactment of legislation to found the Government on Christianity, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. WARREN presented petitions of sundry citizens of Wyoming, praying for national prohibition, which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented a petition of Rock Lake Grange No. 13, Patrons of Husbandry, of Wheatland, Wyo., praying for Government ownership of telegraph and telephone lines, which was referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

He also presented a petition of the Town Council of Douglas, Wyo., praying that an appropriation be made for the construction of a military and post road from St. Louis, Mo., to Olympia, Wash., which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

GILA RIVER, ARIZ.

Mr. ASHURST, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, to which was referred the bill (S. 4655) authorizing and directing the Secretary of the Interior to determine the most suitable method of preventing further erosion and overflow on Gila River, Ariz., reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 262) thereon.

WABASH RIVER BRIDGE, INDIANA.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I report from the Committee on Commerce favorably and without amendment the bill (S. 5016) to authorize the reconstruction of an existing bridge across the Wabash River at Silverwood, in the State of Indiana, and the maintenance and operation of the bridge so reconstructed, and I submit a report (No. 261) thereon. I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the bill.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from Texas to explain the bill. It is framed in such a way that I can hardly catch its object by the mere reading of it from the desk.

Mr. SHEPPARD. The bill is in the usual routine form, if I am not mistaken.

Mr. SMOOT. I will ask the Senator if the bill is not simply for the reconstruction of the bridge and not for its maintenance?

Mr. SHEPPARD. It is merely to authorize the reconstruction of the bridge, as I understand. This is one of the ordinary bridge bills. If, however, the Senator from Utah has any question in mind regarding the bill, I will withdraw it for the present.

Mr. SMOOT. I do not want to object to the consideration of the bill. It only seemed to me that the bill was rather inconsistent with its title, and I really believe it is. I think the title ought to be changed. If the Senator would allow the title to read simply "to authorize the reconstruction of an existing bridge across the Wabash River at Silverwood, in the State of Indiana," I think it would then conform to the bill.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I have no objection to the amendment of the title, Mr. President.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "A bill to authorize the reconstruction of an existing bridge across the Wabash River at Silverwood, in the State of Indiana."

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Bills were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. HOLLIS:

A bill (S. 5080) to provide for the use of public-school buildings in the District of Columbia as community forums, and for other purposes; to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

By Mr. PHELAN:

A bill (S. 5081) to grant rights of way over Government lands for reservoir purposes for the conservation and storage of water to be used by the city of San Diego, Cal., and adjacent communities; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. MYERS:

A bill (S. 5082) adding certain lands to the Missoula National Forest, Mont.; to the Committee on Public Lands.

A bill (S. 5083) granting a pension to Abram Hall; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. SHEPPARD:

A bill (S. 5084) to regulate the salaries of keepers of lighthouses; to the Committee on Commerce.

A bill (S. 5085) to provide for the establishment of national cooperative rural banking associations; to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

By Mr. ASHURST:

A bill (S. 5086) amending section 4 of the public building act approved March 4, 1913, providing for the purchase of a site for a building for post office and customhouse at Nogales, Ariz.; to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

By Mr. STERLING:

A bill (S. 5087) granting an increase of pension to Andrew E. Waterman (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. GRONNA:

A bill (S. 5088) to amend the act entitled "An act to provide for the repayment of certain commissions, excess payments, and purchase moneys paid under the public-land laws," approved March 26, 1908; to the Committee on Public Lands.

By Mr. NELSON:

A bill (S. 5089) granting a pension to Margaret Rice Thompson; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. JAMES:

A bill (S. 5090) granting a pension to Radford Fain (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. SAULSBURY:

A bill (S. 5091) granting a pension to Nancy J. Willey (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. JOHNSON of Maine:

A bill (S. 5092) granting an increase of pension to Laura E. Knox (with accompanying papers);

A bill (S. 5093) granting a pension to Francett Dickinson (with accompanying papers);

A bill (S. 5094) granting an increase of pension to William J. Bradford (with accompanying papers); and

A bill (S. 5095) granting an increase of pension to Myra R. Daniels (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. CHAMBERLAIN:

A bill (S. 5096) for the relief of Henry von Hess; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

DETROIT RIVER POSTAL SERVICE.

Mr. TOWNSEND submitted an amendment providing that the marine letter carriers assigned to the Detroit River postal service shall be paid $1,500 per annum, etc., intended to be proposed by him to the Post Office appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads and ordered to be printed.

NATIONAL DEFENSE.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I offer an amendment to the Army reorganization bill. I shall not ask that it be read, but that it be printed and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs. I wish, however, to mention that the two features of the amendment are, first, to lessen the number of years of enlistment with the colors to two years, and to provide further that—

In addition to the work not connected with the military service, soldiers on active duty hereafter enlisting shall devote an average of 96 hours monthly to study and to receiving instructions upon educational lines not directly connected with the military service, and preparatory to their return to civil life. A part of this preparation for civil life shall consist of vocational education, either in agriculture or the mechanical arts, and civilian teachers may be employed to aid the Army officers in conducting the said educational work.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The proposed amendment will be printed and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

ISSUANCE OF FREE INTRASTATE PASSES.

Mr. LEA of Tennessee submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 134), which was referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate:

Whereas the report that has been made by the Interstate Commerce Commission to the United States Senate showing the issuance of free intrastate passes to the extent of hundreds of thousands of dollars annually; and

Whereas it is important to determine whether the issuance of such free transportation for intrastate use constitutes a discrimination affecting interstate rates; and

Whereas it is reported that such issuance of intrastate transportation is for the purpose of obtaining for the railroads using such transportation heavy shipments of interstate traffic: Therefore be it

Resolved, That a committee of five Senators be appointed by the President of the Senate, with authority to investigate the issuance of such free intrastate passes and report the result of such investigation to the Senate during this session of Congress; that said committee shall be authorized to sit during the sessions of Congress or any recess thereof; that it be authorized to send for persons, books, and papers; to administer oaths, and to employ a stenographer, at a cost not to exceed $1 per printed page; to report such hearings as may be had in connection with this investigation, the expenses of said investigation to be paid out of the contingent fund of the Senate, the entire cost not to exceed $500.

PUBLIC PRINTING AND BINDING.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, in the absence of the Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER], I wish to call particular attention to the bill (S. 1107) to amend, revise, and codify the laws relating to the public printing and binding and the distribution of Government publications. I wish to give notice that at the very first opportunity I shall ask the Senate to take up the bill for consideration, and I hope that it may be passed.

We are passing bills every day taking money out of the Treasury of the United States; but, if this bill becomes a law, it will save the Government of the United States at least $800,000 every year. I hope that the Senate will vote at the first opportunity to take up the bill, and either reject it or pass it. It has been in one House or the other for a number of years. It has passed this body and has passed the other body, but has failed of action in either one or the other of the two Houses each year.

PRESIDENTIAL APPROVAL.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. Sharkey, one of his secretaries, announced that the President had, on March 16, 1916, approved and signed the following act:

S. 3518. An act granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent relatives of such soldiers and sailors.

THE CALENDAR.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Are there further concurrent or other resolutions? If not, morning business is closed. The calendar under Rule VIII is in order. The Secretary will state the first bill on the calendar.

The first bill on the calendar was the bill (S. 1053) to provide for stock-raising homesteads, and for other purposes.

Mr. SMOOT. Let that bill go over, Mr. President.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill goes over.

The bill (S. 1062) relating to the duties of registers of United States land offices and the publication in newspapers of official land-office notices was announced as next in order.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, I hope no objection will be made to the consideration of that bill. I trust the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. FALL] is either in the cloakroom or in the Chamber.

Mr. SMOOT. I will say to the Senator from Montana that the Senator from New Mexico has notified me that with his amendment embodied in the bill—and I understand that it has been agreed to—he has no objection to the passage of the bill.

Mr. MYERS. But I object to the amendment, and I should like to have the Senator from New Mexico here. I ask that the bill be passed over temporarily until I can find the Senator from New Mexico. As soon as he comes into the Chamber I ask that we may take up the bill. Is there objection to that request, I will inquire?

Mr. GALLINGER. Let the bill go over, Mr. President.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill goes over.

The bill (S. 706) to amend section 260 of an act entitled "An act to codify, revise, and amend the laws relating to the judiciary," approved March 3, 1911, was announced as next in order.

Mr. GALLINGER. Let that bill go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill goes over.

The bill (S. 609) to aid in the erection of a monument to Pocahontas, at Jamestown, Va., was announced as next in order.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President, I gave notice yesterday that at the end of the routine morning business to-day I would address the Senate on the subject of the armor-plant bill. I evidently was not on my feet at the conclusion of routine morning business, and I wish to know if it is now in order for me, by unanimous consent, to proceed?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Of course, it is known to every Senator that such notices as the one given by the Senator from Massachusetts, to which he has just referred, are not binding on Senators. The Senator may proceed by unanimous consent; but if there is an objection, the calendar is in order. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the Senator will proceed.

MANUFACTURE OF ARMOR.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 1417) to erect a factory for the manufacture of armor.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President, I wish to discuss the armor-plant bill somewhat in detail, particularly because it is the first instance which has come to my observation where the Government is deliberately proposing to undertake a manufacturing business in competition with its own citizens and in a case where the property of its citizens will be destroyed without any doubt if the bill becomes a law. We have drifted in many instances into Government business, but in no case have we taken a stand which is comparable to that being taken in this instance. Therefore it seems to me that it is a very important step that we are taking, without any regard to the particular enterprise which is covered by this bill, and that it is worthy the attention of all Senators to consider whether it is going to be in the future a proper policy for the Government to follow, to enter into a manufacturing business in competition with its own citizens.

It has been suggested by several Senators who have addressed the Senate that all preparedness measures should be taken up and given the preference as soon as they were ready for consideration. They included among the preparedness measures the armor-plant bill which is now before the Senate. I take a directly contrary view to that position. I believe that this bill is a direct antithesis to anything pertaining to preparedness; that it will prevent preparedness in the most accepted sense in which that term can be used; and that, if we wanted to do the very thing which would prevent this Government from being prepared as far as armor-plate manufacturing is concerned, we would pass this bill.

The whole essence of a preparedness proposition is a reasonable Government operation, but depending on private manufacture and on private citizens in the form of reserves to supply our needs in time of war. Incidentally I asked the question of the head of the Ordnance Bureau, Gen. Crozier, during the consideration of the military bill in the Senate Committee on Military Affairs, how large a plant it would require to manufacture the ammunition necessary to supply an army of a million men, which is the army contemplated in the present preparedness measures, with a million men coming into the service from time to time during the first year. He had carefully worked out an estimate, and stated that it would require $400,000,000 to construct such a plant, and that it would require 750,000 employees to furnish the ammunition necessary for an army of that size. Therefore how fallacious must be the theory that the Government shall manufacture either ammunition or other equipment or armor plate without having a reserve capacity which can be called upon in case of war.

The making of armor plate is a difficult and expensive process, which can not be developed in a month or a year. The Government is practically the only market for armor plate, and no one is going into that business if the Government establishes an armor-plate factory, and no concern now in existence, in my judgment, is going to continue to keep its plant in condition for operation, as the returns which it could receive under such conditions would be so small that it would not be a profitable investment.

Then, again, we do not know what we are going to require in the way of armor from year to year. What is of value to-day may be of little or no value 10 or 20 years from now. My own conception about the Navy at this time is that we do not require dreadnaughts to the same degree that we require very fast armored cruisers, battle cruisers, mounting four or six very high-power guns, 16-inch guns, ships that are as fast or faster than any ships in the world. When you are going to fight somebody, you must use a weapon or an implement that is at least equal to the weapon or implement which your adversary is going to employ; and the nations of the world are now constructing battle cruisers which have as high-power guns as have the dreadnaughts which we have in commission or the dreadnaughts of other nations. They are so much faster that they could keep entirely clear of the dreadnaughts, making targets of them, and they are also commerce destroyers as well. Therefore it seems to me that it is desirable in our naval program that the first consideration should be given to ships of that kind; and yet if that is done, the question of armor making is very greatly modified, because the armor of the accepted type of battle cruiser is not more than one-third, and probably not more than one-fourth, as heavy as the armor required for a dreadnaught. For that reason we might have to entirely reconstruct our armor-making plant, and certainly the question of armor in comparison with its necessary weight and other qualities to-day would be almost negligible. We would not need anything like the armor-making capacity which we will require if we are going to build dreadnaughts. That is another consideration to which we should give our attention.

This idea of battle cruisers is not my own. Of course I would not advance it against the opinions of experts, but some of the leading experts of the Navy, notably the president of the War College, Admiral Knight, and Capt. Sims, one of the ablest captains in the naval service, have recently given testimony before the House committee advocating exactly what I have suggested. If that were done, the building of an armor plant would be little short of a crime.

Again, Mr. President, the Government never builds as expeditiously nor as economically as does the private individual. We have a volume of instances, which will occur to every Senator, to the effect that we are extremely slow in commencing Government building operations and slow in their completion.

During my first term in Congress, 10 years ago, I was able to obtain an appropriation for an appraiser's storehouse in the city of Boston, which is the second port of entry in the United States. The Government never has owned an appraiser's storehouse there. It has rented quarters, at very considerably more expense than would have obtained if it had owned its own building; and yet that appropriation, which was made substantially 10 years ago, has not been used up to this date. A site has been purchased; it has been lying idle for five or six years, with loss of interest, but no steps have been taken toward the construction of the building.

That is simply an example of incidents which will occur to every one of the Senators who are giving me their attention; and if we undertook the construction of an armor-making plant, in my judgment it would be delayed very much beyond what would be the case if it were to be constructed by a private corporation.

We have an instance of what that means, because the Midvale Co. undertook the construction of a plant a dozen years ago. They had bid two or three times for the construction of armor. The Navy Department had refused to consider their bids, because they did not have a plant constructed for its manufacture. So they undertook the building of a plant, and it required two and a half years to construct a plant materially smaller than the larger one contemplated under this bill. Therefore I assume that even if we decide to pass this bill it will require, not two and a half years, but, if the other incidents are in any way comparable, three or four years, or it has been estimated as many as five years, before the plant can be constructed.

We are singularly negligent, too, in taking up those matters which have been carefully investigated by commissions or committees of Congress and giving them the consideration to which they are entitled. For instance, there has been a great deal of disagreement about the pay to which railroads are entitled for transportation of the mails. A commission of the two Houses of Congress considered this question for months and made a report to Congress which, in my opinion, would have put that service on a reasonably good basis; and yet, after two years, no final action has been taken in that matter, and if the department's present purpose of injecting certain matter which I believe ought not to go into the proposition is adopted or considered seriously, I hope it never will be adopted.

We have had a commission to take up the consideration of the expense incident to the carrying of the parcel post and what further steps should be taken to enlarge that service. It made a report more than two years ago. Nothing whatever has been done with that report, although the subject was given long and serious consideration by a joint committee of Congress.

We had a commission to consider the good-roads question, which spent many months in active consideration of that matter. It made a report to Congress. I think almost everyone who has considered the question at all admits that the report made by that commission is one that ought to be adopted; and yet it can not even be given consideration, because it is assumed that it can not become a law if that is done. There is very vital objection on the part of some even to its consideration.

The Postmaster General reported year before last that if he could reorganize the Rural Delivery Service he could save $18,000,000 annually. I do not know that he could do it, but that is the report made by him to those who are familiar with that service, and yet nothing whatever was done to authorize him to carry out that proposition. I instance these cases simply to confirm what I started to say; that is, that the Government is a slow and, as I shall attempt to demonstrate later, not an economical business agent.

I instance these cases simply to confirm what I started to say; that is, that the Government is a slow and, I shall attempt to demonstrate later, not an economical business agent.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. WEEKS. Yes; I yield.

Mr. BORAH. In that connection, what has the Senator to say as to the apparent necessity of the Governments which are now at war taking over the entire subject matter of the supply of munitions of war and putting the entire subject under the immediate control and supervision of the Government in order, as we have been informed, to secure efficiency and rapidity of supply? Have not Germany and Great Britain and France all been compelled to put the entire subject matter practically under Government control? I ask this to get the Senator's opinion, in view of his argument as to the dilatory and inefficient methods ordinarily obtaining with reference to such matters when the Government seeks to control the matter.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President, I will discuss that question later; but I will say to the Senator from Idaho that no European Government has any government establishment for manufacturing any munitions of war. The only country in the world that manufactures armor plate, for example, is Japan; and the only reason why Japan does it is because private capital was not available in that country to go into the business. It is true—at least, the press reports seem to intimate that it is true—that in order to get proper supervision of one kind or another, the English Government has taken charge of certain manufacturing industries, so that they may devote their entire time to the interests of the Government. I do not know the details of that, however, and all the information I have is obtained from the press reports. It is, of course, a war measure pure and simple.

Mr. BORAH. Of course I understand that it is a war measure; but it was made a war measure because of the necessity of having quick and efficient action in regard to these very matters. It seems to me it is a feature of this question which may deserve study. I presume this measure may be considered essentially a war measure.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President, there has been no necessity of having quick and efficient action in the United States, as I shall demonstrate when I show what the increased capacity of the American firms has been in producing munitions of war.

The question of costs relating to this proposition is of the greatest importance, and as far as possible I want to submit what seems to me to be vital matter relating to that particular subject. It is not possible to make comparisons, as it would be in any other manufacturing business, with some going business; because, as I have said, there is a limited number of plants manufacturing armor plate, and the Government is practically the only market for this armor plate. But, in my judgment, the question of costs has not been given fair consideration by the committee having this bill in charge. For that reason I want to discuss it very much in detail.

It is well worth considering whether or not it is good policy to enter into any industry which puts the Government into competition with its own citizens, even if for other reasons it seems justifiable. Government operations are notoriously lacking in expedition and economy and into them enter all the evils of political influence. They are not conducted for the purpose of making profits, that being of comparatively small concern to the Government while to the citizens profits are vital, so that improvements and developments are much more likely to occur where the necessity for making profits prevails. In a case of this kind, putting the Government into the armor-making business means putting it directly into competition with the capital and business of our own citizens, over which the Government exercises the right of regulation, so that if the results are such that there is a deficit in the Government's operations the very citizen whose business is being destroyed may be taxed to help make up the deficit which follows his own ruin.

> Between these law-made agencies and the spontaneously formed ones, who then can hesitate? The one class are slow, stupid, extravagant, unadaptive, and obstructive; can any point out in the other vices that balance these? It is true that trade has its dishonesties, speculation its follies. These are evils inevitably entailed by the existing imperfections of humanity. It is equally true, however, that these imperfections of humanity are shared by State functionaries.

The Government's own experience as a manufacturer is not sufficiently encouraging to justify any ambitious plans for a Government armor plant. Some years ago the simplest form of steel making was attempted at the Brooklyn Navy Yard, and I am informed that the failure was so acute that no one would seriously consider repeating any such attempt. The steel castings which were made at this plant are of the simplest form. As I understand it, the Government believed it could save money by buying pig iron and casting its own steel for small work. It did not contemplate in any degree the casting of steel for such important work as is contemplated in this armor-plate project. The results seem to demonstrate that the steel made at this plant turned out badly. It was defective in many respects, and the expense of producing was so great that some two years ago the whole project was abandoned and the plant has not been used since, the department turning back to the commercial market to buy its ingots.

If such an experiment as this had proven a success, instead of the contrary, both from an economical and quality standpoint, there would be some warrant for extending the operations into the more difficult and intricate product which is required for armor plate. This failure of the Government, however, is not surprising when it is known that some of the oldest and most experienced steel makers frequently are unable to deliver goods up to the required standard; in fact, there is very much steel manufactured by those best qualified in such enterprises which, when tested, is rejected, and that is one of the elements in the cost of manufacturing armor plate. Very much of the product is rejected for that reason. A year and a half ago the Navy Department ordered 48 breechblocks and 48 screw box liners for 14-inch guns from the Pennsylvania Steel Co. This company had not previously manufactured this material, but it underbid those companies which had produced the product up to that time, and the Navy Department believed, I assume, that there was an opportunity to save money in giving the order to this company. Of these 48 sets of breech mechanism forgings, 25 have been taken from the contractor on account of delay incident to the work and given to the company which previously had the contract. Twelve of the remaining 23 sets have been delivered to the Government. The remaining 11 sets have not yet been tested and delivered, and the delay in delivering these parts has made it necessary to lay aside the other parts of guns which have been delivered to the Government waiting for the fulfillment of this order.

It should be remembered that although the Government has a large gun plant at the Washington Navy Yard in no case does it manufacture the parts that go into the gun; that it is simply an assembling plant where the tubes and other parts are obtained from manufacturers and put together to make the finished product. In no single case does the Government enter into the manufacture of the ingots or the parts, with the single exception, however, which occurs to me now, of a small experimental plant at the Watertown Arsenal; but that is very largely for the instruction of our own officers in the testing and examination which they must necessarily make of steel ingots sold to the Government.

The same general statement is true of the building of battleships in navy yards. Some years ago Hon. WILLIAM A. JONES, a Member of the House of Representatives from the first Virginia district, made an important demonstration of the cost of constructing battleships at navy yards, basing his statements on a report made by Admiral Watt, the chief constructor, under date of February, 1913. The difficulty in making comparisons in all such cases between the cost of construction at private and Government yards is that very many of the items which go into the cost are not so segregated in Government operations that the actual cost can be determined. For example, based on Admiral Watt's figures given at that time, the ships of the present Navy would have cost the American people $70,000,000 in excess of the figure at which they were built if they had all been constructed in navy yards. Some of the items which are not considered at all in figuring Government costs are: First, depreciation of outfit; second, insurance carried by the private builders, which benefits the Government; third, cost of trials; fourth, value of repairs made at the contractor's expense during the guaranty period; fifth, value to the Government of taxes paid by private shipyards; sixth, salaries of classified employees; seventh, leave and holidays of men and disabled pay; eighth, decrease in the amount of indirect charges in navy-yard building, all of which items would amount, in the building of a dreadnaught, to as much as $1,297,000.

The statement made by Admiral Watt that the present Navy would have cost seventy millions more than it has if it had been constructed in navy yards instead of private yards is based on a table furnished by him at that time, which includes nine ships built at the navy yards at New York, Mare Island, and Norfolk.

The matter referred to is as follows:

COST OF PRODUCING ARMOR PLATE UNDER VARIOUS CONDITIONS.

The production cost of armor with shop operating at full capacity has been determined as follows:

Report of Tillman Board, House Document No. 1620, Sixty-third Congress, third session, $262.79 per ton.

(The later report reflects advances in cost of labor and material and is quite consistent with the earlier report, considering the differences in the dates at which they were made.)

With plant operating at less than full capacity, the Niles Board found that the cost would be increased as follows:

Plant operating at half capacity, cost would be increased 20 per cent.

Plant operating at one-third capacity, cost would be increased 30 per cent.

These reports give mere shop cost and do not contain many items that enter into the actual total cost, such as administrative and general expense, insurance and taxes, interest on plant investment and working capital, etc., and in the following tabulation is shown the effect of the addition of some of these very real and important items. The depreciation of the plant, although a real addition to the cost, is not included below, as it is shown that prices actually received by the manufacturers has not been sufficient to allow anything for this purpose.

Taxes and insurance ($45,000 per year)	4.50	13.50	6.75
Interest at only 5 per cent on $7,100,000 plant ($355,000 per year)	35.50	106.50	53.25
Interest at only 5 per cent on $500,000 working capital ($25,000 per year)	2.50	7.50	3.75
Total	315.29	499.89	367.82

If the contracts awarded in the future should be in the same average quantities as in the past (namely, 3,280 tons per year, or about one-third our plant capacity), the present price of $425 per ton would provide as follows:

		Per ton.
Contract price		$425.00
Less—
Production cost (column No. 3)	$342.39
Administrative and general (column No. 3)	30.00
Taxes and insurance (column No. 3)	13.50
		385.89
Leaving for interest on investment		39.11

With contracts for 3,280 tons, this would provide only $128,280.80 per year, or less than 1¾ per cent on the investment, without any provision whatever for repayment of the capital invested in the plant when it may have to be abandoned, owing to the building of a Government plant or some radical change in the method of manufacture.

Mr. WEEKS. It must be remembered, too, that the Congress is constantly called on to furnish additional equipment for navy yards. The Senate has only recently adopted a proposition appropriating over $500,000 for two of the yards which are to construct battleships under bids recently submitted. Again it must be remembered that in such cases bids are submitted by private contractors under specifications prepared by the department, and they are responsible for the results which they must obtain. In the case of navy yards the bids are simply estimates; and if they are not sufficient to build the ship, then an additional appropriation is made by Congress for its completion.

Furthermore, our experience with the building of ships at navy yards is full of instances of delays which would not be occasioned at any other place. At this time, when whatever preparedness is agreed upon should be hastened as rapidly as possible, we have not even commenced the two battleships that were authorized last year; and if anyone who has curiosity enough to do so will take the department's figures on the state of completion of ships under construction at navy yards and private yards under exactly the same conditions, they will find in every case, as far as my observation goes, that the navy yard is behind the private builder and in some cases very materially so.

The suggestion which I have made that the navy-yard figures are estimates and not bids is demonstrated in the case of battleships 43 and 44. The price bid for the ship built at Mare Island was $7,413,000 and for the ship to be built at the New York yard $7,069,000. The actual cost to the Government will really be, when all of the items which should be properly charged to the construction are taken into consideration, in the case of the Mare Island ship $8,827,000 and in the case of the ship built at the New York yard $8,572,000.

Incidentally an estimate came from the Philadelphia yard which was something like $500,000 less than either of these bids; and yet that was not accepted, because it was known in that case that the estimate could not possibly cover the cost of the battleship. The actual cost to the Government will really be ascertained when all of the items which should be properly charged to the construction are taken into consideration. In the case of the Mare Island yard, adding the amount which I have itemized as a part of the basis of cost of the battleship, the ship built there will cost $8,827,000 and in the case of the ship built at the New York yard $8,572,000, both of which figures are materially more than the bids made by the private corporations who wished to undertake the work.

Furthermore, it would seem to be demonstrated that the repairs required on Government-built ships were materially greater than on ships built at private yards. For example, take the case of the Connecticut and Louisiana. The former was built at the New York Navy Yard and the Louisiana was built by the Newport News Shipbuilding & Dry Dock Co. The repairs on the Connecticut during the first nine years of her service were $917,000, while those on the Louisiana were $885,000. In the case of the Florida and the Utah, during three years of their service—the Florida having been built at the New York Navy Yard and the Utah at the New York Shipbuilding Co. plant—the expense of repairs on the Florida were $151,000, while they were $95,000 on the Utah.

On page 98 of the report of the committee to investigate the cost of armor plate for the United States, the chairman, Mr. TILLMAN, used the following language:

> Now, we want you to open up and tell us all about this matter, because you realize that if the Government enters into its own armor manufacture itself it will destroy your business in that respect, at least.

Now, as a result of the hearings, the committee reports in favor of spending $11,000,000 to construct a plant for that purpose. In other words, we are now considering a proposition which the chairman of the committee himself stated will mean the destruction of $20,000,000 to $30,000,000 of property of American citizens, or compelling them to change their property into some other form to be used for some other purpose. It is my purpose to discuss, first, the unfairness of such a proposition; second, to indicate my belief that it will not lower the cost of manufacturing armor for the Government, but rather increase it; and, third, in my judgment the Government should, instead of destroying the property of its citizens, enter into cooperation with them, determining a policy on which can be asked a reasonable profit, which itself shall be based on the probable cost for an output to be continued through a term of years.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Has the Senator finished that part of his address concerning the success of Government manufacture? I notice that he is proceeding now to something else.

Mr. WEEKS. I will come back to that, if the Senator will be patient.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I was going to ask the Senator whether he has considered the success which the Government has had in the manufacture of powder?

Mr. WEEKS. Yes.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Is it not a fact that the Government has demonstrated that it can manufacture powder at a price materially below any price at which it could buy the powder?

Mr. WEEKS. If the Senator had been here when I commenced my remarks he would have learned that I do not oppose having a national establishment, as we have done in the case of manufacturing powder, which manufactures a very small percentage of the powder that would be required if we had any considerable army in the field. In fact, I have some figures here, which I will read later, showing that we would have to depend on private production for more than 95 per cent of the powder which we would necessarily use if we had an army in the field as large as the army contemplated in the preparedness plan now before the Senate.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. The proposition I understood the Senator was attempting to maintain was that the Government could not manufacture the material which it needs in war as cheaply as if it purchased it. The proposition I make is that in the manufacture of powder it has been conclusively demonstrated that the Government can manufacture powder for much less than it can buy it, and that the Government manufacture of a part of the powder has resulted in compelling the private manufacturers to reduce their price to the Government. There is not any question about that fact.

Mr. WEEKS. I think as far as the manufacture of powder by the Government is concerned the prices are lower than they were when the Government established its plant.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Is it not a fact that since the time the Government began manufacturing powder the cost of powder in the Government plant has at all times been lower than the cost of that which the Government at the same time has been buying?

Mr. WEEKS. I have not looked over the figures. Quite likely they are made up exactly as the figures which I have been reading, for I think probably they do not take into consideration all of the elements that should go into the cost. The Government does not make up its figures in that way. Before I make any admission on that proposition I should want to examine every element that goes into the cost of manufacture.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Is it not a fact that when the Government began the manufacture of its own powder it was paying nearly $1 a pound to the manufacturer, and at the present time it is paying less than 50 cents a pound, and that the price has been reduced year by year as the Government has demonstrated in its own powder factory the cost of the powder?

Mr. WEEKS. I have not the figures before me.

Mr. SWANSON. If the Senator will permit me, the Government paid 80 cents a pound. Then the Government went into the manufacture of powder and it was brought down to about 37 cents a pound, and Congress fixed the price at 53 cents a pound.

Mr. SMOOT. But before 53 cents a pound was fixed we purchased powder at 65 cents. There was a reduction before the rate was fixed.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I think the Senator from Virginia has correctly stated it. The price has been reduced from 80 cents a pound to 37 cents a pound, largely because of the fact that the Government has constructed its own powder factory and has produced a considerable portion of the powder which it is compelled to use.

Mr. LIPPITT. Mr. President——

Mr. WEEKS. Just a moment, please. I have not the figures of cost before me, and therefore I am not in a position to reply, except to make the suggestion that the manufacture of powder is a piffling manufacturing operation in the scientific details required compared with the manufacture of armor plate. More than that, if a profit in the manufacture of powder comparable to what the Senator intimates exists, I can not see why other manufacturers do not go into the business, because the average manufacturing business shows no such return on the capital invested. I yield to the Senator from Rhode Island.

Mr. LIPPITT. I was only going to call the attention of the Senator from Nebraska to the fact that when he talks about the price of 80 cents for powder, he is talking about the cost of smokeless powder, in the infancy of its production. Smokeless powder is the powder to which that price was applied, and it was applied when smokeless powder was first discovered. Naturally in the course of the manufacture of a new article methods of economy are discovered and put into operation. I think if the Senator will investigate that subject he will find that the price went on down in connection with that article. I should like to ask the Senator——

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Let me answer right here. I will say to the Senator that I did investigate it. When in the lower House at the same time when the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WEEKS] was a Representative in the lower House, I was the author of an amendment providing $250,000 in the naval appropriation bill which doubled the capacity of the powder plant at Indianhead. The House accepted that amendment because it was demonstrated beyond a doubt that the Government by manufacturing its own powder was not only securing it cheaper than any of the powder companies were willing to offer it for, but by manufacturing it it was able from year to year to compel those companies to reduce their prices to the Government. Millions of dollars have been saved to the Government of the United States by itself undertaking the manufacture of the powder.

Mr. WEEKS. The proposition which the Senator from Nebraska advances is not comparable in any degree to this. In that case, as he states himself, there were a number of manufacturers, there was competition, and undoubtedly if there were any such profits obtainable others would have gone into the business. I should want to examine with great care all the items which should be included in the cost of manufacturing powder at Indianhead or at any other place before I would admit that it could be manufactured cheaper than in private operations.

Leaving out other considerations, what folly it is to destroy the usefulness of large manufacturing plants which are capable of manufacturing twice the requirements of the Government and constructing a new plant which presumably will be sufficient for that purpose, so that in effect we will have in the United States a capacity three times as great as our requirements. No manufacturing business can produce a low cost unless it is run at substantially its full capacity. There are practically no manufacturing industries in the United States that can make any profit running two-thirds their capacity, and I do not know any manufacturing business that can make a profit running at one-half of its capacity; yet we are deliberately proposing to add to a capacity which is now twice our requirements another unit one-half as great as our present plant capacity which, if these plants are to be in competition, will make it absolutely impossible to produce profitable results in this particular industry.

I have read with a great deal of care the hearings which were given by the committee last year, and while I have no knowledge of armor-plate making, none of the plants involved being in the section of the country which I in part represent, and have no other interests than to hope that this Government will not become involved in manufacturing industries in competition with its own citizens, I can not help deprecating the tone used in dealing with the witnesses which came before the committee. These witnesses, representing the plants now equipped to manufacture armor, declined to expose the cost of manufacture unless the information was to be considered confidential. In taking that course they were undoubtedly within their rights, because no manufacturer, under any law of the United States, is required to take such action. One of the witnesses testified that he believed his plant had developed processes or methods which enable them to manufacture somewhat cheaper than his rivals, and yet it was insisted that he should expose those processes, which are a part of the stock and trade of the company, not only for the benefit of the committee but for the benefit of the public. It would not only be exposing the company's methods to their competitors in the United States but to European competitors—an entirely unjustified demand. The Trade Commission, under laws which are now on the statute books, has the right to go into these plants and make examinations, if it is considered confidential, so that if this committee had really desired the information, in order to guide its own action in coming to a conclusion, it could have obtained it in that way. Furthermore, the witnesses to whom I have referred testified that they were in competition and that there was no combine or agreement or understanding between them. It is a little humiliating when men, who I assume are reputable and responsible, are interrogated as these witnesses were in this manner. Let me quote the character of this interrogation to which I have referred. On page 52 of the report the chairman said:

> I am referring to the loss which would accrue to the companies if the Government went into the manufacture of armor, and therefore they would be a dead loss to you if the Government should go into the manufacture of its own armor. The Government is helpless, so far as the price of armor is concerned, when there are only three makers of it and they are working in combination, charging whatever price they agree upon.

Mr. Dinkey, who was representing the Carnegie Steel Co., answered:

> Mr. DINKEY. The three are not in collusion.
> The CHAIRMAN. You say so, but we think they are. I hope you are telling the truth.
> Mr. DINKEY. I can tell you now they are not in collusion, and I do not know how I can make you believe that I am telling you the truth.
> The CHAIRMAN. The fact that Carnegie did not get any of this last contract would indicate that somehow or other the cogs had slipped and the machine did not work well. Do you know just why you did not get it? Are you willing to tell?
> Mr. DINKEY. I tried hard enough to get it, but could not. I tried to meet the Secretary's views, and I did revise my bids after he asked us to, and I did not make them sufficiently low I imagine.
> Mr. PADGETT. Upon that question, however, the contract was awarded to the other two with the stipulation that they could sublet part of the contract, and you are not out of the game yet.
> Mr. DINKEY. The deliveries required are faster than the plants that have the contracts will be able to make them.
> The CHAIRMAN. Therefore they will have to come to you, because you are the only other man that can help them out. Don't you see that you have got the Government in your power?
> Mr. DINKEY. I do not think I have.
> The CHAIRMAN. If the Government can only get from certain factories its armor, and nobody else can supply it, it seems to me that the Government is utterly helpless.
> Mr. DINKEY. Look at the other side. These tools are useful only for Government work. If the Government does not buy they stand idle.

Could there be a more humiliating position in which to place a citizen who has made large investments in a business to produce what is entirely controlled by the Government than to have his word questioned even after he has made a positive statement? The collusion scheme, to the minds of the questioners, did not work well, as evidenced by the suggestion that a great manufacturer was not out of the game, because it would be necessary for the contractor to turn to him to assist in carrying out a contract. I maintain that the tone of this colloquy is entirely unfair and should be sufficient to prejudice the case in favor of those presumably honest citizens engaged in this great industry who have been obliged to submit to such charges or suggestions.

There is another view to take of this situation, and it relates to what we are hearing so much about these days with reference to the development of our foreign trade. Every country which maintains a navy, with the exception of Japan, purchases its armor plate from private manufacturers and, as far as possible, from those located in the country making the purchase. Japan constructed a Government armor plant for the very good reason that there were no private citizens in Japan who would undertake the investment of such large sums of money in such an uncertain and hazardous business. In the case of most large countries, like England and Germany, all of the armor plate used by their Governments is manufactured within their borders; some countries, and especially Great Britain, manufacture a considerable amount for others; in fact, the larger part of the warship building of the world not conducted in local yards is done in England, English builders getting the benefit of supplying the armor for such ships. In only one instance have we built a considerable warship for a foreign country, that was the Argentine battleship which was recently turned over to that Government. It is perfectly apparent that unless we leave private manufacturers in the United States in condition to work their plants at a living profit they will lose the possibility of manufacturing for men-of-war, because no foreign Government would submit to the use of armor on its vessels which was made by plants controlled by other Governments; it is only the private manufacturers who can possibly fill such a demand, and therefore on the passage of this bill rests the possibility of our manufacturers building a considerable number of foreign battleships in the future.

As an indication of the lack of real information bearing on this subject, I wish to call attention to a letter which I had from the Secretary of the Navy. On December 16 I wrote asking for some figures relating to the cost of labor in this country and abroad in similar plants. January 11, very nearly four weeks after, I received a reply, giving the base figures which have been paid for armor in this country, which are contained in the report of the committee, and this additional information:

The wages of mechanics at United States navy yards is determined by a board of naval officers and based upon the wages paid for similar services in the vicinity of the yard—

Which, of course, is the general practice.

The average per capita wage paid during the last 10 years is not available.

I have no official information as to the prices paid by other Governments.

That is all the information I could get from the Navy Department, either in reference to this country or countries abroad, on an important item relating to the cost of manufacturing armor plate.

Mr. President, I now wish to take up somewhat more fully the question of cost. In my judgment, no suitable examination has ever been made by anyone relating to the cost of the manufacture of armor plate. I have suggested that a manufacturing plant working two-thirds of the time could seldom make any considerable profit, and that working one-half time it practically could not make any profit. Yet these armor plants have only had an average order for the last 16 years of 12,000 tons a year. Their capacity is 30,000 tons a year. In other words, they have been working two-fifths of their capacity, and I very much doubt if there is a Senator here who can cite a single instance of a manufacturing plant that can make any profit working at two-fifths its capacity.

To show what differences result from such conditions, let me take some ordinary manufacturing cases. There is always a reduction in profit and an increase in cost when a plant is working less than its full capacity. That is one of the matters on which the committee's report gives us no information. It simply assumes that the manufacture is to be done under the best conditions, under every circumstance, the plant working at its full capacity.

The average profit made in manufacturing shoes in the United States, for example, is 7 cents a pair, as nearly as the information can be obtained, if the plants are working at their full capacity; but if the plants are working at three-quarters of their capacity the average profit is reduced from 7 to 2 cents a pair; and if the plants are working at half their capacity the profit disappears, and the average plant in the United States shows a loss as a result of its operations.

I have taken several instances of manufacturing woolen and worsted goods to indicate the increase in the cost when the plant is working less than its full capacity. Top making, worsted spinning, worsted weaving, worsted finishing, cotton spinning and dyeing and finishing cotton cloths are included in this estimate. The average increase in the cost in instances where the plants are working three-fourths time is 15 per cent. Where the plants are working one-half the time the average increase in cost is 33 per cent. Where they are working one-quarter of the time the average increase in cost is 87 per cent. Where working two-fifths time, as these armor plants, the average increase in cost would not be very far from 50 per cent. The exact figures I can not estimate. I could take any number of similar instances, as, for instance, this example of a cotton mill, to demonstrate the correctness of my theory. I have here the case of a mill, the figures concerning it having been furnished me. It had a capitalization of a million and a half. It operated 135,000 spindles. Running full time it produced 30,000,000 yards of colored cotton goods in six months. The net earnings, based on the actual results of this operation, were one-sixteenth of a cent a pound, or $20,200 profit for six months. If this mill had been forced to curtail its production by shutting down for one-fourth of the time, its production would have been reduced to 23,000,000 yards, which reduction, combined with the increased burden of fixed charges, would have changed the profit of one-sixteenth of a cent per yard into a loss of four-tenths of a cent a yard, or an actual loss for the six months' manufacturing of $93,600.

I could fill the RECORD with instances to justify the correctness of the statement which I have made relating to the returns which are obtained in manufacturing plants that are run at less than their full capacity.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from New Jersey?

Mr. WEEKS. I simply wanted to finish my sentence. I now yield for a question, Mr. President.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I want to ask the Senator from Massachusetts a question. My question is whether he does not think former Senator Beveridge is pretty good authority?

Mr. WEEKS. Oh, no, Mr. President; I can not make any such admission.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I will ask the Senator, then, who might be good authority? Will the Senator permit me to merely interject the particular clipping which I hold in my hand, which bears upon the subject?

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President, I shall have to object until I have examined the clipping and examine the facts connected with it.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I will bide my time, then, and I will read the clipping at some later date, presenting the views of the distinguished ex-Senator Beveridge, wherein he takes quite the contrary position to that taken by the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. WEEKS. The Senator is quite within his rights to bide his time.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, will the Senator from Massachusetts let me ask him whether there was any evidence before the Committee on Naval Affairs in this inquiry as to what the profit had been by these armor-plate factories, or the amount invested in that department of their plant which was devoted to the manufacture of armor plate?

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President, there were some questions relating to this particular subject, but they are all dependent upon the question of cost, and, in my judgment, no suitable examination has ever been made by anyone relating to the cost of the manufacture of armor plate. There have been theories and suppositions and declarations; but as to getting down to an actual examination of the books of a concern to determine what the actual cost is, I think it has never been done.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Of course the companies themselves know what their manufacturing cost is, I assume?

Mr. WEEKS. They do.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. But they decline to make that public?

Mr. WEEKS. They did offer to give that information to the committee, and the committee has a right to go and get that information under the law providing for the Federal Trade Commission. They object, however, to having that information made public.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. That was my assertion—that they decline to make it public, and, in my opinion, wisely and justifiably decline to do so for the reasons stated by the Senator from Massachusetts; but if they know their cost of production—and I assume they could get it from their own books——

Mr. WEEKS. Undoubtedly.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. If they know that cost, was there no evidence before the committee as to what they claimed their profits had been on the amount of capital invested?

Mr. WEEKS. I am going to take up the question of cost upon the basis of the committee report.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I did not know but that they made some admission themselves as to how much or how little they had made.

Mr. SMOOT. Will the Senator from Massachusetts yield to me for a correction?

Mr. WEEKS. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. SMOOT. I stated that the price paid by the Government for powder before the appropriation bill of 1913–14 was 65 cents a pound. That was, as I recollected it; but I find that the Government pays 60 cents a pound. In the naval appropriation bill for the fiscal year 1913–14 this proviso was then adopted:

That no part of any money appropriated by this act shall be expended for the purchase of powder other than small-arms powder at a price in excess of 53 cents a pound.

Mr. LIPPITT. Mr. President——

Mr. WEEKS. I yield to the Senator from Rhode Island.

Mr. LIPPITT. I was only going to ask the Senator from Massachusetts if he did not accept the table which the makers of armor plate put into the hearings which were held before the Committee on Naval Affairs last January, a report of which is found on page 8, in which they give substantially the cost of making armor plate under various different conditions of operation? No doubt the Senator has examined those costs. Does he consider that they are all reliable or is he going to discuss that matter later?

Mr. WEEKS. Well, I am willing to take those costs as the basis of what I am about to say. Those costs are dependent on a plant running at its full capacity all the time and no deviation or estimate is made for the difference in results if a plant is run at only a portion of its capacity.

Mr. LIPPITT. The report to which I refer does deal with the plant running at full time, at two-thirds time, and at one-half time.

Mr. WEEKS. I have not those figures before me.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, will the Senator from Massachusetts yield at this point?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. WEEKS. Yes.

Mr. NORRIS. Does the Senator from Massachusetts contend that the armor-plate men have been losing money all these years?

Mr. WEEKS. Well, if they have been making money they are wizards.

Mr. NORRIS. I judge from the illustrations which the Senator has given us that he wants us to draw the comparison, which, it seems to me, must be drawn from them, that when they are running at half time the manufacturers must lose money. As he states that they have run only two-fifths of the time, it would therefore follow that they have been losing money all the time.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President, as I said, I base the estimate which I have made on other manufacturing business. I do not know about armor plate. I never have examined the books of an armor-plate manufacturer.

Mr. NORRIS. But the Senator has given us the illustrations, and I suppose the natural conclusion must follow, if the illustrations have any application, that they apply to armor-plate factories as well as to other factories.

Mr. WEEKS. I have given those illustrations as samples of the only comparisons that are available.

Mr. NORRIS. Does the Senator believe now that we ought to apply those illustrations, as he has given them to us, for that purpose? If we do so apply them, must we not conclude that on all the armor plate that we have ever bought the armor-plate people have lost money every time that it has sold us any armor plate?

Mr. WEEKS. Of course the Senator does not expect me to give an answer to that proposition without an examination of the books of an armor-plate maker. If I were going into the business I should provide myself with some real facts on what it costs to manufacture armor.

Mr. NORRIS. I have no doubt the Senator would; but the Senator has given us illustrations, for instance, of the manufacture of shoes, cotton cloth, and so forth.

Mr. WEEKS. Yes.

Mr. NORRIS. If we can apply that, as I suppose the Senator intends us to apply it, it would naturally follow, since the armor-plate people have been operating only two-fifths of the time, as the Senator says, that they must necessarily have lost money. If those illustrations mean anything, it seems to me that is what would be the logical conclusion.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Mr. President——

Mr. WEEKS. Just a moment.

Those are the only comparisons that I can make; that is, about manufacturing plants as to which I am informed. If there are any others that would modify that conclusion I should be very glad to have them, but I am simply demonstrating, in a general way at least, that manufacturing at less than full capacity means an increased cost of production.

Mr. NORRIS. I do not think anybody would doubt that; but I can not understand why the Senator gives us these illustrations unless he expects us to apply them to the armor-plate business. If he does that, and if they be true, he has actually demonstrated that these people have been losing millions of dollars for the last 15 years, and so they would be bankrupt by this time, I should think.

Mr. WEEKS. When you stop to consider, Mr. President, that armor-plate manufacturing is only a very small percentage of the total business of these steel companies—I think perhaps not more than 3 per cent—it does not necessarily mean that they would be bankrupted, and yet I want once more to state that the conclusions which I have drawn are based on other businesses, and the only other businesses with which I am familiar.

Mr. LIPPITT. Will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. WEEKS. I will yield first to the Senator from South Carolina.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I was interested in the comparison which the Senator from Massachusetts was drawing as to these manufacturing plants, and I want to ask him a question. I ask if the manufacturing of armor plate involves a different force of laborers and a different plant than does the ordinary production of other kinds of steel?

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President, undoubtedly it requires a different plant and steel makers of the highest possible type. Quite likely a workman might go from one plant to another, but the plant itself is an entirely distinct proposition.

Mr. LIPPITT. Mr. President, if the Senator will allow me, on the question of profit, to which the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] has just referred, there is what to me is a very interesting statement of that upon page 9 of the hearings by Mr. Grace, who is the representative of the Bethlehem Co. He shows that if the money which he had invested in his armor plant and which was useless for any other purpose than for making armor plate, and had never been used for any other purpose than making armor, had been invested in an ordinary steel-producing plant and had earned 10 per cent profit, the profits he would have earned would have been as much as the entire gross receipts which he received from his armor plant per annum; in other words, his gross receipts from his armor plant per annum were $1,418,000, and the profits that he would have made if his money had been invested in any ordinary steel business would have been $1,400,000, or only $18,000 less than the total amount received from the Government for making armor. Now, all I know about the profits of these people is what is contained in this report, but if the statements in the report are correct, the armor-plate manufacturers certainly have been running their business at a remarkably low rate.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, does not the testimony which the Senator has given from one of these people demonstrate, if it demonstrates anything, that there is an enormous profit in the general steel business? I do not understand that it demonstrates that they were running at a loss.

Mr. LIPPITT. I do not know what the Senator thinks an enormous profit. The enormous profit that Mr. Grace bases his figures on is a profit of 10 per cent.

Mr. NORRIS. He has simply said, then, that if he had invested his money in something else, in some other line of the steel business——

Mr. LIPPITT. In some other department of the steel business in which he was engaged.

Mr. NORRIS. Then, he would have made so much money out of it.

Mr. LIPPITT. He would have made as much money as the total receipts he had received annually from the Government.

Mr. NORRIS. That would seem to me to indicate that in the business of which he was speaking there was a wide field for immense profit, if he could make that much money out of it.

Mr. LIPPITT. The profit on which he bases these figures is stated as 10 per cent. If the Senator would take the report and read it, he would find that it is a very simple matter, only embracing three or four lines.

Mr. NORRIS. I should like to ask the Senator from Rhode Island, with the permission of the Senator from Massachusetts——

Mr. LIPPITT. I do not want to unduly take the time of the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. NORRIS. I am asking this question by permission of the Senator from Massachusetts, of course.

Mr. WEEKS. I yield to the Senator that he may ask a question of the Senator from Rhode Island.

Mr. NORRIS. Does the Senator from Rhode Island believe that the people who have their money invested in armor-plate factories are losing money in that business?

Mr. LIPPITT. My impression, after reading the report of the hearings very carefully, is that it is a very remarkable thing that these people have kept their plants in operation at all.

Mr. NORRIS. I presume they are very wealthy men, or they would have been bankrupt by this time.

Mr. LIPPITT. They are not very wealthy men.

Mr. NORRIS. Then, I can not see how they have continued in business all these years if they have lost money all the time.

Mr. LIPPITT. The owners of these plants consist of something like 500,000 citizens of the United States.

Mr. NORRIS. I do not see how these men, whether they are numerous or few, could continue to live if they have been losing money all the time, as the illustrations given would seem to indicate.

Mr. LIPPITT. The Senator has just had that question answered. It was answered by the statement of the Senator from Massachusetts, that the manufacture of armor is a very small part of their business. They were not living on this branch of the business; they were living on something else.

Mr. NORRIS. They were making a large profit on something else and losing on this. The Senator believes, then, that while they are losing on armor plate they are making enough in the general business in which they are engaged to compensate them for their losses and making a profit besides?

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President, I think I shall have to go on with my remarks, although I will yield if the Senator desires to ask another question.

Mr. NORRIS. No; I will not interrupt the Senator further. He has been very courteous, and I will not encroach further on his time.

Mr. WEEKS. The estimate made by the committee as to the cost of manufacturing armor is $262.79 a ton. That may have been substantially——

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me before he leaves the other subject, I will ask the question of him which I wanted to ask the Senator from Rhode Island. If the armor-plate people are losing money, does the Senator think that they would have objected when they were before the committee to telling the committee about the costs entering into the manufacture of armor plate?

Mr. WEEKS. I do not understand that they did object to giving the committee the costs provided they were not made public.

Mr. NORRIS. It would not hurt them to make them public if they were running at a loss. Their competitors certainly could not get any advantage out of that. If they were losing money, it would drive their competitors out of business, if it did anything.

Mr. WEEKS. There is a principle involved in a manufacturer being required to expose his business to his rivals in trade. No man can conduct a business successfully on any such basis as that, not only because of his rivals in this country but because of his rivals abroad. If he has a trade secret which enables him to save 1 per cent in the cost of manufacture, that is as much a part of his capital in the business as any other item connected with it.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President——

Mr. WEEKS. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. SWANSON. The Senator has remarked repeatedly that the offer was made to give these costs to the committee, if it would receive and treat the information as confidential. The committee took the position, which is a very proper one, that it was the agent of the Senate to ascertain the facts, form its conclusions, and report to the Senate, so that the Senate might act upon this matter. The Secretary of the Navy had taken the same position when he was directed to inquire into the matter. The Niles Board and other boards likewise took the position that they were agents of the Senate, and had no right to receive secret information. If the Senator, however, has read the hearings he will realize that the armor-plate people were not requested to disclose a single secret of the process of manufacture, but were merely asked to give a summary of what they thought the costs were, without the elements entering into the costs. That was all the committee asked.

Mr. WEEKS. I have read the hearings with great care, and I would suggest to the Senator from Virginia that receiving information in confidence by a committee is not at all an unusual thing to do. It is very frequently done for the protection of the Government, not only on our own account but in our rivalries with other countries. Even, however, if that were not so, the Senator from Virginia will admit that the Trade Commission can go into any one of these plants and make any kind of examination of the books of the company and furnish the information to the committee, provided it is kept, as the law requires, from the public.

Mr. SWANSON. What advantage would that be to the Senate when it has got to vote on this question, if the Senate could not ascertain the facts?

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President, I have confidence enough in the Naval Committee to feel that if it were furnished with that information it would submit a price for the making of armor based on that information, instead of on a lot of surmises, which it has now done.

Mr. SWANSON. If the Senator will permit me, he has ridiculed the process by which the committee arrived at the figures given. I should like to have the Senator to suggest a better method for this Government to ascertain the cost of armor plate than it has adopted. It appointed a commission, known as the Niles Commission, composed of Admiral Niles, Capt. Walker McLean, and Capt. Simpson, experts on this question, who had been inspectors in armor plants, and knew everything about the making of armor. They made a report. A former Secretary of the Navy, Mr. Herbert, was also directed to get all the experts possible and to investigate this question, and he made a report. Admiral Straus is responsible for this report. He is the Government's authority on ordnance and armor. In addition, we asked the armor-plate makers to furnish us the information. Now, if the Senator can suggest a better and a more thorough way than the Government has employed to try to ascertain the true and fair cost of armor-plate making in this country, I should like to know of it.

Mr. WEEKS. I have already suggested it, Mr. President, by calling to his attention the fact that the Trade Commission can go and get accurate information on this particular subject, and then there would be no question about the base which you were using for the costs of armor.

Mr. SWANSON. But, as I understand, the Trade Commission is compelled to treat is as confidential.

Mr. WEEKS. Why, of course; and it should do so.

Mr. LIPPITT. If the Senator will pardon me, I should like to call to the attention of the Senator from Virginia the fact that he asked Mr. Grace, representing the Bethlehem Co., if he had any objection to a public accountant, properly authorized, going through his books, and Mr. Grace consented and said that he was willing to have that done. I will read the language. It is found on page 23 of the hearings:

> Senator SWANSON. Have you any objection to having a public accountant go through your books, and thus enabling this committee to see what your books show as to the cost of armor plate from 1887 to the present time?
> Mr. GRACE. I have no objection to a public accountant, properly authorized, and in whom we would both have confidence, being allowed to go over the situation.

I read this matter through, and I was surprised that the Senator from Virginia did not accept the proposition.

Mr. SWANSON. We are perfectly willing to accept it, and tried to get one, provided the information he obtained could be given to the Senate. We did not feel justified in saying that we reached conclusions on secret information. The trouble we have had all the time lies in the fact that they will never let any information we get from them be made public and be brought to the attention of the Senate.

Mr. LIPPITT. It seems to me the gentlemen were not very anxious to get this information. What these people object to is having the details of those costs presented to the public. As I understand, they do not object in this testimony, which I have read through very carefully, to having the net result of the total made public. In fact, they have repeatedly stated in the hearings—Mr. Grace stated over and over again that he accepted as a fair cost for making armor plate the report of the Niles Committee, to which the Senator from Virginia has already referred. Mr. Grace accepted those figures, and the representative of the other concern—the Midvale concern—accepted those figures. Using those Government figures as a basis, they go on and show the various conditions under which armor plate has been manufactured and the various modifications of those costs that must be made from those circumstances.

Mr. SWANSON. If the Senator will permit me, he stated that they were within 10 per cent, he thought, of the costs indicated on their books, but he would not say whether the 10 per cent was larger or smaller.

Mr. LIPPITT. Oh, I read the controversy between the Senator from Virginia and the representative of the company, and, without meaning to be at all disagreeable to the Senator, I thought the answer of the representative of the manufacturing company was a proper commercial answer. His statement was that the report of the Niles Committee represented the costs as nearly as he thought any investigation could represent them, and that he believed those costs were within 10 per cent, one way or the other, of the actual costs.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. Grace's estimate of the accuracy of the work done by these committees is different from that of the Senator from Massachusetts. As I understand, the Senator from Rhode Island agrees with Mr. Grace that these men had done very good work, and that their estimate was accurate and wise.

Mr. LIPPITT. I do not know anything about the work that those men did. I have made no such statement. I have merely said that Mr. Grace and the representatives of the Midvale people and of the Bethlehem people were satisfied to accept the figures that the Senator from Virginia wanted to have accepted, and that, based on those figures, they show that they were making a profit of some 7 or 8 per cent on the business.

Mr. WEEKS. Now, Mr. President, I will go on.

The report of the committee indicates that a conclusion was reached that the production costs of the proposed plant, operating at full capacity, is $262.79 a ton. Now, if we add to that 15 per cent loss in running at three-quarters capacity, it would add $39.49 a ton, or $302 for the total cost. The Tillman report is on the basis of running at one-half its capacity. Adding 33 per cent would make the cost of the armor $350.38. Running at one-quarter of its capacity, it would make the cost of the armor $491.41. Running at one-third of its capacity, it would make the cost of the armor $419.79. Running at two-fifths of its capacity, it would make the cost of the armor $350.38. Then, taking the items for administration, and so forth, that are contained in the committee's report, $10 a ton for administration; taxes and insurance, $4.50 a ton; interest at 6 per cent, $42 a ton—of course no manufacturing plant would be established, based on a probable profit of 6 per cent, but I take those figures as they are given in the report—this, with the plant run at two-fifths of its capacity, would make the armor cost $406.88, and there is nothing charged for depreciation in that item. The depreciation would be easily $35 a ton on a plant of the cost of the plants that are now in operation. So that, practically speaking, running at two-fifths of the capacity, unless there is a difference in this character of manufacture from that which obtains in most others, there could not have been any profit greater than a very small rate of interest on the investment; and, as stated in the report, one of the witnesses testified that if the money which had been invested in these plants had been put into bonds bearing 4 per cent interest, the companies would have been better off than they are under present conditions.

The low prices made by manufacturers are due to the fact that they know that if a Government plant is established it will run 24 hours a day, as is done at the gun factory, and that they will get only the business that is left. The same situation exists in the case of the cartridge-case factory, which now manufactures all of the Government cartridge cases, and no inquiries are made of private manufacturers. It was for that reason, among others, that the manufacturers decided to make a reduction of $30 per ton—a price, of course, based on the Government having a consistent naval program for a term of years.

It has been suggested in these hearings that naval officers are thoroughly competent to pass on all the details of steel manufacturing. I have no disposition to deprecate their qualifications, and yet I want to say that, in my judgment, no officer of the Navy has had any proper or suitable opportunity to learn the details of steel making. He has capacity to inspect a steel product under conditions which have been obtained from experience. He has, more than that, capacity to test the finished product; but all of these Government plants, like the gun plant at Washington Navy Yard, as I have stated, are simply building-up or assembling propositions, and are not engaged in the earlier stages of steel manufacturing.

No attempt has been made by the Navy Department to experiment with or to investigate the details of armor making. The tests made by the department are more severe each year. The manufacturers have been spurred on to get the best possible results, and Admiral Strauss testified that no attempt was made to advise armor manufacturers how to conduct their business. In fact, there is no testimony to show that any officers of our Navy have an intimate knowledge of the methods used in manufacturing steel for armor.

If the Government builds an armor plant, competition will, as a result, be destroyed. It can not be shut down and started up at will, because the development of a suitable force is a matter of months and years. So the building of a Government plant of the kind contemplated would be a willful destruction of twenty to thirty millions of invested capital. How can we expect citizens to engage in business for the Government under such circumstances if we are to establish such a course as a Government policy?

I am informed that large coast-defense guns and field-artillery guns for South and Central American Republics are now under construction in United States plants, and, as I have stated, at least in one case, the armor plate manufactured in one of our private plants was used in the construction of a South American battleship. If we make our armor in a Government plant, the extension of this business will be impossible. The European countries which, before the present war, placed their orders for armament with German and Austrian manufacturers, have found it impossible to obtain delivery, even if they had not taken sides with the allies. I am told that one Balkan country which might become engaged in war on the side of the allies, would have done so before this if all of its armament had not been furnished by Germany and it would be necessary to practically reequip itself with guns and ammunition in order to keep itself supplied. The same would be true of the countries that have taken the side of the central powers, which had heretofore purchased their armament from England and France. Our own Government has in the past placed orders for submarine mines and other material with England, but now finds that it is impossible to have it delivered. All of which goes to show that the South American and Central American Republics, which can not now obtain their war material, would naturally turn to this country for their supply.

No European country has undertaken to manufacture armor plate on its own account. Germany, perhaps, of all countries now engaged in war, has most completely demonstrated its thorough preparedness; and yet private manufacturers produce absolutely all the war material used by Germany. There is no Government gun plant, no Government armor-plate plant, or plant for the manufacture of any other war material, and the countries which are opposed to the central powers which have in the past not completely developed their private enterprises are now doing their utmost to overcome this lack of foresight by building up their capacity to provide for themselves.

Everyone knows that the retreat of the entire Russian Army on the east front was largely due to lack of ammunition and the incapacity of Russian manufacturers to produce it. In fact, this whole proposition, instead of being one for preparedness, is one to cripple the most fundamental condition connected with preparedness. We can not hope to maintain an army in time of peace sufficient for our war needs; neither can we hope to manufacture ammunition or to have a Government plant sufficient to manufacture our ammuniton needed in time of war.

Gen. Crozier, who during a long and distinguished service has demonstrated his knowledge and capacity in connection with such a subject, testified before the Military Committee that a plant large enough to furnish all the ammunition needed by an army of 1,000,000 men would require a plant costing $400,000,000. What we should do in such cases is to cooperate with private manufacturers, provide them with sufficient orders to enable them to retain superintendents and other leading men in their plants, so that in case of need they can promptly turn from the peaceful operations which they are conducting to the manufacture of supplies for the Government.

One of the most interesting developments during this war has been the accomplishments of our manufacturers in connection with munitions of war. It is a reassuring development, because it gives an idea of what might be the result in case we required their assistance. The Government statistics of war materials exported to Europe during the past year show the spontaneous and adequate manner in which our privately owned manufacturing plants have been able to meet the emergency and turn their energies from the production of domestic articles to that of the necessaries of war. The most striking instance of this development is to be found in the production and exportation of gunpowder. In November, 1914, according to the reports of the Department of Commerce, we exported only $23,037 worth of gunpowder, while in November of last year the industry had been developed to such an extent that we were able to export $16,730,384 worth of this prime necessity of defense. The increase in explosives production and exportation was almost as notable, the exportation in November, 1915, having a value of $13,495,527 as compared with only $78,062 in November, 1914. The monthly exportation of aeroplanes developed from $31,935 in November, 1914, to $298,706 in November of last year. The total exportation of war materials in November, 1915, was valued at $53,009,024, as compared with only $14,923,105 for November, 1914, an increase of $38,085,919, or an increase of about 250 per cent. The total exportation of war materials during the single month of November just past—$53,009,024—was almost equal to the war exportation for the entire year of 1914—$54,965,113 from December 1, 1913, to November 30, 1914. Altogether these figures are convincing evidence of the ability of privately owned manufacturing plants to turn from the demands of peace to the demands of war and cope with either situation in an adequate manner. If these same concerns could be encouraged by the Federal Government to maintain their plants at or near their present state of efficiency through the parceling out of Government orders in time of peace, I believe we would go a long way toward meeting the question of preparedness. Industrial preparedness is an extremely important unit of the entire question, and I think our industrial world has convincingly shown its ability to meet the emergency if proper cooperation is forthcoming from the Federal Government.

I ask permission to include, Mr. President, a table showing the changes in the exportation of war materials during the past year.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey in the chair). Without objection, it will be so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

Total monthly exportations of all war materials from December, 1914, to November 30, 1915, compared with those of the previous year (1913–14).

	1915–1914	1914–1913	Increase.
December, 1914	$20,550,682	$3,341,207	$17,209,495
January, 1915	20,163,660	2,300,145	17,863,515
February, 1915	21,785,976	2,438,851	18,347,125
March, 1915	22,192,541	3,449,607	18,742,934
April, 1915	23,766,472	3,764,202	20,002,270
May, 1915	28,694,062	2,902,040	25,792,022
June, 1915	36,936,970	2,921,989	34,044,971
July, 1915	43,976,744	2,970,242	41,706,402
August, 1915	35,509,457	1,861,543	33,647,914
September, 1915	40,661,560	3,898,667	36,762,893
October, 1915	44,796,165	10,193,424	34,602,741
November, 1915	53,009,024	14,923,105	38,085,919
Total	383,073,313	54,965,113	328,108,200

Mr. WEEKS. Although it is frequently stated that our armor costs have been extravagant, it is noticeable that they are lower than the costs of any other country using armor. In Japan the cost is $490 a ton; in Austria it is $511 a ton. I am reading from the reports for the past year. In Italy it is $405 a ton or $444 a ton for turret armor; in Germany it is $490 a ton; in France it is $460 a ton; in England it is $503 a ton; in the United States it is $425 a ton; in Russia it is $510 a ton for turret armor and $368 a ton for Krupp side armor. On the average the cost here is very materially less than the average for all other countries, something like $50 a ton.

Mr. LIPPITT. Less than in any other country.

Mr. WEEKS. Less than in any other country. Everyone knows that the general cost of manufacturing in every one of the countries with which I have made comparison is less than in the United States, and that in itself would be a sufficient reply to the general charge that we have been paying scandalously high prices for armor plate.

Every fact on record up to the present moment proves unmistakably that all the great naval powers have regarded armor plate as a specialty and not a commercial product in any sense of the term. England, the first naval power of the world, Germany, the best-equipped military nation on earth, never have deviated from a policy in which consultation with and cooperation between their Governments and the private steel makers has been a stable feature. More than ever since the outbreak of the European war has the wisdom of this policy been vindicated. England, called upon suddenly to expand her Navy to an unprecedented degree, turned to her armor-plate manufacturers and secured her supplies readily. More than a million tons have been added by Great Britain to her navy since the beginning of hostilities. It is noteworthy, however, that notwithstanding these rush orders the facilities of the private armor plants of Great Britain have been equal to all demands upon them, and the Government has not been compelled to go outside its own producers for a ton of armor plate. During much of this time the armor plants of the United States have been idle and could readily have filled foreign orders had they been proffered.

I would make the point at the outset that should the United States, unfortunately, be plunged into a war calling for the extreme of her military and naval resources the American plants would be able to turn out armor faster than it could be placed upon the ships that could be built within an equal period of time. Not only this, but the private armor plants contain within themselves the capacity of indefinite expansion of their manufacturing facilities. The legitimate dependence of the Government upon private manufacturers would not be eliminated should this bill succeed, for it must be borne in mind that the gigantic concerns which constructed the American armor plants were compelled to make their own machinery. It could not be bought elsewhere, so they had no option but to design and build it. Consequently, were a Government plant attempted, these same companies, which are unique in their manufacturing facilities, still would be drawn upon because of the massive and unusual nature of the tools required. These points seem to me important because this interdependence is natural, normal, and proper. The impropriety of the hour is the attempt to destroy this indispensable copartnership. Does anyone doubt that Great Britain and Germany are thanking God to-day for their private armor plants?

The main charges made by the Senator from South Carolina and adopted by him in support of his bill are that, as he puts it in his blunt way, the steel men are robbers, that their prices have been too high and their profits too large, and that the Government is helpless in the hands of their combination. Where the great foreign naval powers see helpfulness the Senator from South Carolina sees only helplessness. Where they have found cooperation, he finds a combination. Where they have placed efficiency above profits, even granting that profits have been unreasonable—which I do not grant—he sees only dollars. The Senator's charges are serious and if true might warrant a respectful consideration of this bill, although I am frank to say that for many other reasons than those relating to money, reasons having to do with scientific problems, a Government armor plant is inadvisable.

But, taking the argument for this bill right on its own ground, a little analysis of incontrovertible figures may be found enlightening. Up to the present time, according to the Secretary of the Navy, as quoted by the Senator from South Carolina, the Navy Department, since 1900, has paid $76,195,960 for armor plate. To this should be added the amount paid for armor plate up to 1900 since 1887, when the industry was established, $10,860,073. The total amount paid by the Government for armor plate, therefore, is $87,056,033. The average per annum over the 29 years of the life of the business is $3,001,932.17. The appraised value of the existing plants is between $20,000,000 and $30,000,000. Undoubtedly $30,000,000 have gone into the plants, and their reconstruction value would probably be about $25,000,000.

But these figures do not take into account the large expenditures, the extra cost made necessary by the three major changes of process in the art experienced during this time, and the machinery once useful, but, through the operation of these changes of process, rendered obsolete and thrown into the discard. The companies bore the total burden of expense necessitated by these changes. Thus the total expenditure for plant and equipment in this period closely approximates $30,000,000 instead of the twenty millions represented by the present-day valuation of the three plants.

Here we have an investment of about $30,000,000 of private capital in a plant useless for any other purpose than that for which it was built, yielding an apparent gross sales return of $3,001,932.17 annually. That is 15 per cent on an investment assuming that the entire investment has been in operation for two-thirds of the time since 1887. The first plant was constructed in 1887, the second plant about 1895 or 1896, as I recall it, and the third plant about 1904. So I think that is a fair assumption.

If this total sales return were gross profit, it would yield the companies only 10 per cent. This showing, however, meager as it is, fails to take into account money paid out for the thousands of tons of material, millions of dollars of wages paid to labor, expenditures for salaries, for administration, for interest, taxes, insurance, accounting, and so forth. So that the net profits to the companies can not be the unreasonable and exorbitant amounts imagined and charged by the Senator from South Carolina. I am content to set these facts against the uninformed statement of Secretary Herbert, so triumphantly quoted by the Senator from South Carolina in his report upon this bill. I would repeat, that the Senate may not lose the significance of this showing, that if the total returns from sales of armor plate were all profit they would pay only 10 per cent on the investment. A man need not be possessed of extraordinary business sense to understand that no sales of anything ever are all profit. I am compelled to say that the charges brought against the steel companies and used as a basis for this impracticable legislation are so extravagant that this proposal would not command a moment's respect in any business house or under any other circumstances than those created by the present administration. Are we not compelled to infer that the reasons back of this proposition have not been completely stated in the report made upon the bill?

Senators do not realize, because they do not know, how infinitesimally small in comparison with their total output the armor-plate production of the great steel companies is. It is freely charged that the manufacturers foster preparedness for the sake of possible profits, and it is popularly and commonly supposed that the manufacture of war material occupies so much of the space and equipment of these companies as to make it of prime importance to them that they continue in this line of manufacture. The three steel companies manufacturing armor in America have a total steel production of 12,100,000 tons per annum. They sell therefore 1,200 times as much of their other product elsewhere as the Government buys of them in armor plate; for against this more than 12,000,000 tons of total production it should be remembered that the Government buys only a pitiful 10,000 tons of armor plate a year. The most ambitious naval-building program this administration can conceive calls for only 24,000 tons a year, consequently should the Secretary of the Navy be permitted to carry out his plan—which to my mind is a very modest, if not an inadequate plan—the armor-plate makers in other parts of their plants would be turning out more than 500 times as much as they would sell to the Secretary of the Navy. These are pregnant figures.

It is proper to ask, however, if the question appears intelligent, why the makers of armor plate should be unwilling to be put out of business. No concern with an investment of $30,000,000, which is returning any profit at all, would willingly see that investment destroyed. I need not argue this fact with everyone, although I fear it is not fully appreciated by some of the advocates of this bill. It is true also that it is an advertisement of great practical value for an American steel company to be able to say that its facilities are such, its scientific knowledge is so great, it has so perfected the costly processes of steel manufacture that it can satisfy the demands of the Government of the United States for the finest armor plate that human ingenuity can devise or factory skill can produce.

The steel manufacturers are proud of their achievement, which has not been duplicated anywhere else in the world. I have no doubt that the widespread knowledge of their skill has brought them commercial business from all parts of the world. They have proved that American steel stands without an equal. It was their thorough knowledge of steel making, acquired by a generation of fundamental investigations and founded upon costly experiments, that enabled the American manufacturers, when their Government turned to them for aid, to supply its demands. There is no question, I think, on any hand that the armor which has been manufactured in this country is of the highest quality. Of course there are defects which appear in armor. There are defects which appear in any steel billets, and very much of that kind of product is thrown out; it is unavoidable. One of the reasons for the high cost of manufacturing armor is that it does require an article of such high quality that it is very difficult to obtain, and probably it would not be obtained under the methods here proposed.

Mr. LANE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Oregon?

Mr. WEEKS. I do.

Mr. LANE. There has been much question about the quality of the manufacture of armor plate. Some years ago the manufacturers were fined by the Government for furnishing an inferior quality of armor plate.

Mr. WEEKS. I think that statement about a fine is true; but if the Senator from Oregon will make an investigation he will find that the product of these armor-plate manufacturers has been quite as high as any other form of steel product. Of course there are defects which appear in armor. There are defects which appear in any steel billets, and very much of that kind of product is thrown out; it is unavoidable. One of the reasons for the high cost of manufacturing armor is that it does require an article of such high quality that it is very difficult to obtain, and probably it would not be obtained under the methods here proposed.

Mr. LANE. As I understand it, Mr. President, the type of armor now being manufactured, or which has been manufactured in the recent past, are armor plates designed to defeat the penetrating power of projectiles; that that type of armor is not being manufactured for the use of the navy of any other power in the world; and that they now build an armor plate to resist the power of explosives. I do not know whether that is true or not, but it is what I have understood.

Mr. WEEKS. Undoubtedly both kinds of armor are under consideration and tests are being made on both. I suggested at the beginning of my remarks that there were great changes in the requirements of the department, and that a much better quality of armor was undoubtedly being furnished to the Government to-day than was furnished 5, 10, or 20 years ago.

Using an expression in the committee report, it is "little short of scandalous" that a condition of controversy should exist or continue to exist between the Government and those who are manufacturing a product for the Government over what is really a very simple business proposition. It is not necessary to in any way attempt to deny, though it could easily be done, some of the extravagant statements which are made in the committee report relating to collusions, combinations, and so forth, to state this simple fact: The Government needs armor plate and there are three manufacturers prepared to furnish it, any one of whom can very nearly manufacture the entire requirement, and certainly any two of whom can more than furnish all that the Government needs or will need under the building program which is in contemplation.

The Government is obliged to purchase and the three manufacturers are likely to substantially agree on the price to be asked. Under those conditions the obviously sensible thing to do is for the Government to enter into a contract with these companies for a limited time, with a right of renewal on the part of the Government and with specified provisions for so doing, under which agreement the Government guarantees to take a minimum tonnage of armor and the companies agree to supply a maximum tonnage. The Government should guarantee to the companies a stated profit. Expert accounting has now become a science, so that profits can be determined with substantial accuracy. I am informed—although I believe it does not appear in the hearings—that the representatives of the companies appearing before the committee offered to permit expert accountants to examine their books and plant and report their actual cost, provided this information was not made public. No business man will fail to recognize the wisdom or the fairness of this proposition. To compel a business concern, especially one which is striving to lessen the cost of production and is employing experts of all kinds to bring about such a result, to expose its methods and its costs to its rivals, and especially its foreign rivals, is morally wrong and bad public policy. There is no difficulty in obtaining the actual facts about armor making in this country. Under our present laws the Trade Commission may go through any of the armor plants, or all of them, and obtain this information for the benefit of the Government, of course, without its being made public. Therefore, coming here without facts, as does this report, stating propositions based on theories or prejudices, and without actual knowledge, is unfair and unbusinesslike in the extreme.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. WEEKS. I yield.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Do I understand that all these companies are manufacturing armor plate exclusively for the use of the United States?

Mr. WEEKS. Almost entirely so. They manufactured the armor for an Argentine battleship and they have made some small sales abroad.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Then, may I ask, what danger or what damage would come to this country if they make public their method of manufacture?

Mr. WEEKS. The danger would come because it would be giving the information to foreign manufacturers.

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. WEEKS. I yield.

Mr. CLAPP. If the Senator will pardon me for a moment, I know he would not want to put this matter in any but the most accurate light.

Mr. WEEKS. That is what I am trying to do.

Mr. CLAPP. I do not think the manufacturers were ever asked to disclose the methods employed in making their plate. So far as my remembrance goes, whenever the question was raised while I was in the committee it related solely to the cost and not to the methods employed by the companies.

Mr. WEEKS. I wish to say that I did not find anything in the hearings which indicated that any question about methods had been asked, and if I so stated I was in error.

Mr. CLAPP. No; except the Senator did say it would not be wise to expose their methods.

Mr. WEEKS. I should have said the cost, and the methods would have been a part of the general proposition. I do not think they have been asked to expose their methods.

Mr. President, I am not excusing the steel companies for not giving the committee any information which it required, except that I do insist that it is bad public policy to expose a man's business to his rivals, and we provided in passing the Trade Commission act that the information which the Trade Commission obtained should not be made public.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I do not quite understand, Mr. President, how the rivals of these companies could injuriously affect them in the home market. Would the United States Government purchase abroad if it could not purchase in this country?

Mr. WEEKS. No; but we do sell some armor abroad. We have sold in three different instances to Russia. We sold armor to Argentina, and we are manufacturing guns for several South and Central American countries. That has not anything to do with armor, but while we are trying to develop business arrangements with South America, it seems to be inadvisable to attempt anything which will destroy the possibility of that trade. That is what I am trying to get at.

It is not necessary at this time to go into details as to the kind of contract to be made with these manufacturers—it is the kind of proposition which occurs every day in business life—but, in addition to what I have suggested, a provision might well be inserted in the contract for the purchase of the plant by the Government at an upset price. The Government might not desire to take advantage of this provision, but it should always be in position to avail itself of the possibility. It should not be forgotten that there is an abundance of capital available for investment where a reasonable return is certain. It is the quasi-speculative character of dealings with the Government that justifies and, indeed, compels the high prices so often demanded by manufacturers. If this element of uncertainty were removed there would be no difficulty in securing for the Government armor plate or any other supplies at reasonable commercial prices.

It is not therefore my purpose to suggest a contract in detail, but simply to indicate the relations which, in my opinion, should exist between the Government and the armor manufacturers. It is a similar relation to that which should exist in all cases where the Government has dealings with its own citizens. To attack them, to attempt to destroy their business, and to put itself into competition with them is without precedent abroad and without excuse. Such a policy will bring nothing but disaster. It will, in the end, lose us our home markets and destroy at one blow the possibility of our invading foreign markets. If an administration attempting to carry out the general suggestion which I have made should be unable to do so, and it shall be clearly demonstrated that the failure is due to the unreasonable demands of those who are dealing directly with the Government in products which pertain to the national defense, which is not true in this case, then, and only then, should Congress consider the creation of a Government plant.

Mr. POINDEXTER obtained the floor.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. May I ask the Senator from Massachusetts a question?

Mr. POINDEXTER. I yield to the Senator from Utah for that purpose.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I first wish to ask the Senator from Massachusetts if he can tell us, approximately, how much capital is now invested in these armor-plate manufacturing plants?

Mr. WEEKS. About $30,000,000 has been invested in the plants. They are carried at about $20,000,000; the testimony, I think, shows $21,000,000 in round numbers, and the replacement value is estimated at $25,000,000.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. So the bill proposes that the Government of the United States shall invest in this business what would be about one-fourth of all the capital now invested?

Mr. WEEKS. Eleven million dollars this bill provides. So it would be about one-half of the book value at present.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. One-third of the total?

Mr. WEEKS. Just about one-third of the total.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. What is the raw material that is utilized in the manufacture of armor plate?

Mr. WEEKS. Pig iron converted into steel and given special treatment for these particular purposes.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. What I want to get at is whether or not the ore from which the basic material is manufactured is treated in any different way to produce material suitable for the manufacture of armor plate than to produce material suitable for the manufacture of any other steel product.

Mr. WEEKS. I think the testimony shows that the quality of steel ingots that goes into armor plate must be of the very highest type, and that it requires great experience in order to develop the steel which is suitable for this purpose.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. If the Government should go into this business, it would be necessary for it to depend upon private capital to supply the basic material?

Mr. WEEKS. Up to this time the Government has done that in all of its munitions-manufacturing business.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. It is not proposed that the Government shall go into the business of smelting the ore and producing the basic material?

Mr. WEEKS. I understand it is the purpose of the Government to conduct the whole operation up to the finished product, though perhaps it would buy its pig iron from others.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. To begin with smelting the ore and going through?

Mr. WEEKS. Yes; that is my understanding.

I ask unanimous consent to include in my remarks an editorial from the Boston Herald, which has a general relation to the subject.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it will be included.

The matter referred to is as follows:

[Reprint from the Boston Herald, Saturday, Nov. 20, 1915.]

WHY THE PRIVATE YARDS LOST THE BIDS FOR NEW SHIPS.

The American public has just learned that the private shipyards which submitted competitive bids for the construction of battleships 63 and 64 failed to offer so low prices as the Government-owned yards. This must strike our readers as odd. They see the Government do little at a less expensive rate than privately owned concerns. How, then, does it happen that Uncle Sam is so successful in shipbuilding by contrast with private enterprise?

The answer involves a little explanation. The New York Navy Yard makes up its estimate by entering $745,357 for "overhead" charges. The private yards have found by experience that they must rate this factor at approximately $2,000,000. And there is no necromancy by which the United States gets away with it for one cent less. It simply does not need to charge it, because it has no responsibility for making ends meet. Let us look over the items that go to overhead charges and see how the two bidders, respectively, regard them.

Depreciation of plant in private yards for the three years in which a battleship would be building is a factor of undoubted consequence. The private yards ordinarily estimate 5 per cent per annum of the total building and machinery value for the period the ship is under construction. The Government enters nothing for this item. But does Uncle Sam buy machinery or building material at any less than do private yards? By no means. Is there, then, any reason why his depreciation should be rated at a lower figure or disregarded? Yes; there is one reason. Because the Government estimators do not have to come out square. They do not have to make a battleship carry all the charges of building a battleship, but may distribute the charge over the operations of sovereignty.

When a building or a machine wears out Congress appropriates money for new ones, instead of distributing the depreciation as a charge over the work as it is performed. The private yard must either maintain such a scrutiny or go into the bankruptcy court, and that is all there is to the astounding disparity which Secretary Daniels has uncovered. For it should be understood, first and last, that an entity which keeps no real accounts can always make a showing of effective competition with bidders who do comply with the hard conditions of actual business. Let us examine a few cases.

The private yard has to pay for its drawings and plans, and charges these costs direct against the ship where they belong. This, with a battleship, amounts to $250,000. The navy yards carry this in a separate appropriation, as one of the general charges of conducting a government, and never think of leveling it against the building of a particular ship. But we have to pay for it just the same.

The cost of clerks, timekeepers, and other minor officials comes out of this general expense of the Navy as a part of governmental sovereignty. In the case of the private shipbuilder these items amount to $125,000 during the construction of ships like those for which bids were recently invited. Government yards get their moderate bids by omitting such items altogether.

The salaries of officers detailed for duty in connection with the construction, Uncle Sam charges to the Navy payroll and not to the ship. These amount to $30,000 with Uncle Sam, and to quite a little more in private yards which regularly utilize, as competitive rivalry compels, a higher order of business talent.

The item of insurance and indemnity bonds amounts to $100,000 to a private company. But the Government does not worry about such things. It does not insure a battleship in construction, since if anything happens to it another appropriation from Congress will build a new one. Nor does it consider the liability of loss by fire, or otherwise, as a factor in its estimates.

The Government allows all employees in the navy yards sick leave, holidays, vacation, etc., during the year, and these are charged to a separate appropriation and not to item of labor on the particular job in question. These would amount to $350,000 in the construction of the ship. But any gratuities that the private yard gives in the way of vacations, holidays, etc., must be lodged in overhead charges and borne in the cost of the ship. The private shipbuilder allows in his estimate the sum of $100,000 for trials, but the navy yard completes and commissions its ships, and after the crew has become accustomed thereto, holds the trial, but the cost of it is charged against operation, and not construction. Thus the dice are loaded.

No Government yard carries any part of the burden of local taxation. The Charlestown Navy Yard, for example, makes no contribution in taxes toward the surfacing of Chelsea Street by its side, as a private establishment of the same size and value would do. And yet this street-repair cost must come out of the people in one form if not in another. Any private yard hereabouts would pay in municipal taxation in the construction of one battleship not less than $50,000. This would be the sum which would go to the municipal government for taxes on the plant and machinery thus represented during the years of construction. Even if we technically save this in building by the Government, the municipality loses it, and so must take it out of the people.

The private contractor takes a ship at a fixed price, and gets no more unless the purchaser orders some changes from the schedule. In the case of a Government-built ship the only limit is the total of the appropriation, and when that is gone Congress passes another appropriation to finish the job. That has been done not once but several times. In other words, the Government yard has absolutely no responsibility to live up to. If any material change in the prices of materials or of labor comes to pass, the Government simply uses up the money at hand and then asks for more. If a Government yard, on the other hand, completed a ship, even with all these advantages, at less than the bid, such an event would be heralded broadcast as a triumph of Government ownership. But such a contingency has never arisen in the history of Government shipbuilding.

Secretary Daniels a year ago made a ruling whereby certain indirect charges which had been borne on the ship should thereafter be carried on other accounts. This served to make the competition more difficult for the private yard, but in the long run Uncle Sam must pay in one form if not in another. Why should we as a people "fool ourselves" about these things? Why should we debate over what Government ownership means and question whether it pays or not? Only one experience ever goes on the records in postal operations or in shipbuilding or anything else.

Another big factor in the competition is the Government's total lack of responsibility for completing a ship within a prescribed time. But a private yard must measure all these things very minutely, for every day of delay costs it a penalty. Two private bidders in the case under review offered to construct either ship in 34 months. The Mare Island Yard offered to construct one in 31 months after receipt of structural material, the Philadelphia Navy Yard in 36 months after awarding of contract for structural material, and the New York Navy Yard in the same time as the Philadelphia. But if past performances carry any lesson, none of these Government yards has any intention of fulfilling its contract within the time limit which it proposes. These estimates by the navy yards as to time of completion are misleading, because they hinge on the delivery of structural steel, an entirely unknown quantity under present market conditions, and will result in at least a year's being added to the promised time of completion.

The colliers constructed at the Government's Mare Island Yard took nearly twice as long to build as did similar ships at the Maryland Steel Co., in Baltimore. The battleships California, Mississippi, and Idaho, for which contracts were let in 1914, afford examples of the contrast. The Idaho, building at the New York Shipbuilding Co. on November 1 was 45 per cent complete. The Mississippi, building at the Newport News Co., was 33.1 per cent complete. Now, see the difference. The California, building at the New York Navy Yard, had not been yet begun, nor had the materials which are to go into her been assembled. And yet a year has passed.

Last December the department let contracts for six torpedo-boat destroyers. Nos. 63 and 64, building at Fore River, were on November 1, 61.1 and 57.5 per cent, respectively, complete. Nos. 65 and 66, building at the Bath Iron Works, were at the same time 57.5 and 53.8 per cent complete. No. 67, building at Cramps, was 34.1 per cent complete.

Now, listen: And No. 68, building at Uncle Sam's Mare Island, was 12.5 per cent complete.

Perhaps Boston people will recall that in the municipal election here two years ago a supply ship which various politicians were attempting to secure for the Charlestown Navy Yard played a prominent part. In the end, when the contract was let, Mr. Curley, then a candidate for mayor, and every other Democratic politician in Boston at once claimed the honor of having brought it here. This ship is now but 31.1 per cent completed. At a private yard she would have been put into commission long ago. The same is true of a transport now building at the Philadelphia Navy Yard, which is only 36.1 per cent completed. Of the last four submarine contracts, three went to the Electric Boat Co. and one to the Portsmouth Navy Yard. On November 1, L–9 was 86.4 per cent complete, L–10 was 83.9 per cent complete, and L–11 was 80.3 per cent complete. Now comes the other: L–12, at Uncle Sam's Portsmouth Yard, was but 56.2 per cent complete, and practically no work had been done on her engines, a long and costly undertaking. And yet in all these things time is of the highest importance.

Preparedness is in the air. Do we really want it? If so, we must abandon all this Government-ownership folly and trust to the enlightened efficiency of private enterprise under the spur of real competition. If we want a supply ship, we should build her under conditions of demonstrated capacity; if we want to provide wages and contracts under the conditions that professional politics decree, we should hug to Government ownership and pretend to believe that Secretary Daniels could actually get ships built more economically in Uncle Sam's own yards. But if we want truth and reality in this world of ours, we should dismiss these conclusions which Josephus reaches as the sheerest nonsense, unworthy of a moment's consideration by any intelligent human being.

During the delivery of Mr. WEEKS's speech,

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey in the chair). The Senator from Massachusetts will desist for a moment. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. A bill (H. R. 408) to provide for the development of water power and the use of public lands in relation thereto, and for other purposes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Massachusetts will proceed.

After the conclusion of Mr. WEEKS's speech,

PUGET SOUND NAVY YARD.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, the other day, on the call of the calendar, the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. OVERMAN] objected to the consideration of the bill (S. 4505) appropriating money to equip Puget Sound Navy Yard for battleship construction. He has since informed me that he desires to withdraw his objection; and as it is a matter of pressing importance, I ask for the consideration of the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Washington?

Mr. MYERS. Before I determine whether I shall object or not I will ask the Senator what the bill is?

Mr. POINDEXTER. It is a bill to equip the Puget Sound Navy Yard to build battleships.

Mr. MYERS. Will it lead to any debate?

Mr. POINDEXTER. I hope not. I think not. It is a matter which has been thoroughly considered by the Navy Department and by the committee.

Mr. MYERS. How long does the Senator think it will take?

Mr. POINDEXTER. I am asking unanimous consent for its consideration. It ought not to take more than a few moments.

Mr. MYERS. If the request is granted, in order to protect the parliamentary status of the unfinished business, I ask unanimous consent that the unfinished business may be temporarily laid aside only until the disposition of this bill, and not longer than one hour at the most.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to that course?

Mr. SHAFROTH. We would like to hear the bill read, so as to see what it is.

Mr. MYERS. Consent has not been granted yet.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the Secretary will read the bill.

Mr. MYERS. My request about the unfinished business has not been granted?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to temporarily laying aside the unfinished business?

Mr. MYERS. For not longer than one hour; and if the discussion on the bill which the Senator from Washington brings up lasts less than one hour, then until that bill is disposed of.

Mr. THOMAS. Reserving the right to object, I should like to hear what the bill is.

Mr. MYERS. I will state to the Senator from Colorado that my request has not yet been granted to temporarily lay aside the unfinished business.

Mr. THOMAS. I am not waiving my right to object, but I should like to have the bill read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the bill will be read.

The SECRETARY. A bill (S. 4505) appropriating money to equip Puget Sound Navy Yard for battleship construction, reported favorably from the Committee on Naval Affairs. It reads as follows——

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, I do not know that I would have any objection to that bill upon its merits when it comes up in its regular order; but all navy yards, military posts, and everything else have become now a part of a common scheme, to express it in modern slang, of preparedness, although I have never known why we should not use the word "preparation" for "preparedness." I do not think I am willing to have that bill taken up out of its order.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Mississippi yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I am reserving the right to object, and I yield to the Senator.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I hope the Senator from Mississippi will not insist upon his objection after he hears an explanation of the need for the passage of the bill.

We have on the Pacific coast no facilities for the construction of battleships. At Mare Island Navy Yard, in California, provision was made for constructing ships, but it is not accessible to battleships on account of the lack of depth of water.

The report on this bill shows the recommendation of every naval officer who testified before the Committee on Naval Affairs in the House to the effect that this is the only navy yard in the United States which requires no artificial dredging to enable a battleship to approach its building slip and its dock.

Mr. WILLIAMS. If the Senator will pardon me, has the bill passed the House?

Mr. POINDEXTER. It has not.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Has it the unanimous indorsement of the Naval Affairs Committee of the Senate?

Mr. POINDEXTER. It has met the unanimous indorsement of every member of the committee who was present and who could be reached.

Mr. WILLIAMS. And a quorum was present?

Mr. POINDEXTER. Oh, yes.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, still reserving the right to object, I want to take about three minutes to make a general observation. It strikes me that the American people have managed somehow or other through the Navy Department and through the War Department to accumulate a whole lot of unnecessary naval stations and a whole lot of unnecessary military posts of one sort and another. It strikes me as though they were divided out among the States according to senatorial and congressional courtesy and not in accordance with the demand for preparation of the Army and Navy for actual fighting, if actual fighting should be necessary. I, for one, think that one way of raising revenue for the Government will be to decrease, destroy, annihilate, do away with a whole lot of these unnecessary military posts and a whole lot of these unnecessary naval stations.

However, considering the condition of the Pacific slope and considering the fact which the Senator from Washington has mentioned, that the entrance to Mare Island has not sufficient depth to carry a 30-foot battleship in or out, and the fact that we ought to have some place on the Pacific coast where that objection would not lie, I shall not object to the consideration of the bill; but I give notice now that I am going to fight these congressional and senatorial military posts and naval stations all over the United States wherever I find them, for they are either unnecessary or absolutely harmful. Most of the military posts are absolutely harmful, because they divide our posts into little bits of units instead of enabling them to be concentrated not only for regimental but for brigade and division drill.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Mississippi yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I yield to the Senator from South Carolina.

Mr. TILLMAN. I want to say to the Senator from Mississippi that this bill has the approval of the Secretary of the Navy, who urges it. He knows the defenseless condition of the Pacific coast and he wants to have facilities provided to take care of our battleships whenever they may need attention on that coast.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I just this moment said that I would not object to the consideration of this bill——

Mr. TILLMAN. Very well, then.

Mr. WILLIAMS. But I wanted to take advantage of this opportunity to give notice that I would object to measures being brought forward under this guise merely to make politics in some States.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request?

Mr. MYERS. Before any order is made I want it understood, if unanimous consent is given, that it is with the condition that the unfinished business shall be laid aside temporarily only till 3.30 o'clock, to be taken up at that hour, or sooner, if the bill brought up by the Senator from Washington shall be disposed of before that hour; but that the unfinished business shall be taken up in any event not later than 3.30 o'clock. I want that added to the unanimous consent agreement.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request for unanimous consent to lay aside temporarily the water-power bill in order that the Senate may proceed to the consideration of the bill of the Senator from Washington?

Mr. MYERS. On the terms I have stated.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The understanding being that at 3.30 o'clock the power bill shall have the right of way.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. 4505) appropriating money to equip Puget Sound Navy Yard for battleship construction.

The Secretary read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That for building slip, equipment for shop fitters' shop, shop, and plant tools equipment at the Puget Sound Navy Yard, there is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, $2,065,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I inquire how much is to be appropriated?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will state the amount.

The Secretary read as follows:

There is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, $2,065,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Oh, is that all? [Laughter.]

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, and read the third time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is, Shall the bill pass?

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, it does seem to me that a bill of this kind ought not to be considered when there are so few Senators present. It seems to me the Senator ought to ask consent for the consideration of the bill in the morning hour, when there are a greater number of Senators present, or else that there should be a call of the Senate, to give all Senators a chance to be present in the event that there is any objection to the bill. It does not seem to me to be exactly right to call up a bill of this kind when there are so few Senators present. Some Senator may be interested in the bill and may desire to make objection. I will ask the Senator from Washington whether he knows of any Senator who has any objection whatever to the bill?

Mr. POINDEXTER. I do not know of any Senator who has any objection to it; on the contrary, every Senator who has expressed any opinion upon it, so far as I know at all, has expressly been in favor of it. The Senator from North Carolina [Mr. OVERMAN] objected to it upon the regular call of the calendar, but has since advised me that he did not understand the bill at that time; that he is in favor of it and wants to withdraw his objection.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I am not going to make objection, although I do think that a bill appropriating over $2,000,000 should be called up in the morning hour, when Senators are at least supposed to be here.

Mr. POINDEXTER. This is as near the morning hour, Mr. President, as we have been able to get.

Mr. SHAFROTH. But there are very few Senators present. That is the reason I made the suggestion.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is, Shall the bill pass?

The bill was passed.

WATER-POWER SITES.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 408) to provide for the development of water power and the use of public lands in relation thereto, and for other purposes.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, I will resume my discussion of this bill and I prefer not to be interrupted during the remainder of my remarks. If not interrupted I think I can finish in 10 or 15 minutes. If I yield to interruptions, I will be on the floor all day and then will not get through. I begin by reading a newspaper clipping which has been handed me and which goes to show the need for some provision in this country for the fixation of atmospheric nitrogen. It is printed as a telegram in a Seattle daily paper, and is as follows:

TACOMA, Thursday, March 9.

From $18,000 to $20,000 a day for 12 large freighters of the American-Hawaiian Line is said here to-day to be the offer made by the Du Pont Powder Co. for the use of the vessels in carrying nitrates from Chile to New York.

The rate is said to be from $1,500 to $1,700 a day each for the dozen freighters.

The Baja California and Sinaloa, which are making regular trips to this port with nitrates, are said to be under contract to the powder company, but the two are only able to keep the local plant of the powder company supplied.

That shows as decidedly as anything that has been said or read here, I think, the necessity in this country of some provision for the fixation of atmospheric nitrogen for our use. If that were provided for in this country, our nitrates would not all have to be brought from Chile at excessive transportation charges.

I have a number of other newspaper articles which go to show the necessity for the enactment of legislation of this character, some of them highly commending this particular bill and its provisions. I will not have them inserted in the RECORD now, but later I may ask to do so.

Mr. President, I will resume a brief and hurried explanation of the different sections of this bill. Section 1 I commented upon at some length yesterday. Beginning now with section 2, that section provides for diligent prosecution of work on a project after a lease for a power site has been let, and for the steady operation of a plant after its completion. Its effect is to provide against any unnecessary and unwarranted delay in the completion of a project or closing down of the plant after completion and withdrawal of its product from the market.

Section 3 very properly provides that all power developed which may be transmitted from one State into another shall be the subject of interstate-commerce control and that it shall be subject to the regulation of the Interstate Commerce Commission, which is the proper tribunal to have jurisdiction of such a matter.

Section 4 provides that in the case of a successor in interest or an assignee of any lease taking hold of a project it shall remain subject to all of the provisions of this measure, which is a proper matter of precaution.

Section 5 is the recapture clause, and provides that the Government may, upon certain terms and conditions, take over the property at the end of 50 years; and that if at the end of 50 years the Government does not take the property over, and the original lessee does not have his lease renewed, the land may be let to a new lessee.

Section 7 provides for letting contracts under certain conditions in excess of the 50-year period of the life of the lease. It is recognized that near the end of the 50-year term of the lease there may be necessity for letting a contract which would run a considerable length of time beyond the life of the lease. The bill as it came from the House provided for contracts under certain conditions to exceed the life of the lease for 20 years; the Senate committee made it 25 years, but by subsequent amendment struck out the limitation of time altogether and provided what the committee deems wiser—that under certain conditions such contracts may be let for a period of time beyond the life of the lease; but in order to do that, if the contract is to be let for use or execution in a State which has a public-service commission or a similar authority, both the approval of the public-service commission of the State and of the Secretary of the Interior must be obtained. If it be in a Territory or a State not having a public-service commission, then the approval of the Secretary of the Interior alone must be obtained. So no contract of that character may be entered into by the lessee without first having the approval of the Secretary of the Interior—that is absolutely provided—and if in a State having a public-service commission, then, in addition, the approval of the public-service commission of the State is required, which the committee thought a sufficient safeguard on contracts of that kind.

Section 8 makes what I think is a very wise provision in this bill. It provides that all of the revenue shall go to the State in which the project is located; that half of it shall go directly to the State, for such use as the State may see fit to make of it; that the other half shall go into the reclamation fund, and upon being returned from the reclamation fund shall go to the State in which the project is located. So the particular State in which the project is located will ultimately get all of the proceeds from operations under this bill, and the Federal Government claims nothing at all.

Section 9 provides that land which is covered by lease for water-power sites may under certain conditions be disposed of for other uses, subject to the paramount and the prior use as a power site.

Section 10 contains the very necessary provision that the Secretary of the Interior shall at all times have the right to examine the books and accounts of lessees and require them to submit statements, representations, or reports under oath. This is necessary in order to determine the amount of power developed and in order to fix the amount of compensation for the land leased.

Section 11 provides for the forfeiture of the lease under certain conditions and upon certain grounds therein set forth.

Section 12 authorizes the Secretary of the Interior to make rules for carrying into effect the provisions of this act, which is very necessary.

Section 13 is the section which provides in express terms that nothing in this act is to be intended to affect or shall be construed as affecting or in any way interfering with the laws of any State relating to the control, appropriation, use, or distribution of the waters of that State.

Section 14 provides that those who have hydroelectric power plants on public lands or transmission lines across public lands under existing laws or laws heretofore in force may, if they shall see fit, surrender the rights which they now hold and may come under the provisions of this bill.

Section 15 provides that nothing in the act shall apply to navigation dams or structures under the jurisdiction of the Secretary of War or the Chief of Engineers.

Section 16 is, I think, a very necessary and essential provision. It provides "that in instances where only 10 per cent or less of the lands actually necessary and required for the construction, maintenance, and operation of dams, water conduits, reservoirs, power houses, transmission lines, and other works for the development, generation, transmission, and utilization of hydroelectric power" is on Government land, and the land is "to be used only for overflowage, reservoir, or transmission purposes and not in whole or in part as a dam site or the site of a power house nor for the erection of buildings or operation of machinery," it shall be in the discretion of the Secretary of the Interior, if the applicant so elects, to waive any or all of the provisions of this bill and make such a lease of the Government land involved as he may deem just. That is believed to be a wise and prudent provision. There may be projects where only a negligible quantity of public lands will be involved; perhaps 1 or 2 acres, or half an acre, for overflowage or transmission or other minor uses. In a case of that kind it might not be fair or right to require the lessee to come under all of the provisions of this act, the same as if all the plant or the major portion of it were on public lands. It is left to the discretion of the Secretary of the Interior; he may or he may not require it, as he may see fit; and I think it may well be left to his discretion.

Sections 17 and 18 were inserted at the request of Senators from Colorado and New Mexico. The committee believes that they embrace subjects proper and appropriate to be dealt with in this bill; that they are germane to the nature of the bill; and the committee has no objection to their being incorporated in the bill.

Section 19 provides for subjecting a project to an enlarged use, by a party other than the owner, under certain terms and conditions, or to uses other than those for which it was first intended. While novel, the committee has adopted some amendments since the section was originally agreed to, which amendments appear to fairly well safeguard the section.

The purpose of this bill is to provide for the development of water power on the public lands, with due regard to the interests not only of the Federal Government but State governments and all who may be affected by such legislation. Water-power legislation should provide for the fair treatment of water-power companies to the end that they may be able to furnish the full measure of service with reasonable returns for the risks assumed; the protection of the investor to the end that the capital placed in the enterprise may receive fair interest and be held intact; the satisfaction of the local public dependent upon the power system that it may have good service at fair prices; the safeguarding of the rights of the general public that its property may be held intact and that the natural resources involved may not be wasted or destroyed; the recognition of the right of the State to control its own property and local affairs; and the retention by the United States of title to its water powers to the end that they may not be monopolized or misused but shall be put to work for the general welfare.

It is the intention of this measure to accomplish those purposes. It is believed that the provisions of the measure fairly well accomplish them. The committee has bestowed much labor upon it to that end. I have now spoken upon this bill the greater part of two days, and with this I submit it to the Senate for its consideration and ask for the passage of the bill.

PROHIBITION IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. THOMAS in the chair). The Senator from Texas.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President, for the information of the Senate, I desire to submit an explanation of the bill (S. 1082) for prohibition in the District of Columbia and of certain amendments which I shall propose at the proper time. At this point I desire to set out in the RECORD the bill as originally reported from the Committee on the District of Columbia.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. In the absence of objection, that will be done.

The bill referred to is as follows:

A bill (S. 1082) to prevent the manufacture and sale of alcoholic liquors in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes.

Be it enacted, etc., That on and after the 1st day of November, A. D. 1916, no person or persons, or any house, company, association, club, or corporation, his, its, or their agents, officers, clerks, or servants, directly or indirectly, in the District of Columbia shall manufacture, store, or deposit, sell, offer for sale, keep for sale, traffic in, barter, or exchange for goods or merchandise, or solicit or receive orders for the purchase of any alcoholic liquors, give away the same, or import the same therein, except as hereinafter provided.

Wherever the term "alcoholic liquors" is used in this act it shall be deemed to include whisky, brandy, rum, gin, wine, ale, porter, beer, cordials, hard or fermented cider, alcoholic bitters, pure grain alcohol, and all malt and other liquors which shall contain one-half of 1 per cent by volume of alcohol or more.

That any person or persons, or any house, company, association, club, or corporation, his, its, or their agents, officers, clerks, or servants, who shall, directly or indirectly, violate the provisions of this section shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon conviction thereof shall be fined not less than $300 nor more than $1,000, and shall be imprisoned in the District jail or workhouse for a period of not less than 30 days nor more than one year for each offense.

SEC. 2. The provisions of this act shall not be construed to prevent the manufacture, importation, or sale of denatured or wood alcohol for scientific or mechanical purposes, or the sale by wholesale druggists only of pure grain alcohol for scientific or mechanical purposes only, in quantities not to exceed 5 gallons at one time; but no such sale of alcohol shall be made any person who is less than 21 years of age or who is of intemperate habits, or who is addicted to the use of narcotic drugs; and every purchaser shall at the time and place of such sale make an affidavit in writing, signed by himself before such druggist or registered pharmacist at the time and place in the employ of such druggist, stating the quantity and the time and place, and fully for what purpose, and by whom such alcohol is to be used; that affiant is not of intemperate habits or addicted to the use of any narcotic drug, and that such alcohol is not to be used as a beverage or for any purpose other than that stated in said affidavit. Such affidavit shall be filed and preserved by such druggist and be subject to public inspection during business hours, and a record thereof made by such druggist in a record book kept for the purpose, showing the date of the affidavit, by whom made, the quantity of such alcohol, and when, where, for what purpose, and by whom to be used. Only one sale shall be made upon such affidavit, and in no greater quantity than is therein specified. For the purpose of this act any druggist or registered pharmacist making such sale shall have authority to administer such oath.

SEC. 3. If any wholesale druggist, owner of a wholesale drug store, registered pharmacist, clerk, or other employee of such store shall, upon such affidavit, or otherwise, sell or give away such alcohol to any person who is known to him to be of intemperate habits or is addicted to the use of any narcotic drug, or sell or give the same to anyone to be used for any purpose other than that named in said affidavit he shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and if convicted punished by fine of not less than $100 nor more than $500 and be confined in the District jail or workhouse not less than 30 days nor more than six months. In any prosecution against a wholesale druggist, owner of a wholesale drug store, registered pharmacist, clerk, or employee, for selling or giving liquor contrary to law, if a sale or gift be proven, it shall be presumed that the same was unlawful in the absence of satisfactory proof to the contrary, and the presentation of such affidavit by the defendant at the time of the trial for such sale or gift shall be sufficient to rebut the presumption arising from the proof of such sale or gift: Provided, That such druggist, owner of a drug store, registered pharmacist, clerk, or employee shall have complied with all other provisions of this act relating to a sale or gift.

SEC. 4. If any person who is of intemperate habits or addicted to the use of any narcotic drug shall make the affidavit mentioned in section 2 of this act, or if any person making such affidavit shall use as a beverage, or for any purpose, or at any place, other than that stated in such affidavit, or shall knowingly permit another to do so, said alcohol, or any part thereof, or shall knowingly make any false statement in such affidavit, he shall be guilty of a misdemeanor and upon conviction be punished by a fine of not less than $100 nor more than $500, or be confined in the District jail or workhouse not less than one nor more than six months for the first offense hereunder; and upon conviction for a second offense he shall be punished by a fine of not less than $200 nor more than $1,000, and shall be confined in the District jail or workhouse for not less than six months.

SEC. 5. Wholesale druggists desiring to deal in alcohol for scientific or mechanical purposes, as heretofore provided, shall, on or before the 1st day of November of each year, obtain a license from the Commissioners of the District of Columbia for the year beginning November 1, upon the payment of $25, which money shall be deposited with other license funds of the District. The said commissioners shall make necessary regulations governing the purchase and sale of alcohol by wholesale druggists in accordance with this act, and shall limit the number of licenses to wholesale druggists to not more than five, and may consider petitions for or protests against the granting of such licenses.

SEC. 6. That when any wholesale druggist, licensed as provided in the previous section, desires to sell or keep for sale pure grain alcohol, or when any minister, pastor, or priest of a religious congregation or church desires wine for sacramental purposes in the usual religious exercises of his denomination, or when any ambassador or minister of a foreign country duly credited to the United States of America and maintaining an official residence in the District of Columbia desires alcoholic liquors for use in such residence, and for no other purpose, he may apply to the Commissioners of the District of Columbia for a permit, stating the amount desired, for what period and for what purpose, and said commissioners, if satisfied of the good faith of the application, shall grant a written permit to the applicant permitting the shipment to him of such amount as is shown to be reasonably necessary, which amount shall be stated in the permit, together with the purpose for which it is to be used, and in the case of wine the period to be covered by such use: Provided, That the amount of wine permitted to be shipped shall not exceed 5 gallons at one time, and in case of shipment of either alcohol or wine said permit shall be attached to the package by the shipper and remain attached until delivered to the consignee. The fee for issuing said permit shall be 25 cents, paid to the collector of taxes for the District of Columbia. Said permit shall be void after 20 days from date, and shall not be used for more than one shipment. The carrier or party making delivery shall keep a record of all such deliveries of wine for said purposes, which record shall, during business hours, be open to public inspection.

SEC. 7. That it shall be unlawful for any common or other carrier, express company, or any person to deliver to any person, company, corporation, club, or association or order, his or its agents, clerks, or employees, any prohibited alcoholic liquors in the District of Columbia, knowing the same to be such, and in the case of legal shipments of alcohol or wine, as provided in section 6 of this act, it shall be unlawful to deliver the same, whether brought from without the District of Columbia, or otherwise, or whether in original packages or otherwise, on any Sunday or on any other day before 6 o'clock antemeridian and after 5 o'clock postmeridian. Any common or other carrier, express company, or any person violating the provisions of this section shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon conviction thereof shall be punished by a fine of not less than $100 or more than $500, or be confined in the District jail or workhouse not less than one nor more than six months, or by both fine and imprisonment in the discretion of the court.

SEC. 8. That every person who shall directly or indirectly keep or maintain by himself or by associating with others, or who shall in any manner aid, assist, or abet in keeping or maintaining any clubhouse or other place in which any alcoholic liquor is received or kept for the purpose of use, gift, barter, or sale, or for distribution or division among the members of any club or association by any means whatsoever, or who shall maintain what is commonly known as the "locker system" or other device for evading the provisions of this act, and every person who shall use, barter, sell, or give away, or assist or abet in bartering, selling, or giving away any liquors so received or kept, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon conviction thereof be subject to the penalties prescribed in section 1 of this act; and in all cases the members, shareholders, associates, or employees in any club or association mentioned in this section shall be competent witnesses to prove any violations of the provisions of this section of this act, or of any fact tending thereto; and no person shall be excused from testifying as to any offense committed by another against any of the provisions of this act by reason of his testimony tending to criminate himself, but the testimony given by such person shall in no case be used against him.

The keeping or giving away of alcoholic liquors, or any schemes or devices whatever to evade the provisions of this act shall be deemed as unlawful selling within the provisions of this act.

SEC. 9. That is any person shall advertise or give notice by signs, billboards, newspapers, periodicals, or otherwise for himself or another the manufacturer, offering for sale, or keeping for sale of alcoholic liquors prohibited under this act, or shall circulate or distribute any price list, circulars, or order blanks advertising such liquors, or publish any newspaper, magazine, periodical, or other written or printed paper in which such advertisements of liquors appear, or shall permit to be posted upon his premises or premises under his control (including billboards) or shall permit the same to so remain upon such premises, he shall be guilty of a misdemeanor and be fined not less than $100 nor more than $500.

SEC. 10. That if one or more persons who are competent witnesses shall charge, on oath or affirmation before the corporation counsel of the District of Columbia or any of his assistants duly authorized to act for him, presenting that any person, company, copartnership, association, club, or corporation has or have violated or is violating the provisions of this act by manufacturing, storing or depositing, offering for sale, keeping for sale or use, trafficking in, bartering, exchanging for goods, giving away, or otherwise furnishing alcoholic liquor, shall request said corporation counsel or any of his assistants duly authorized to act for him to issue a warrant, said attorney or any of his assistants shall issue such warrant, in which warrant the room, house, building or other place in which the violation is alleged to have occurred or is occurring shall be specifically described, and said warrant shall be placed in the hands of the captain or acting captain of the police precinct in which the room, house, building, or other place above referred to is located, commanding him to at once thoroughly search said described room, house, building, or other place, and the appurtenances thereof, and if any such be found to take into his possession and safely keep, to be produced as evidence when required, all alcoholic liquors and all the means of dispensing the same, also all the paraphernalia or part of the paraphernalia of a barrom or other alcoholic liquor establishment, and any United States internal-revenue tax receipt or certificate for the manufacture or sale of alcoholic liquor effective for the period of time covering the alleged offense, and forthwith report all the facts to the corporation counsel of the District of Columbia, and such alcoholic liquor or the means for dispensing same, or the paraphernalia of a barroom or other alcoholic liquor establishment, or any United States internal-revenue tax receipt or certificate for the sale of alcoholic liquor effective as aforesaid, shall be prima facie evidence of the violation of the provisions of this act.

SEC. 11. That it shall not be necessary, in order to convict any person, company, house, association, club, or corporation, his, its, or their agents, officers, clerks, or servants of manufacturing, importing, or selling alcoholic liquors, to prove the actual manufacture, importing, sale, delivery of, or payment for any alcoholic liquors, but the evidence of having or keeping them in hand, stored or deposited, taking orders for, or offering to sell or barter, or exchanging them for goods or merchandise, or giving them away, shall be sufficient to convict; nor shall it be necessary in a warrant or information to specify the particular kind of alcoholic liquor which is made the subject of a charge of violation of this act.

SEC. 12. That any person who shall, in the District of Columbia, in any street, or public or private road, alley, or in any public place or building or in or upon any street car, or railroad passenger train, or in or upon any other vehicle commonly used for the transportation of passengers, or in or about any depot, platform, or waiting station, drink any alcoholic liquor of any kind, or if any person shall be drunk or intoxicated in any street, alley, or public or private road or in any railroad passenger train, street car, or any public place or building, or at any public gathering, or if any person shall be drunk or intoxicated and shall disturb the peace of any person anywhere, he shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon conviction thereof shall be punished by a fine of not less than $10 nor more than $100, or by imprisonment for not less than 5 days nor more than 30 days in the workhouse or jail of the District of Columbia, or by both such fine and imprisonment.

SEC. 13. The payment of the special tax required of wholesale or retail liquor dealers by the United States by any person or persons other than wholesale druggists licensed under section 5 of this act, within the District of Columbia, shall be prima facie evidence that such person or persons are engaged in keeping and selling, offering and exposing for sale alcoholic liquors contrary to the provisions of this act, and a certificate from the collector of internal revenue, his agents, clerks, or deputies showing the payment of such tax, and the name or names of person to whom issued, and the names of the person or persons, if any, associated with the person to whom such tax receipt is issued, shall be sufficient evidence of the payment of such tax and of the association of such persons for the selling and keeping, offering and exposing for sale of liquors contrary to the provisions of this act in all trials or legal inquiries.

SEC. 14. All houses, boathouses, buildings, club rooms, and places of every description, including drug stores, where alcoholic liquors are manufactured, stored, sold, or vended, given away, or furnished contrary to law (including those in which clubs, orders, or associations sell, barter, give away, distribute, or dispense intoxicating liquors to their members, by any means or device whatever, as provided in section 8 of this act) shall be held, taken, and deemed common and public nuisances. And any person who shall maintain, or shall aid or abet, or knowingly be associated with others in maintaining such common and public nuisance, shall be guilty of a misdemeanor and upon conviction thereof shall be subject to the penalties prescribed in section 1 of this act, and judgment shall be given that such house, building, or other place, or any room therein, be abated or closed up as a place for the sale or keeping such liquor contrary to law, as the court may determine.

SEC. 15. The United States district attorney for the District of Columbia, or any citizen of the District of Columbia, may maintain an action in equity in the name of the United States to abate and perpetually enjoin such a nuisance as defined in the preceding section. The injunction shall be granted at the commencement of the action, and no bond shall be required. Any person violating the terms of any injunction granted in such proceedings shall be punished for contempt by a fine of not less than $100 nor more than $500 and by imprisonment in the District jail or workhouse for not less than 30 days nor more than 6 months, in the discretion of the court.

SEC. 16. That when any violation of this act is threatened, or shall have occurred, or is occurring, the doing of, or the continuance or repetition of the unlawful act, or any of like kind by the offending party may be prevented by a writ of injunction out of a court of equity upon a bill filed in all respects as in cases of liquor nuisances; in like manner the writ of injunction may be employed to compel obedience to any provision of this act.

SEC. 17. If a tenant of a building or tenement uses such premises, or any part thereof, in maintaining a common nuisance as hereinbefore defined, or knowingly permits such use by another, such use shall render void the lease under which he holds, and shall cause the right of possession to revert to the owner or lessor, who may, without process of law, make immediate entry upon the premises, or may avail himself of the remedy provided for the forcible detention thereof.

SEC. 18. Anyone who knowingly permits any building owned or leased by him or under his control, or any part thereof, to be used in maintaining a common nuisance hereinbefore described in section 14 of this act, after being notified in writing of such use, neglects to take all reasonable measures to eject therefrom the person so using the same, shall be deemed guilty of assisting in maintaining such nuisance.

SEC. 19. That no property rights of any kind shall exist in alcoholic liquors or beverages illegally manufactured, received, possessed, or stored under this act, and in all such cases the liquors are forfeited to the District of Columbia and may be searched for and seized and ordered to be destroyed by the court after a conviction when such liquors have been seized for use as evidence, or upon satisfactory evidence to the court presented by the corporation counsel that such liquors are contraband.

SEC. 20. Every wife, child, parent, guardian, or employer, or other person who shall be injured in person or property or means of support by any intoxicated person, or in consequence of intoxication, habitual or otherwise, of any person, such wife, child, parent, or guardian shall have a right of action, in his or her own name, against any person who shall, by selling, bartering, or giving intoxicating liquors, have caused the intoxication of such person, for all damages actually sustained, as well as for exemplary damages; and a married woman shall have the right to bring suit, prosecute, and control the same, and the amount recovered the same as if unmarried; and all damages recovered by a minor under this act shall be paid either to such minor or to his or her parents, guardian, or next friend, as the court shall direct.

SEC. 21. If any person while in charge of a locomotive engine, or while acting as a conductor or brakeman of a car or train of cars, or while in charge of any street car, steamboat, launch, or other water craft, or while in charge of or operating any automobile or horse vehicle in the District of Columbia, shall be intoxicated, he shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and if convicted shall be punished by a fine of not less than $25 nor more than $300, and in default in payment of said fine shall be imprisoned in the District jail or workhouse for not exceeding three months, or both fine and imprisonment, in the discretion of the court.

SEC. 22. It shall be the duty of the Commissioners of the District of Columbia to enforce the provisions of this act. They shall detail qualified members of the police force to detect violations of the act, if any, and to report promptly all knowledge or information they may have concerning such violations, together with the names of any witnesses by whom they may be proven to the corporation counsel; but it shall be the duty of all members of the police force to detect violations of the act and to promptly report any information or knowledge concerning the same to the corporation counsel, together with the names of witnesses, by whom such violations may be proven; and the corporation counsel shall bring such alleged violators of the law to trial with all due diligence.

If any such officer shall fail to comply with the provisions of this section, he shall upon conviction be fined in any sum not less than $100 nor more than $500; and such conviction shall be a forfeiture of the office held by such person, and the court before whom such conviction is had shall in addition to imposition of the fine aforesaid order and adjudge the forfeiture of his said office. For a failure or neglect of official duty in the enforcement of this act any official herein referred to may be removed by court action.

SEC. 23. That prosecutions for violations of the provisions of this act shall be on information filed in the police court by the corporation counsel of the District of Columbia or any of his assistants duly authorized to act for him, and said corporation counsel or his assistants shall file such information upon the presentation to him or his assistants of sworn information that the law has been violated; and such corporation counsel and his assistants shall have power to administer oaths to such informant or informants, and such others as present themselves, and anyone making a false oath to any material fact shall be deemed guilty of perjury and subject to the same penalties as now provided by law for such offense.

When, however, it appears to the Commissioners of the District of Columbia that it will be in the interest of more effective enforcement of the provisions of this act, they may request the United States district attorney for the District of Columbia to prosecute persons charged with offenses against the law, and when so requested by said commissioners the said district attorney shall proceed before the grand jury and in the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia to prosecute such offenders in manner now prescribed by law for the prosecution of persons charged with violations of the laws against crime in the District of Columbia.

SEC. 24. That if for any reason any section, paragraph, provision, clause, or part of this act shall be held unconstitutional or invalid, that fact shall not affect or destroy any other section, paragraph, provision, clause, or part of the act not in and of itself invalid, but the remaining parts of sections shall be enforced without regard to that so invalidated.

SEC. 25. That in the interpretation of this act words of the singular number shall be deemed to include their plurals, and words of the masculine gender shall be deemed to include the feminine, as the case may be.

SEC. 26. That this act shall be in full force and effect on and after the 1st day of November, 1916, and all laws and parts of laws inconsistent herewith be, and they are hereby, repealed.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President, the bill in its present form aims at the personal use of alcoholic and other prohibited liquors as well as their manufacture and sale. On further consideration it has been deemed best to omit in this initial act the personal-use feature. The principal purpose of the bill is to abolish the saloon, one of the chief menaces of humanity. If after the enactment of the pending bill in its amended form conditions developing with its operation should demand further legislation, it will be promptly proposed.

Accordingly section 1 of the present bill is to be amended by striking out the word "store," in line 7, the words "or deposit," in line 8, by adding after the word "alcoholic," in line 10, the words "or other prohibited," and by striking out the remainder of line 10 after the word "liquors" and all of lines 11 and 12, the part stricken out reading as follows: "give away the same, or import the same therein, except as hereinafter provided," and inserting in lieu of the part thus stricken out the following: "for beverage purposes or for any other than scientific, medicinal, pharmaceutical, mechanical, sacramental, or other nonbeverage purposes."

This section is to be further amended by striking out the words "pure grain," in line 4, page 2, and inserting in lieu thereof the word "ethyl," by striking out the remainder of line 4 after the word "alcohol" and all of lines 5 and 6 and inserting the words "all malt and all other alcoholic liquors."

The section as amended will read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That on an after the 1st day of November, A. D. 1916, no person or persons, or any house, company, association, club, or corporation, his, its, or their agents, officers, clerks, or servants, directly or indirectly, in the District of Columbia shall manufacture, sell, offer for sale, keep for sale, traffic in, barter, or exchange for goods or merchandise, or solicit or receive orders for the purchase of any alcoholic or other prohibited liquors for beverage purposes or for any other purposes than scientific, medicinal, pharmaceutical, mechanical, sacramental, or other nonbeverage purposes.

Wherever the term "alcoholic liquors" is used in this act, it shall be deemed to include whisky, brandy, rum, gin, wine, ale, porter, beer, cordials, hard or fermented cider, alcoholic bitters, ethyl alcohol, all malt liquors, and all other alcoholic liquors.

That any person of persons, or any house, company, association, club, or corporation, his, its, or their agents, officers, clerks, or servants, who shall, directly or indirectly, violate the provisions of this section shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon conviction thereof shall be fined not less than $300 nor more than $1,000 and shall be imprisoned in the District jail or workhouse for a period of not less than 30 days nor more than 1 year for each offense.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Texas yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. SHEPPARD. I yield.

Mr. BORAH. As I understand, the Senator has proposed an amendment to the original bill so as to eliminate now the question of personal use?

Mr. SHEPPARD. I have; yes, sir.

Mr. BORAH. And the bill as it would operate, if passed, relates simply to the sale of liquor?

Mr. SHEPPARD. To the liquor traffic in the District of Columbia.

Mr. BORAH. The Senator has given much more time to this subject than I have, but there will not be very much gained, it seems to me, by prohibiting saloons in the District of Columbia if they can be found just across the line.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President, the counties which border on the District of Columbia are dry counties.

Mr. BORAH. Is Baltimore a dry county?

Mr. SHEPPARD. The county in which Baltimore is located does not border on the District of Columbia.

Mr. BORAH. No; but it is in very close proximity to it. I doubt if there would be much gained by prohibiting saloons under the peculiar conditions which surround Washington.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President, as I have said, we have deemed it best not to try to accomplish everything in one bill. I will say to the Senator from Idaho that we have thought it best in the initial act to attack first the traffic itself; and, if that measure does not prove satisfactory, others can be brought into operation.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

Mr. SHEPPARD. I yield to the Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. GALLINGER. I understand the Senator is about to propose a large number of amendments, which may or may not be very consequential amendments to the bill. I simply wish to suggest to the Senator that after he has submitted the amendments, I wish he would ask for a reprint of the bill as it would read if the amendments were agreed to.

Mr. SHEPPARD. That is my purpose in speaking now. I am making a detailed explanation of the amendments.

It will be observed that all malt liquors are on the prohibited list and are classed as "alcoholic." This is done because of the ease with which prohibition laws are violated if traffic in malt liquors is permitted. The numerous kinds of "near beers" are familiar instances of such violation. If it is attempted to permit the sale of malt liquors with a small per cent of alcohol or with no alcohol, it has been found by experience that it is almost impossible to adopt any effective system of measurement and inspection. Dealers will include in a case of bottles containing malt liquors a number of bottles with an intoxicating percentage of alcohol, and it has been found extremely difficult to detect them. Since they may be so easily used to defeat the law, it has been thought wise to stop their sale altogether.

In this connection let me quote from a recent decision of the United States Supreme Court the decision in the case of Purity E. & T. Co. against Lynch (226 U. S., 192). The quotation is as follows:

* * * It is also well established that when a State, exerting its recognized authority, undertakes to suppress what it is free to regard as a public evil, it may adopt such measures having reasonable relation to that end as it may deem necessary in order to make its action effective. It does not follow that because a transaction separately considered is innocuous it may not be included in a prohibition the scope of which is regarded as essential in the legislative judgment to accomplish a purpose within the admitted power of the Government. * * * With the wisdom of the exercise of that judgment the court has no concern, and unless it clearly appears that the enactment has no substantial relation to a proper purpose it can not be said that the limit of legislative power has been transcended. To hold otherwise would be to substitute judicial opinion of expediency for the will of the legislature, a notion foreign to our constitutional system. * * * It was competent for the Legislature of Mississippi to recognize the difficulties besetting the administration of laws aimed at the prevention of traffic in intoxicants. It prohibited, among other things, the sale of "malt liquors." In thus dealing with a class of beverages which in general are regarded as intoxicating it was not bound to resort to a discrimination with respect to ingredients and processes of manufacture which, in the endeavor to eliminate innocuous beverages from the condemnation, would facilitate subterfuges and frauds and fetter the enforcement of the law. A contrary conclusion, logically pressed, would save the nominal power while preventing its effective exercise. The statute establishes its own category. The question in this court is whether the legislature had the power to establish it. The existence of this power, as the authorities we have cited abundantly demonstrate, is not to be denied simply because some innocent article or transactions may be found within the prescribed class. The inquiry must be whether, considering the end in view, the statute passes the bounds of reason and assumes the character of a merely arbitrary fiat. That the opinion is extensively held that a general prohibition of the sale of malt liquors, whether intoxicating or not, is a necessary means to the suppression of trade in intoxicants, sufficiently appears from the legislation of other States and the decision of the courts in its construction. * * * We can not say that there is no basis for this widespread conviction. The State, within the limits we have stated, must decide upon the measures that are needful for the protection of its people, and, having regard to the artifices which are used to promote the sale of intoxicants under the guise of innocent beverages, it would constitute an unwarrantable departure from accepted principles to hold that the prohibition of the sale of all malt liquors, including the beverage in question, was beyond its reserved power. * * *

The second section permits the manufacture, importation, and sale without restriction of denatured, or methyl, alcohol. Under the amendments I shall propose it permits also the manufacture, importation, or sale of ethyl alcohol for scientific, medicinal, pharmaceutical, or mechanical purposes, restricting such manufacture and sale within the District, as well as the manufacture and sale of alcoholic liquors for sacramental purposes within the District, to licensed manufacturers and druggists. Moreover, it permits the purchase of alcoholic or other prohibited liquors for medicinal purposes on prescriptions of physicians, under the regulations prescribed in section 3.

The specific amendments intended to be proposed to this section are as follows:

Strike out all of section 2 after lines 15 and 16, page 2, and insert "of methyl alcohol, or of ethyl alcohol for scientific, medicinal, pharmaceutical, or mechanical purposes, nor to prevent the sale of alcoholic or other prohibited liquors by druggists for medicinal purposes on prescriptions of physicians under the regulations set out in section 3 of this act: Provided, That the manufacture and sale of ethyl alcohol or of alcoholic liquors for sacramental purposes within the District of Columbia shall be restricted to manufacturers and druggists licensed, respectively, to make and sell such alcohol, as hereinafter provided, for scientific, mechanical, pharmaceutical, medicinal, or sacramental purposes only."

As amended section 2 will read as follows:

The provisions of this act shall not be construed to prevent the manufacture, importation, or sale of denatured or of methyl alcohol, or of ethyl alcohol for scientific, medicinal, pharmaceutical, or mechanical purposes, nor to prevent the sale of alcoholic or other prohibited liquors by druggists for medicinal purposes on prescriptions of physicians, under the regulations set out in section 3 of this act: Provided, That the manufacture and sale of ethyl alcohol or of alcoholic liquors for sacramental purposes shall be restricted to manufacturers and druggists licensed, respectively, to make and sell such alcohol and alcoholic or other prohibited liquors, as hereinafter provided, for scientific, mechanical, pharmaceutical, medicinal, or sacramental purposes only.

The present provisions of section 2 limiting sale of ethyl or pure grain alcohol to quantities of 5 gallons at one time, by wholesale druggists only, are eliminated, as are the other restrictions on the sale of ethyl alcohol in the section as it now stands.

Section 3 in the present bill is to be stricken out, as it relates to penalties for violation of the eliminated provisions of section 2. This section in its new form practically reenacts the provisions of the present excise law of the District of Columbia relating to the sale of liquors for medicinal purposes on prescriptions of physicians. Compounds, extracts, and proprietary medicines containing alcohol but so medicated as to be unfit for beverages are excepted. The form of prescription is provided, as well as the form of the book in which a description of sales on prescriptions must be kept by druggists. A similar book is also required to be kept by manufacturers and sellers of ethyl alcohol. Penalties are provided. The new section 3 reads as follows:

SEC. 3. That regularly licensed and registered druggists or pharmacists in the District of Columbia shall not sell alcoholic or other prohibited liquors, nor compound nor mix any composition thereof, nor sell any malt extract, or other proprietary medicines containing alcohol, except such compounds, compositions, malt extracts, or proprietary medicines be so medicated as to be medicinal preparations or compounds unfit for use as beverages, except upon a written and bona fide prescription of a duly licensed and regularly practicing physician in the District of Columbia, whose name shall be signed thereto. Such prescription shall contain a statement that the disease of the patient requires such a prescription, shall be numbered in the order of receiving, and shall be canceled by writing on it the word "canceled" and the date on which it was presented and filled, and kept on file in consecutive order, subject to public inspection at all times during business hours. No such prescription shall be filled more than once. Every druggist or pharmacist selling intoxicating liquors as herein provided shall keep a book provided for the purpose and shall enter therein at the time of every sale a true record of the date of the sale, the name of the purchaser, who shall sign his name in said book as a part of the entry, his residence (giving the street and house number, if there be such), the kind and quantity and price of such liquor, the purpose for which it was sold, and the name of the physician giving the prescription therefor. Such book shall be open to public inspection during business hours and shall be in form substantially as follows:

Date.	Name of purchaser.	Residence.	Kind and quantity.	Purpose of use.	Price.	Name of physician.	Signature of purchaser.

Said book shall be produced before the Commissioners of the District of Columbia or the courts when required, and shall also contain a statement of the kind and amount of alcoholic and other prohibited liquors on hand when this act shall go into effect; and thereafter such druggist or pharmacist shall, on the order of the court or the Commissioners of the District, make a statement of the amount of intoxicating liquor sold or used in any manner since the last statement, and the amount on hand at the date when such court or commissioners require such statement: Provided, That ethyl alcohol may be sold without a physician's prescription for mechanical, medicinal, pharmaceutical, scientific, or other nonbeverage purposes by registered and licensed druggists or pharmacists, or by licensed manufacturers, each and all of whom shall keep a book for the purpose of registering such sales in a similar manner and form as required for the sale of other alcoholic and other prohibited liquors by the provisions of this section: Provided further, That any person who shall make any false statement as to the purpose or use of alcohol purchased under the provisions of this section shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and be fined for each offense not less than $50 nor more than $300, and in default of the payment of such fine shall be imprisoned in the jail or workhouse of said District not less than 30 days nor more than 6 months.

Any druggist or pharmacist who shall sell or dispense any alcoholic or other prohibited liquors except in such manner as provided in this section, or who shall fail or refuse to keep the record herein required, or who shall refill any prescription, or who shall violate any other provisions of this act, shall be guilty of illegal selling, and, upon conviction thereof, shall be subject to the penalties prescribed in section 1 of this act. Upon a second conviction for said offense, in addition to the penalties prescribed in said section 1, it shall be a part of the judgment of conviction that the license of such druggist or pharmacist to practice pharmacy shall be revoked, and the court before which such person is tried and convicted shall cause a certified copy of such judgment of conviction to be certified to the board having authority to issue license to practice pharmacy in the District of Columbia.

Any physician who shall prescribe any alcoholic or other prohibited liquor except for treatment of disease which, after his own personal diagnosis, he shall deem to require such treatment shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and, upon conviction thereof, shall be fined not less than $100 nor more than $500, and in default of payment of said fine shall be imprisoned in the District jail or workhouse for not less than 30 nor more than 90 days, and upon a second conviction for said offense, in addition to the penalty above provided, it shall be a part of the judgment of conviction that the license of such physician to practice medicine be revoked, and the court before which such physician is tried and convicted shall cause a certified copy of such judgment of conviction to be certified to the board having authority to issue licenses to practice medicine in the District of Columbia.

Section 4 of the bill in its present form is likewise to be stricken out, because, like the original section 3, it relates to eliminated provisions of section 2. In the revised form section 4 provides the method by which wine for sacramental purposes may be obtained. It provides that any minister, pastor, or priest desiring wine for sacramental purpose must obtain a permit from the Commissioners of the District of Columbia, the amount to be shipped or purchased under one permit not to exceed 5 gallons, each permit to expire in 20 days and to cover but one shipment or purchase. The new section 4 reads as follows:

SEC. 4. That when any minister, pastor, or priest of a religious congregation or church desires wine for sacramental purposes in the usual religious exercises of his denomination, he may apply to the Commissioners of the District of Columbia for a permit, stating the amount desired, for what period and for what purpose, and said commissioners, if satisfied of the good faith of the application, shall grant a written permit to the applicant permitting the shipment to him, or the purchase by him, of such amount as is shown to be reasonably necessary, which amount shall be stated in the permit, together with the purpose for which it is to be used, and the period to be covered by such use; the amount of wine permitted to be shipped or purchased under one permit shall not exceed 5 gallons, and the said permit shall be attached to the outside of the package by the shipper and remain so attached until delivered to the consignee, when it shall be canceled by the carrier. Said permit shall be void after 20 days, and shall not be used for more than one shipment.

Section 5 is to be stricken out and a new section inserted providing for the manufacture of alcohol for the purposes permitted in the act by licensed manufacturers, who must obtain an annual license, paying therefor $100. It provides that druggists desiring to deal in alcohol for such purposes shall obtain an annual license; wholesalers paying $25, retailers $10. Manufacturers may sell only to druggists licensed as herein provided—and only druggists properly licensed may sell alcohol for permitted purposes. Penalties are imposed for violations of this section. The original provision restricting purchase and sale of alchol to five wholesale druggists has been eliminated.

Any person, company, or corporation desiring to manufacture alcoholic or other prohibited liquors for the purposes permitted in this act shall, on or before the 1st day of November of each year, obtain a license from the Commissioners of the District of Columbia for the year beginning November 1, upon the payment of $100, which money shall be deposited with other license funds of the District. Druggists, wholesale or retail, desiring to sell alcoholic or other prohibited liquors for the purposes permitted in this act shall obtain a license in the same way for the same period, the fee for wholesale druggists being $25, for retail druggists $10. The commissioners shall have power to refuse or revoke all licenses referred to in this section, if doubtful of the good faith of the licensee and his intention to comply with this act. Manufacturers licensed according to this section shall sell alcoholic and other prohibited liquors to druggists only, and only to such druggists as are licensed under the terms of this section, provided that hospitals, departments of the Government, colleges, and laboratories may purchase alcoholic liquors from manufacturers, after obtaining permit from the District Commissioners, who shall be satisfied of the good faith of said purchasers before granting permit, and who shall require records and reports of all sales made by such manufacturers. No others than druggists and manufacturers licensed according to this section may manufacture or sell alcoholic and other prohibited liquors in this District of Columbia, and these only for the purposes permitted by this act. Violations of this section shall be punished by fine of not less than $300 nor more than $1,000, and by imprisonment in the District jail or workhouse for not less than 30 days nor more than one year.

Section 6 of the bill as introduced is to be omitted, as it relates to procurement of wine for sacramental purposes, a purpose already covered by the new section 4, and of alcoholic liquors by legations and embassies, a feature rendered unnecessary by the amendments permitting personal use.

Section 7 is to be numbered section 6 and is to remain practically unchanged. The following amendments are to be proposed to this section: In line 21 strike out the word "prohibited." In line 22 strike out the word "alcoholic" and add, after the word "liquors," the words "for prohibited purposes." In line 23 strike out the word "legal." Strike out line 24 and insert in lieu thereof the words "liquors for purposes not prohibited." Strike out lines 25 and 26 and insert in lieu thereof "it shall be unlawful to bring the same into the District of Columbia or to deliver the same therein." In line 1, page 7, strike out the words "or whether."

The new section 6, as amended, will read as follows:

SEC. 6. That it shall be unlawful for any common or other carrier, express company, or any person to deliver to any person, company, corporation, club, association, or order, his or its agents, clerks, or employees any liquors for prohibited purposes in the District of Columbia, knowing same to be such, and in the case of shipments of liquors for purposes not prohibited it shall be unlawful to bring the same into the District of Columbia, or to deliver the same therein, in original packages or otherwise, on any Sunday or on any other day before 6 o'clock a. m. and after 5 o'clock p. m. Any common or other carrier, express company, or any person violating the provisions of this section shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon conviction thereof shall be punished by a fine of not less than $100 or more than $500 or be confined in the District jail or workhouse not less than one nor more than six months, or by both fine and imprisonment, in the discretion of the court.

This section makes it unlawful for any common or other carrier, express company, or any person to deliver knowingly any prohibited liquor at any time or to ship liquors into the District for any purposes on Sunday or on any day before 6 o'clock in the morning and after 5 o'clock in the evening. Penalties are imposed.

Similar antishipping provisions have been incorporated in a number of prohibition States, such as Alabama, Georgia, and West Virginia. They have been found essential to a well-enforced law. Better supervision may be had when shipments into the District can be made only in the daylight and not at all on Sunday.

Section 8 becomes section 7, and remains almost without change except for the elimination of the words "use," "gift," and "give away." This section is specially intended to prevent evasions of the law by clubs or associations. In many jurisdictions prohibition laws have been seriously hampered because clubs and similar organizations were able to dispense liquors by some scheme or device in violation of the plain intent and purpose of the law. One of the most common of these devices is known as the "locker system," a device prohibited by this section. It makes all officers, members, stockholders, and employees of clubs who in any way aid or abet in the sale of liquors liable to punishment. It also provides that all persons connected with a club shall be competent witnesses to prove violations of the act, and that no person shall be excused from testifying because he may incriminate himself, but that any testimony he may give shall not be used against him.

The experience of other jurisdictions has shown such provisions as these to be highly desirable. Similar provisions are found in the laws of nearly all the prohibition States. The State of Georgia recently enacted a law for the especial purpose of eliminating drinking clubs. There are similar provisions in the present excise law of the District.

The last four lines of section 8 of the original bill are to be made into a new section, known as section 8, and are to be amended so as to read as follows:

The keeping or giving away of alcoholic or other prohibited liquors for the purpose of evading the provisions of this act shall be deemed an unlawful selling, subject to the penalties provided in section 1 of this act.

The justice of this provision is manifest. It is aimed at endeavors to evade this act under the cloak of keeping for pretended personal use or of a pretended gift.

Section 9 is to remain practically as it now is. A few changes are to be suggested, as follows: In line 12, before the words "by signs," insert the word "of." In line 14, after the word "alcoholic," insert the words "or other prohibited"; and after the word "liquors" insert the words "for purposes forbidden." In line 16, after the word "publish," insert the words "or distribute."

This section makes it unlawful to advertise liquors for prohibited purposes in any manner, by newspapers, periodicals, billboards, signs, or otherwise; to distribute order blanks, price lists, or circulars advertising such liquors, or to publish or to distribute newspapers, magazines, or other printed or written paper containing such advertisements. The penalty is a fine of not less than $100 nor more than $500.

Similar antiadvertising laws are in operation in Maine, Oregon, Alabama, Georgia, and other States. The effect of prohibition is to reduce to a minimum the consumption of alcoholic liquors. Evidently it is inconsistent with such object to permit a State or District to be flooded with advertisements of liquors for forbidden purposes.

Section 10 is the well-known "search and seizure" provision. The District excise law contains a similar provision, and it is found in the prohibition laws of Iowa, North Carolina, Maine, Oregon, Washington, West Virginia, and other States. It is regarded as a very essential part of any prohibition or even a license law. It enables the authorities to reach violations of the law that can not be reached in any other way. Upon a charge upon oath presented to the corporation counsel or any of his assistants authorized to act for him that the law is being violated, a search warrant shall be issued and placed in the hands of the captain of the police precinct in which the place to be searched is located, commanding him to search for and seize all prohibited liquors and the means for dispensing the same, and hold them as evidence, together with any internal-revenue tax receipt and any paraphernalia of a barroom or other alcoholic-liquor establishment.

The only change to be made in this section is the elision of the words "storing or depositing," in line 3, page 9; "or use," in line 4, page 9; and "giving away," in line 5, page 9.

The courts have sustained "search and seizure" practically everywhere, and it is now regarded as a necessary part of the law enforcing machinery of every up-to-date prohibition measure.

Section 11 is to be omitted, as its provisions are practically embodied in the new section 8.

Section 12 is to be changed to section 11. This section is designed to prevent the drinking of alcoholic liquors in the streets or roads, in any public place, or in street cars or other public conveyance; it also makes it an offense to be intoxicated in the streets, alleys, or roads, or in any street car, railroad passenger train, or in any other public place or building or to disturb the peace of any person anywhere. The punishment provided for any of these offenses is a fine of from $10 to $100, or imprisonment of from 5 to 30 days, or both fine and imprisonment, in the discretion of the court. Similar provisions are in force in Maine and Idaho, in the District of Columbia, and other jurisdictions. Such laws have been upheld wherever tried as being in the interest of good morals. A number of the non-prohibition States prohibit the drinking of liquors on railroad trains. Texas has a very stringent law of the kind. Such laws are becoming more and more popular.

The only change to be proposed for this section is to strike out, in line 24, the last word, "or," and, in line 25, the words "railroad passenger train or in or upon" and insert the word "or" before the word "any."

Section 13 becomes section 12. This section contains the now widely used provision which makes the payment of the special internal-revenue tax required by the Government from wholesale or retail liquor dealers prima facie evidence of the violations of the law by the person paying such tax, except in cases where such person is authorized by local license to sell liquors. Such a provision is of great use in the enforcement of prohibition laws, and will be until the Government ceases to collect revenue from the illicit sale of liquor in prohibited States and districts. It is in force in Maine, West Virginia, Washington, North Carolina, Arkansas, Idaho, and other States.

The only amendment I propose to this section is to strike out the word "wholesale" in line 16 and insert in lieu thereof the words "manufacturers or." Manufacturers and druggists licensed under this act are exempted from the operation of this section.

Section 14 becomes section 13. In this section it is provided that any building, clubroom, boathouse, or other place where this act is violated may be declared a public or common nuisance, and be abated by order of a court. In addition, any person who shall maintain any such public nuisance may be convicted and punished under the penalties provided in section 1 of the bill. This common-nuisance provision is found to be a valuable aid in the enforcement of prohibition laws, and West Virginia, Oregon, Washington, Arkansas, Idaho, and other States find the law effective.

This section is to be amended as follows: In line 7 strike out the words "stored" and "or," in line 8 strike out the words "given away," and in line 9 strike out the words "give away."

Section 15 becomes section 14, and remains without change. In this section it is provided how a "common nuisance," as declared in the previous section, may be abated. The United States district attorney for the District of Columbia, or any citizen of the District, may maintain an action in equity in the name of the United States to abate and perpetually enjoin such nuisance. The injunction shall be granted at the commencement of the suit, and no bond shall be required. The penalty for violating the terms of any injunction is a fine of not less than $100 nor more than $500 and imprisonment for not less than 30 days nor more than 6 months. It is a summary, but often necessary, part of prohibition and other similar laws.

Section 16 becomes section 15 and remains unchanged. This section carries an extension of the operation of the writ of injunction in aid of law enforcement when other methods of procedure may fail. The writ may be employed to prevent a threatened violation of the law or a continuation or repetition of an unlawful act; and it may be employed to compel obedience to any provision of the act. The courts have generally upheld this use of the writ of injunction in enforcing liquor laws, and it has generally proven effective.

Section 17 becomes section 16 and remains unchanged. This section carries another aid to law enforcement. If a tenant of a building uses or knowingly permits said building to be used by another as a common nuisance, the lease to said building is rendered void, and the right of possession reverts to the owner or lessor, who may immediately enter into possession of the premises, or he may avail himself of the remedy for forcible detention.

Section 18 becomes section 17 and remains as it now is. This section provides further aid to law enforcement in that in case the landlord has knowledge that his property is being used as a common nuisance and neglects to take reasonable measures to eject the lessee he shall be deemed guilty of aiding in maintaining such nuisance. It is apparent that the provisions of this section and the one preceding will be valuable aids in securing enforcement of the act. Similar provisions are in force in the State of Kansas.

Section 19 becomes section 18, with no other change. In section 19 it is provided that there shall be no property rights in prohibited alcoholic liquors, and such liquors shall be held contraband. The reason for such a provision is plain. It is another aid to law enforcement. Liquors seized and used as evidence may be destroyed by order of the court after conviction, or upon satisfactory evidence that such liquors are contraband. Similar provisions are found in the prohibition laws of some of the States.

Section 20 becomes section 19. This section carries a civil damage provision similar to the laws in a number of the States, among them Illinois and Maine. A wife, child, parent, guardian, employer, or other person who shall be injured in person or property or means of support by any intoxicated person, or in consequence of intoxication, shall have a right of action against the person selling or furnishing the liquors which caused the intoxication. This seems to be a wise and just provision, and effective as well. Such laws have been generally sustained by the courts.

This section is to be amended by inserting the word "or," in line 24, between the words "selling" and "bartering," and by striking out, after the word "bartering," the words "or giving."

Section 21 becomes section 20, and is otherwise unaltered. It is the purpose of this section to lessen the dangers of railroad, street-car, vehicular, and water traffic by making it an offense for any intoxicated person to be in charge of or to operate the motor power of or to be otherwise in charge of the agencies of such traffic. These provisions apply to conductors and brakemen as well as engineers of railroad trains. The value of such a law is manifest. Nearly all railroad companies prohibit their employees from drinking intoxicating liquors on or off duty. The lives of passengers intrusted to public carriers should be safeguarded in every way possible, and so should the traffic of the streets be safeguarded from the recklessness of drinking chauffeurs and drivers. The State of North Carolina has a law punishing drunken trainmen, as has other States. The section provides a penalty of from $25 to $300, or, in default, imprisonment for not more than three months, or both such fine and imprisonment.

Section 22 becomes section 21 and remains without alteration. In this section the duty of enforcing the law is charged to the Commissioners of the District of Columbia. They are required to detail qualified members of the police force to give special attention to the detection of violations of the law, but it shall be the duty of all members of the police force to detect violations of the act and report any information or knowledge concerning the same to the corporation counsel, with the names of witnesses, and the corporation counsel is charged with the duty of speedily prosecuting all offenders.

This does not change the method of prosecution now followed in excise cases in the District, except as to the proposed special detail of officers to detect violations of the law. To enforce the Kenyon red-light law for the District a special detail of officers give their whole time to the detection and prosecution of offenders. In West Virginia there is a State commissioner of prohibition, whose duty it is to enforce the law all over the State. Other places under license or prohibition laws provide officers who are specially charged with the enforcement of the law. It is assumed that this provision will appeal to all who desire the thorough enforcement of the law.

It is further provided that if any officer fail to do his duty under this section he may be so charged, and upon conviction be fined in any sum not less than $100 nor more than $500, and such conviction shall carry with it a forfeiture of his office; and the court may, in the case of any official who fails or neglects to perform his official duty in the enforcement of the act, remove such official from his office. Similar provisions for the punishment or removal of negligent officials are found in the prohibition laws of Maine, Idaho, North Carolina, West Virginia, and Oregon.

Section 23 becomes section 22 and is to be unchanged. As under the present District license law, it is provided here that prosecutions of alleged offenders shall be on information filed in the police court by the corporation counsel of the District or any of his assistants duly authorized to act for him; and information shall be filed upon presentation to him of sworn information that the law has been violated. Power is given to the corporation counsel or his assistants to administer oaths to informants or others who present themselves; and a false oath renders the person liable to a charge of perjury, with the penalties now provided by law. So much of the section is precisely as the law is now concerning prosecutions under the excise law. But the commissioners are given another method of prosecution by this section, to be exercised as their judgment directs. To secure more effective enforcement of the law, they may proceed through the office of the United States district attorney for the District of Columbia, who shall proceed to prosecute in the usual manner by indictment. This seems to be a desirable safeguard to prevent the miscarriage of justice, which so often happens in many jurisdictions in liquor prosecutions.

Section 24 becomes section 23, and remains unaltered. In this section it is provided that in case any part of the act shall be deemed unconstitutional or invalid the remainder shall not be affected thereby, but shall be enforced without regard to the part so invalidated. It is a wise provision, and no comment is necessary. Such provisions are not uncommon. They are found in the prohibition laws of Washington, Idaho, and other States.

Section 25 becomes section 24, and is to be unchanged. This section is simply an aid to interpretation of the act. Words of singular number shall include the plural, and words of the masculine gender shall include the feminine, as the case may be.

Section 26 becomes section 25. It is here provided that the act shall be in full force and effect on and after the 1st day of November, 1916, and all inconsistent laws are repealed.

This section is to be amended by adding after the word "repealed," in line 4, page 18, the following:

And that the Excise Board for the District of Columbia provided for and established under the act making appropriations to provide for the expense of the government of the District of Columbia for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1914, be, and it is hereby, abolished upon the taking effect of this act.

The date of November, 1916, is set as the time for this act to go into effect, because the present licenses of the saloons in the District expire at that time. Manifestly, with saloons abolished, there will be no need for the excise board.

Such, Mr. President, is an explanation of the bill for prohibition in the District of Columbia, with the amendments which I shall propose at the proper time. When the first water-power bill came before the Senate I gave notice that after the water-power bills had been disposed of I should call up another water-power bill, the prohibition bill for the District of Columbia, and I intend to do so at what I consider an opportune time. I shall, of course, not attempt to hold back other legislation which might be considered of immediate national importance; but I do not want this bill forgotten, nor do I want the Senate to be under the impression that we have given up in any way the idea of securing its consideration at a reasonably early date.

WATER-POWER SITES.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 408) to provide for the development of water power and the use of public lands in relation thereto, and for other purposes.

Mr. ASHURST obtained the floor.

Mr. CHILTON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Arizona yield to the Senator from West Virginia?

Mr. ASHURST. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. CHILTON. I wanted to call up Senate joint resolution 98.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

Mr. BORAH. Let us hear what it is.

Mr. CHILTON. It is the report of the Committee on Printing upon the printing of what is known as the report of the Industrial Relations Commission and certain parts of the evidence.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. With that information does the Senator object?

Mr. BORAH. No.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from West Virginia.

Mr. CHILTON. What is the order of the Senate?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The water-power bill.

Mr. CHILTON. But, I mean, what was the decision? Is it before the Senate now?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. After the request was made, the Senator from Idaho inquired to know what it was.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will state that the water-power bill should be temporarily laid aside before a new matter can be taken up.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I rose to make that suggestion. I know that if the Senator from Montana [Mr. MYERS] were here he would make that request, and he would also ask unanimous consent that no business be considered other than that proposed by the Senator from West Virginia, and that, as soon as it is disposed of, the consideration of the water-power bill should be resumed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, in reply to the suggestion of the Senator from Texas, I desire to say that there is a little bill on the calendar which it will take about two minutes to pass—not any longer than the Senator's bridge bills take—and I hope I may be permitted to ask for the consideration of that bill.

Mr. SHEPPARD. The Senator knows that permission has been asked for the consideration of another bill.

Mr. GALLINGER. Yes.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I shall not object.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection——

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President——

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, just a moment. I do not want this bill laid aside with the distinct contract that only certain matters shall be considered.

Mr. GALLINGER. No; of course not.

Mr. JONES. I have a resolution that I want to have passed. It will take but a minute. I shall not object, unless it is insisted that as soon as this matter is disposed of the other bill shall be taken up.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, while I am perfectly willing to see the water-power bill laid aside indefinitely, I do not think it is doing justice to the Senator having charge of that bill that any disposition be made of it during his temporary absence from the Chamber; and I certainly shall object, very largely on his account, to its indefinite laying aside.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The proposition, as the Chair understood it, was to lay aside temporarily the water-power bill in order that the bill suggested by the Senator from West Virginia might be taken up. Without objection——

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, I shall object.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Montana objects. The water-power bill is still before the Senate and open to amendment.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, it is obvious to my mind that no one wishes to speak on the water-power bill at this time. Must we therefore adjourn? Why can we not lay aside the water-power bill for 20, 30, or 40 minutes and dispose of this report from the Printing Committee?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is a matter that rests entirely with the Senate.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, the Senator will understand perfectly well that I have a great desire to see the report published.

Mr. ASHURST. I know that.

Mr. WALSH. But I do not see any reason why the water-power bill should be laid aside on any consideration. We are ready to go on with the water-power bill.

Mr. ASHURST. I did not know that. I beg the Senator's pardon.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum. If we are going to transact business, we ought to have some Senators here.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Hardwick	McCumber	Sherman
Borah	Hitchcock	Martin, Va.	Smith, Ga.
Brandegee	Hughes	Martine, N. J.	Smith, S. C.
Chamberlain	James	Myers	Smoot
Chilton	Johnson, S. Dak.	Newlands	Thomas
Clapp	Jones	Norris	Thompson
Clark, Wyo.	Kenyon	Page	Vardaman
Cummins	Kern	Robinson	Wadsworth
Gallinger	La Follette	Saulsbury	Walsh
Gore	Lea, Tenn.	Shafroth	Warren
Gronna	Lippitt	Sheppard

Mr. KERN. I desire to announce the unavoidable absence of the senior Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER] on public business. He is paired with the junior Senator from Idaho [Mr. BRADY]. This announcement may stand for the day.

Mr. CHILTON. I desire to announce the absence of my colleague [Mr. GOFF] on account of illness. I will let this announcement stand for the day.

Mr. ASHURST. I wish to announce the absence of the Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE] and to state that he is paired with the Senator from Maine [Mr. BURLEIGH].

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Forty-three Senators have responded to their names. There is not a quorum present.

Mr. KERN. I ask that the names of the absentees be called.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will call the names of the absent Senators.

The Secretary called the names of the absent Senators, and Mr. JOHNSON of Maine, Mr. SWANSON, Mr. TILLMAN, Mr. TOWNSEND, and Mr. WORKS answered to their names when called.

Mr. OVERMAN, Mr. BANKHEAD, and Mr. CURTIS entered the Chamber and answered to their names.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Fifty-one Senators have responded to their names. There is a quorum present.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, in the consideration of this bill I wish to call the attention of the Senate to the fact that this is the first of a series of bills that will follow. The program of the advocates of these measures is to adopt a leasing bill for water power on the public domain. The next proposition is to provide for the leasing of the coal, oil, gas, phosphate, potassium, and sodium lands of the United States.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey in the chair). Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. SHAFROTH. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. GALLINGER. Does the Senator suggest that that will be the conservation program of Congress, that if this bill passes——

Mr. SHAFROTH. No; I do not know that it is. But those bills have passed the House of Representatives, and they have come over here, and I understand they are to be taken up for consideration.

Mr. GALLINGER. About how long does the Senator think it will take to get consideration of those bills?

Mr. SHAFROTH. I do not know. These bills are to be followed by still another one, in my judgment, because that is the program of the so-called conservationists. They adopted in their conventions the program that all the mineral lands, such as contain gold, silver, copper, lead, and zinc mines, are to be subject to a leasing system by the Federal Government. So there is to be a complete leasing system, according to their program.

Now, whether or not that will be carried out, or to what extent it will be carried out, I can not say, but unquestionably, when we consider this proposition of leasing the waters on the public domain by the Federal Government, waters that the Government has no more right or title to than you have, I think we are getting to a state where we ought to consider this question most seriously.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

Mr. SHAFROTH. I yield to the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. GALLINGER. I have a further question.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I beg pardon; I thought the Senator was through.

Mr. GALLINGER. I have a further suggestion to make, because this becomes a practical matter with some of us. Even if this program should be partially submitted to the Senate, it is safe for us to send for our summer clothes, is it not?

Mr. SHAFROTH. I will not say that. I want to have a reasonable time to discuss this measure, because I think I am right. I am entirely satisfied myself, I am thoroughly convinced, that the passage of this bill will be a disaster to the Rocky Mountain States, and I think if people will lay aside their prejudices upon this matter I can convince them to that effect.

Did the Senator from Idaho desire to interrupt me?

Mr. BORAH. I was only going to say to the Senator from New Hampshire that the vice of this bill, as we see it and as suggested by the Senator from Colorado, is that it establishes a precedent for the leasing system which is to be carried to its completion by covering all the natural resources of the States known as the arid or public land States.

Mr. WALSH. I should like to inquire of the Senator from Idaho if we did not commit ourselves to the leasing system the other day in passing the Shields bill?

Mr. SHAFROTH. No; I do not think so.

Mr. WALSH. I ask the Senator from Idaho, not the Senator from Colorado.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Very well; I can explain that.

Mr. BORAH. I want to say to the Senator from Montana that I voted against the Shields bill.

Mr. WALSH. I know that, but——

Mr. BORAH. Wait a moment. I voted against it because I thought it had that principle involved in it.

Mr. WALSH. I supposed it had the approval of the Senator.

Mr. BORAH. The Senator from Colorado did not agree with me. The Senator from Colorado and I talked it over, and he did not think the principle inhered in that bill. But I felt otherwise and was constrained to oppose it for that reason, among other reasons.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President——

Mr. SHAFROTH. I yield to the Senator from Montana.

Mr. MYERS. I think I am in a position to assure the Senator from Colorado and have the authority to assure him that there will be no other leasing or conservation measure at this session of Congress, except the water-power bill and the mineral-land leasing bill, which my colleague [Mr. WALSH] introduced. I do not think anyone has any intention of introducing any other measure. I am sure that no one connected with the administration has any idea of recommending any other measure.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, the Senator seems to think that that is a little program of itself, but when you consider that we have in the western country 343,000,000 acres of public land, a very large part of which consists of coal lands, phosphate lands, potassium lands, sodium lands, gas lands, oil lands, and mineral lands, you can readily see that the second bill which he proposes to introduce is one of most vital consequence to the development of that section of the country. Inasmuch as I think these bills if enacted will retard development, and inasmuch as I think they will be destructive of good government by holding back the settlement of the public lands, I can not help but view with apprehension not only the presentation of this water-power bill providing for the leasing of the waters of nonnavigable streams by the Federal Government, but also I view with apprehension the other bill which he has mentioned.

Now, as to whether there is going to be a third bill which will provide for the leasing of the gold mines, the silver mines, the copper mines, and the zinc mines and other mines, I can not tell, but if the United States Government proposes to lease the lands to the extent named, it seems to me there is logically much more reason for it to proceed to the other extreme and lease the mines of the precious metals of the country.

Mr. BORAH rose.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I yield to the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I see the same consolation in the suggestion of the Senator from Montana that there is for a man who is condemned to die and is given 30 days' reprieve. If this bill is passed at the present session and another passed at the present session and then the third and fourth are to come at the next session, there is very little consolation in that fact to the West, because this is the lifetime struggle with those States. If the precedent is to be established and the system is to be inaugurated it had all just as well be done at this session as at a later session. We are not asking for a reprieve, we ask for acquittal. We think we can run our affairs as States and object to the surveillance proposed.

Mr. SHAFROTH. It has been admitted on the floor of the Senate that the National Government has no title or right whatever to the waters of nonnavigable streams. Yet as some may doubt the verity of the admission, I want to present one authority which can not be questioned, to show that the United States Government never had and never could have had, considering our dual form of Government, any right whatever to any of the waters of the nonnavigable streams. In fact, it has no title to the navigable waters except of a negative nature, that is to prevent obstructions to navigation in navigable streams. So far as the nonnavigable streams are concerned it is clear that there is no title, right, or interest whatever in the United States to the waters of nonnavigable streams in the States of the Union whether they pass by private or Government lands.

Mr. President, I wish to state that the original States owned their own water, and that the United States Government never acquired any right, title, or interest in the nonnavigable streams of the original 13 States. It is almost axiomatic to state it. There has been added to that statement certain acts of Congress which make it apply to the new States because, for instance, when Colorado was admitted into the Union Congress passed an enabling act, which contained the following:

> That the inhabitants of the Territory of Colorado included in the boundaries hereinafter designated be, and they are hereby, authorized to form for themselves, out of said Territory, a State government, with the name of the State of Colorado, which State, when formed, shall be admitted into the Union upon an equal footing with the original States in all respects whatsoever.

That was the language used in the enabling acts of all the other States admitted into the Union.

Mr. President, those words have been construed by the Supreme Court of the United States. The language is so strong that the court has said repeatedly the exact rights which these 13 original States possessed were given to all the States subsequently admitted into the Union. That same language was used even in the admission of States immediately after the formation of the Federal Constitution. Even the deeds that were passed by Virginia and by Connecticut to the United States for the land they owned west of the Allegheny Mountains contained that language. The Supreme Court has held that that language places the new States upon an exact equal footing with the original States in every respect whatsoever.

Now, inasmuch as it must be conceded that the United States Government never owned the waters of any of the 13 original States, and each of the States admitted into the Union after that time contained the clause of equality in every respect whatsoever, it seems to me to be absurd for any person to contend that the United States Government obtained by reason of the formation of the Union any right to any of the waters of such streams, or even of the navigable streams, except the right under the interstate commerce clause of the Constitution to prevent obstruction to invasion.

Mr. President, upon that matter we find that the Supreme Court of the United States has said that the Federal Constitution contains no grant or title to those waters. The United States Constitution is a grant of powers by the States and all the powers not granted are reserved to the States, and that consequently not having granted any right to the waters of a State they are reserved to the State.

Then what right has the Government to enter into a State and lease the waters thereof when it does not own the same?

Mr. President, I wish to call attention to the language used in the case of Kansas v. Colorado in 206 United States Supreme Court Reports at page 46. This is the language that is used in the syllabus, and it is borne out in the opinion of the court:

> The Government of the United States is one of enumerated powers; that it has no inherent powers of sovereignty;—

It can not go into a State and exercise sovereignty over the affairs of that State because it is not contained in the United States Constitution, and the State has not by its act granted any such right. The State does occasionally grant the right of sovereignty over land in the State by a special act of the legislature of that State. The land upon which a United States public building is located is expressly excepted from the sovereignty of the State by act of its legislature. If a man is injured or killed on the property of the United States Government dedicated to the public use, the offender is not tried in the State court; he is tried in the United States court. The United States exercises sovereignty upon that smaller piece of land, but it takes an act of the legislature specifically to confer that jurisdiction. Every time a Government public building is erected in a city or town the legislature of such State invariably grants and cedes jurisdiction thereof to the National Government.

> The Government of the United States is one of enumerated powers; that it has no inherent powers of sovereignty; that the enumeration of the powers granted is to be found in the Constitution of the United States, and in that alone; that the manifest purpose of the tenth amendment to the Constitution is to put beyond dispute the proposition that all powers not granted are reserved to the people; and that if in the changes of the years further powers ought to be possessed by Congress they must be obtained by a new grant from the people.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. SHAFROTH. I want to say if Senators want to have the rule adopted of leasing waters that do not belong to the Government they should, in the language of this decision, obtain a new grant from three-fourths of the States of the Union.

I yield to the Senator from Washington.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I do not think myself that a question of sovereignty is involved one way or the other in this act. It seems to me it is simply a matter of contractual right, of riparian ownership. But supposing that the question of sovereignty were involved, does not the Senator think that section 13 of the act, which provides—

That nothing in this act shall be construed as affecting or intended to affect or to in any way interfere with the laws of any State relating to the control, appropriation, use, or distribution of water—completely avoids any conflict between the Federal Government and the States and is a full recognition of all the rights of the States?

Added to that question, in order not to break up the Senator's argument any further, I should like to make just this comment: So far from the question of sovereignty being involved, it seems to me nothing more is involved here than can be by a private individual——

Mr. SHAFROTH. Now, Mr. President——

Mr. POINDEXTER. Just one second, and I will sit down. The reason I am stating this is because I should like to have the Senator discuss it while he is on that subject.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I shall be glad to do so.

Mr. POINDEXTER. The humblest private citizen in the State who owns the site of a dam on a nonnavigable stream and has the fee simple title to the abutting shore line and the bed of the stream, where it is desired to erect a dam, would have a right to erect a dam there, so long as he complied with the laws of the State which this act requires the lessees under this act to do. If he did that, would he not own the power that was developed by the waterfall that is created? Would the ownership and right to use that power by this private citizen involve any question of sovereignty? Is it not simply a property right instead of a governmental right?

Mr. SHAFROTH. No, Mr. President, it is not a property right alone. If this were a property right a different proposition would be presented. We had the property right presented in the Shields bill. The Senator from Washington absolutely opposed every effort to make that a property right. We there provided that the United States Government should charge nothing for the water which it did not own, and that it should charge simply the market value of the land as in a suit in condemnation against a private citizen. But here the United States Government proposes to make a charge upon the waters which do not belong to the United States Government. It proposes not to take the amount of money that would be awarded for a site at its actual fair valuation, ascertained and determined in a condemnation proceeding. Oh, no; it is proposed to impose some kind of a charge dependent upon the water power developed, and that water has been held by the Supreme Court of the United States to belong to the States. But whenever we attempt to do that we invade the sovereignty of the State, and that is the reason why the question of sovereignty is involved in this particular bill.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

Mr. SHAFROTH. But, Mr. President, I want to continue reading the balance of this syllabus:

While Congress has general legislative jurisdiction over the Territories and may control the flow of waters in their streams, it has no power to control a like flow within the limits of a State except to preserve or improve the navigability of the stream; that the full control over those waters is, subject to the exception named, vested in the State. Hence the intervening petition of the United States is dismissed, without prejudice to any action which it may see fit to take in respect to the use of the water for maintaining or improving the navigability of the river.

Mr. President, I want to state to the Senator, if he has not read this decision, just what are the facts of the case. The State of Kansas commenced a suit against the State of Colorado to prevent the Colorado authorities from diverting the waters of the Arkansas River to lands in the State of Colorado, claiming that her riparian owners should have the right of the water flowing thereby. The Colorado authorities resisted the suit on the ground that riparian rights did not exist in the State of Colorado; that by virtue of the provisions of our Constitution and by the known usages of our State for years and years, the doctrine of riparian rights did not prevail in the State of Colorado; that we had the right to divert the water and to take it out of the stream and to use it for the purpose of making greater crops upon the lands adjacent to the river. The United States came in as an intervenor. It claimed that it had an interest by virtue of the act of 1902 which provided that the United States Government should construct irrigation works under the reclamation act, as it was termed, and they filed a petition in intervention, claiming certain rights in these waters. The court, after a long period of time and after elaborate arguments, held that the United States had no right whatever to intervene in that case as to those waters, because it had no right or title in or to the waters.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President——

Mr. SHAFROTH. I yield to the Senator from California.

Mr. WORKS. And the purpose of this bill is to give the United States Government just what was denied to it by that decision.

Mr. SHAFROTH. That is exactly what is proposed to be given.

The Senator from Washington must realize that if the Congress of the United States were to pass a direct act providing for a charge for the use of the water in the State of Colorado of 25, 50, 75 cents or $1 a unit of horsepower the Supreme Court of the United States would declare it unconstitutional. Why?

Mr. MYERS. I should like to ask the Senator a question.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I yield for that purpose.

Mr. MYERS. Does the Senator claim that you can do, by indirection, what you can not do by direction in law?

Mr. SHAFROTH. That is what you claim and what I contend you can not do.

Mr. MYERS. You claim, then, that the bill would be unconstitutional?

Mr. SHAFROTH. It may be that the courts would deny its constitutionality, but practically the Government would enforce the act. We have had contests in which the United States were on one side and it meant bankruptcy to the people who undertook to resist.

Mr. MYERS. Surely, if the people are denied to make a charge by the Federal Government for the use of State waters, the courts would declare the act to be unconstitutional.

Mr. SHAFROTH. There is always included some limitation as to time or something of that kind, although the object of the legislation may be perpetual use. If we were to pass a law by the Congress of the United States now that the waters of the State of Colorado should be subject to leasing by the Federal Government in direct terms, I have not the slightest doubt the Supreme Court of the United States would declare it unconstitutional.

Mr. MYERS. If this bill, then, would undertake to do it directly, the Senator may be sure that it would be held to be unconstitutional.

Mr. SHAFROTH. It does it, according to my view, indirectly, and that is where the Senator differs from me in that respect. Why? I am also satisfied it would be unconstitutional for Congress to pass a law saying that the United States Government shall never relinquish or dispose of its property in a State. Lands were not given to the United States except as a trust for the purpose of disposing of them.

If you were to put it in that language, I have not the slightest doubt that the Supreme Court of the United States would declare such an act to be unconstitutional. The danger of such an outcome is attempted to be removed by saying that for a period of so many years this power of ownership may be exercised. The judges of the Supreme Court have said, in the only case in which they have passed upon the subject, that "five years is a very limited time in the history of a nation. We can not say, and will not say, that that is not within the scope of the power of Congress." Although in the same decision they admit and declare that the United States Government is vested with this power of holding the public domain in trust for temporary purposes only and for the purpose of disposing of the land. They can well say, and some do say, that this may be for the purpose of getting the lands of the United States in better condition to dispose of, and, of course, as a means to that end, they could say it is within the power of Congress, but the Senator from Montana [Mr. MYERS] knows that under this bill the object and purpose is to have a leasing system of the waters of the States forever.

Mr. MYERS. Oh, no; I disclaim any attempt to lease the waters of the State. The Senator can not point out anything in the bill which will bear out that assertion.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Mr. President, in this connection I should like to ask a question of the Senator from Montana.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I yield to the Senator from Wyoming for that purpose.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I should like to ask the Senator whether or not the purpose of this bill is to put in the General Government the control of the waters which are the subject matter of the bill?

Mr. MYERS. Not at all.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. The Senator disagrees, then, with the department which has this matter under its immediate charge.

Mr. MYERS. I do not care with whom I disagree. I agree with the bill, which says there is no intention to control or to interfere with the waters of the States. I am satisfied to agree with the printed terms of the bill in its plain language.

Mr. BORAH. May I ask the Senator from Montana a question?

Mr. MYERS. Yes.

Mr. BORAH. Does the Senator from Montana admit that before the National Government can utilize this water for power purposes it must go under the State law and make application for the water and secure it by an appropriation the same as an individual would have to do?

Mr. MYERS. The Federal Government is not undertaking to utilize any water at all. It furnishes the land, and the applicant must go to the State authorities to get the water.

Mr. BORAH. Suppose that in the development of power under this bill it should become essential for the National Government to exercise control over some of the water, could it do so without making an application to the State authorities for the purpose of appropriating it?

Mr. MYERS. Under the terms of this bill I can not conceive of any contingency in which the Federal Government would undertake to control the waters of a State.

Mr. BORAH. Well, does the Senator believe that the National Government can acquire any interest to the use of the water other than for the purpose of navigation, except that it go as an individual and make application to the State and appropriate it?

Mr. MYERS. No; I do not believe it can acquire such interest in any other way.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President——

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, I yield to the Senator from California.

Mr. WORKS. Besides the fact that this bill undertakes, in a sense, to control the use of the water by imposing a charge based upon the use of the water itself, it undertakes to regulate the means by which the water may be taken out of the stream and diverted; it undertakes to determine when the work shall be commenced and when it shall be completed, all of which is within the power and the jurisdiction of the State. Beyond that the Government, in the end, proposes to take over the whole thing itself and to operate the plant.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, I thank the Senator from California for his statement. Can it be possible that the Senator from Montana [Mr. MYERS] can contend that this is not an interference with the waters of the States? If the Government makes a charge for the land only, as the Senator says that it does, it would be the price of the land, not that there shall be paid by any company undertaking an enterprise of this kind a charge of, say, a hundred dollars a horsepower—it is limited in the bill, it is true, to, I think, 40 cents or 50 cents, perhaps less than that——

Mr. MYERS. Twenty-five cents.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Twenty-five cents. Suppose that is true; the small amount of money charged does not determine the principle. If the Federal Government has a right to dispose of this, it has a right to exact any requirement that it may see fit to make. The charge of a hundred dollars a horsepower would conclusively show it was not for the value of the land but for the water used. The mere fact that the price is low makes it simply a sugar-coated pill which we have to take. It is an interference with the waters of the streams; the price charged is measured in water. The bill does not say that we shall charge the value of the land. That was what was said in the Shields bill, and that is the very thing which the Senator from Washington made speeches against. He wanted something charged by the Federal Government more than the value of the land, and he has got it in this bill; and that is an interference upon the part of the Federal Government with the rights of the States in this matter.

My MYERS. I desire to call the attention of the Senator to an amendment offered by the committee to section 8 of the bill as reported. The section now reads:

The Secretary of the Interior is authorized to specify in the lease and to collect charges or rentals for—all land leased, which charges or rentals shall be based on the value of the land—

For what?

And so forth.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Well, Mr. President, I have not yet seen the amendment to which the Senator is referring. However, as a matter of fact, you invade the right of the State when you attempt to say that the power of the State shall not exist as to eminent domain, which provides for just compensation for property taken, which is always in a lump sum. The State has some right to say what shall be done with relation to a public enterprise of this kind. Eminent domain does not exist in the National Government; it exists solely and purely in the State governments. It is the right of the State to determine how these lands shall be condemned, and the Federal Government absolutely interferes with the sovereignty of the State when it attempts to provide a different mode, even if it is sugar-coated, as I have before stated.

It is a question of power, and the decisions of the Supreme Court are to the effect that the right of the United States to the water does not exist. You can not avoid the difficulty by saying that the United States owns the land and can prescribe that it shall be used in a certain way so as to deny the right of the State to the water. If you are going to be fair, you should not exercise those powers which, it seems to me, were retained to the States themselves.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I am not thinking so much of the bill which is under consideration as I am of a statement which has just been made by the Senator from Colorado. It rather conflicts with my idea of the powers of the General Government, and I can not allow it to pass without calling it to his attention. The Senator has just said that the United States has no power of eminent domain.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Yes, sir.

Mr. CUMMINS. Does the Senator mean to say that if the United States desired to establish a post office in the State of Colorado for the transaction of its business it could not acquire the land on which to do it unless the State of Colorado consented?

Mr. SHAFROTH. Yes, sir. Let me explain——

Mr. CUMMINS. Just a moment——

Mr. SHAFROTH. When the Federal Government does that, it does it by virtue of the power of the State. It has to come in and set forth that it needs the land for a public purpose, and it invokes the power of the State. As I have said, the power of eminent domain exists in the State, and any citizen or any corporation or any other government can invoke that power, but the power is not in the Federal Government any more than it is in the individual; it is vested in the State government, which provides the machinery by which the condemnation can be made.

Mr. CUMMINS. So that the United States Government can not carry out any of its functions; it can not establish a post road or a post office or a customhouse, or perform any of the functions given to it by the Constitution, unless the State in which the function is to be performed gives its consent?

Mr. SHAFROTH. The way I have indicated is the way in which it is done. When a post office is established the Government does not take possession of the land by virtue of any inherent power in the Federal Government; it takes it by virtue of condemnation, if it wants to take it in that way, under State laws and by virtue of the authority of the State. I have a decision here which is directly in point.

Mr. CUMMINS. But the Senator from Colorado made a much broader statement than that.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I did not mean to do so.

Mr. CUMMINS. The Senator from Colorado asserts practically that the Federal Government is dependent upon the laws of the States for the execution of the powers which are given to the General Government in the Constitution. I do not believe that that is good law.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Let me read a few lines on that point right here from Pollard's Lessee v. Hagan (3 How., U. S., p. 223). It is a leading case which has been affirmed time and time again. I read from it as follows:

The right which belongs to the society, or to the sovereign, of disposing, in case of necessity and for the public safety, of all the wealth contained in the State is called the eminent domain. It is evident that this right is, in certain cases, necessary to him who governs, and is, consequently, a part of the empire or sovereign power. This definition shows that the eminent domain, although a sovereign power, does not include all sovereign power, and this explains the sense in which it is used in this opinion. The compact made between the United States and the State of Georgia was sanctioned by the Constitution of the United States, by the third section of the fourth article of which it is declared that "new States may be admitted by the Congress into this Union; but no new State shall be formed or erected within the jurisdiction of any other State, nor any State be formed by the junction of two or more States or parts of States without the consent of the legislatures of the States concerned, as well as of Congress."

When Alabama was admitted into the Union on an equal footing with the original States, she succeeded to all the rights of sovereignty, jurisdiction, and eminent domain which Georgia possessed at the date of the cession, except so far as this right was diminished by the public lands remaining in the possession and under the control of the United States, for the temporary purposes provided for in the deed of cession and the legislative acts connected with it. Nothing remained to the United States, according to the terms of the agreement, but the public lands. And if an express stipulation had been inserted in the agreement granting the municipal right of sovereignty and eminent domain to the United States, such stipulation would have been void and inoperative.

Mr. CUMMINS. Precisely. There is nothing there that conflicts with the suggestion that I make. I say that with respect to any power that is given to the United States under the Constitution it can execute that power against the will of the State, and certainly without the consent of the State. The view taken by the Senator from Colorado would mean that the United States could not march its Army across a State without its consent.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Oh, no; there are certain provisions of the Constitution which relate to that.

Mr. CUMMINS. There are none that provide for that definite thing, but simply that we have a right to maintain an Army.

Mr. SHAFROTH. There are certain rights that are granted in the Constitution to the United States; there is no doubt about that; but all of the powers given the United States in the Constitution were grants from the States.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President——

Mr. SHAFROTH. Just let me finish this one sentence from the decision, and then I will yield to the Senator:

> And, if an express stipulation had been inserted in the agreement, granting the municipal right of sovereignty and eminent domain to the United States, such stipulation would have been void and inoperative because the United States have no constitutional capacity to exercise municipal jurisdiction, sovereignty, or eminent domain within the limits of a State or elsewhere, except in the cases in which it is expressly granted.

Mr. CUMMINS. Precisely; and it is inferentially granted in connection with the execution of the granted powers of the United States.

Mr. SHAFROTH. The court specifies wherein those powers are granted:

> By the sixteenth clause of the eighth section of the first article of the Constitution, power is given to Congress "to exercise exclusive legislation in all cases whatsoever, over such district, not exceeding 10 miles square, as may by cession of particular States, and the acceptance of Congress, become the seat of government of the United States, and to exercise like authority over all places purchased, by the consent of the legislature of the State in which the same may be, for the erection of forts, magazines, arsenals, dockyards, and other needful buildings." Within the District of Columbia, and the other places purchased and used for the purposes above mentioned, the national and municipal powers of government, of every description, are united in the government of the Union. And these are the only cases, within the United States, in which all the powers of government are united in a single government, except in the cases already mentioned of the temporary territorial governments, and there a local government exists. The right of Alabama and every other new State to exercise all the powers of government, which belong to and may be exercised by the original States of the Union, must be admitted, and remain unquestioned, except so far as they are, temporarily, deprived of control over the public lands.

Mr. President, it seems to me that that principle is clear, and that when it is invaded it must be by the consent of the States. Of course, if the United States Government wants to erect a post office we are all eager to get one, and the grant or cession of the site is made by the legislature invariably without any question whatever, and the land is exempted from taxation forever, but to say that eminent domain can be exercised by the United States would mean that it could absolutely own and control the State, and that could never be permitted under the dual form of government which we have.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President——

Mr. SHAFROTH. I yield to the Senator from California.

Mr. WORKS. The Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] fails to distinguish between the power of eminent domain, which is a sovereign power, and the right of the Government or of anybody else to bring an action to condemn land. The two are entirely different. Of course, the Government of the United States can bring an action to condemn land in California or anywhere else for governmental purposes. There is not any doubt about that, but so may any corporation do exactly the same thing. It is not a sovereign right at all. It is simply a right to bring an action under the laws of the State.

Mr. CUMMINS. What I asserted and what I still assert is that in the execution of a granted power in the Constitution Congress can take the private property of citizens in any State for those purposes.

Mr. WORKS. I think the Senator is wrong about that.

Mr. CUMMINS. Suppose a State had not provided any plan for the condemnation of property?

Mr. WORKS. The States provide how property may be condemned within the States——

Mr. CUMMINS. But suppose a given State has not?

Mr. WORKS. And the Government may take advantage of that, just the same as anybody else.

Mr. CUMMINS. Suppose a State has not done so; suppose the State were to repeal every law relating to the condemnation of property for public use and there was no machinery provided at all for that purpose; it is impossible for me to believe that the operations of the Federal Government must cease for the reason that no State has provided a proceeding for taking private property for public use.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Why, Mr. President, the constitution of the State of Colorado, as well as the constitution adopted by every other State, had to be approved by Congress before the State could be admitted into the Union, and that expressly provides for the exercise of the right of eminent domain. The Congress of the United States could have refused to admit the State of Colorado unless such a provision were contained in its constitution.

Mr. CUMMINS. But the State of Colorado could repeal that provision at any time.

Mr. SHAFROTH. It is a constitutional provision, and further it is one of those concessions which no State has ever refused to give to the National Government. It allows it to come in as a suitor; and that gives the right which exists in the United States Government.

Mr. CUMMINS. I understand that is the way in which it is done; but it is impossible for me to conceive that the Government of the United States depends for its existence upon the remedies which may be provided in the States for the assertion of an undoubted right.

Mr. SHAFROTH. And yet, upon the other hand, if the inherent power exists, where is the clause of the Federal Constitution that gives it as a grant to the United States? It can not be pointed out; and the decision of the Supreme Court from which I have quoted says it does not exist in the Federal Government. If the United States Government has a right to exercise eminent domain, which is defined in this very decision as "the right which belongs to the society, or to the sovereign, of disposing, in cases of necessity, and for the public safety, of all the wealth contained in the State," you can readily see that the Government of the United States could wipe out a State, although this Government is the creation of the States themselves. The States never relinquished that power; they were too jealous of that right, and consequently it does not exist in the Federal Government.

Mr. WORKS. If the United States Government should acquire land in the way suggested by the Senator from Iowa it would be simply usurpation and nothing else. It must acquire title to property by legal means in this country, I hope.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Now, Mr. President, I have been diverted from the second part of my remarks.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, will the Senator allow me to ask the Senator from California a question?

Mr. SHAFROTH. Certainly; I yield.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I want to ask the Senator from California when the legislature of a State has conferred upon a public-service corporation, for instance, the right to take land for the accomplishment of the purpose for which it is chartered under a legal proceeding, does he not consider that to be the exercise of the right of eminent domain?

Mr. WORKS. Yes; but the sovereign power comes from the State.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. The sovereign power is the State.

Mr. WORKS. The sovereign power is the State in that instance, and the citizen is simply authorized to take advantage of it under certain terms and conditions by resorting to the courts.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. He is exercising the right of eminent domain as the agent of the State in that case.

Mr. WORKS. Certainly.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I understood the Senator was trying to draw some distinction between the permission to bring a suit, as he stated, and the exercise of the right of eminent domain.

Mr. WORKS. No; not at all. I was trying to draw a distinction between the sovereign right as it exists in the State, and the right of the citizen to maintain an action to condemn land, which is quite another thing.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. As I understand, Mr. President, no citizen has a right to bring an action to condemn land unless he has been authorized by the sovereign.

Mr. WORKS. Certainly not. That is the position I am taking.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. So that there is no distinction between the right which exists and the right which does not exist at all.

Mr. WORKS. Not at all.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Now, let me ask a question of the Senator from Colorado, to whose argument I have listened very patiently. Will he be kind enough to tell me what there is in this bill which authorizes the Government to invade the right of the State of Colorado to control the nonnavigable waters of that State?

Mr. SHAFROTH. By denying the right of eminent domain. Whenever any company or any person is legally constituted to bring a condemnation suit under the laws of the State, they have a right to have the land sought at the valuation that would be placed upon it in a condemnation suit, and whenever the Federal Government attempts to vary that right it abridges the power of eminent domain of the State. If it can say "We will require the payment of 25 cents a horsepower," it can say "We will require $1,000 a horsepower." It differs only in degree; if it has the power in one instance, it has the power in the other. It is a fact that it seizes the law of eminent domain and says, "You can not exercise the right of eminent domain which you have set forth in your statutes and in your constitution." For that reason, the pending bill is an invasion of the sovereignty of the State.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, I may be very dense about this thing, but I do not follow the Senator in his reply. I do not understand him. What I ask the Senator is this: The Government owns certain public lands; the Senator does not deny the authority of the Government to sell them, does he?

Mr. SHAFROTH. No; I do not deny that it owns them for temporary purpose, as stated by the decision from which I have quoted.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Of course the Senator does not deny that it owns them, because it does own them. Does he deny that the Government has a right to sell that which it owns, namely, the public lands?

Mr. SHAFROTH. Certainly it has.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. It has that right?

Mr. SHAFROTH. Yes.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Very well. Does the Senator deny that the Government has the right to lease its public lands?

Mr. SHAFROTH. Yes; I do.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I get something definite now, Mr. President.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I deny that, because a leasing system means permanent holding, because a leasing system does not provide for disposing of the land. A leasing system is the best form of permanent holding that can be devised, and I say it is contrary to the spirit of our institutions. It may be an unlimited lease. The Supreme Court has decided the matter so far as the five-year lease is concerned, and it may be that in a question of that kind the court would decide to recognize the acts of Congress; but if you were to put a law on the statute books of the United States to the effect that the public land shall be leased forever, I have not any doubt that it would be declared unconstitutional.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Whether the power to lease perpetually would be included in the power to sell I do not know. Ordinarily the greater includes the less. However that may be, there is nothing in this bill that proposes a perpetual lease, as I read the bill.

Mr. SHAFROTH. It proposes that. That, of course, is the policy.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I do not see the word "policy" in the bill. What I see in the bill is——

Mr. SHAFROTH. There is no provision that at the end of 20 years or 50 years the leasing shall end; oh no; it is a proposition that these leases shall be extended and renewed forever and forever. That is what it means, and therefore it institutes a permanent leasing system.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Of course, if the leases should be renewed forever and forever, I think, the tenure would be fairly permanent; but the bill, as I understand, provides an alternative. If the lease is not renewed, it provides a process by which the Government may take over the plant and the land and the fixtures which the lessee has placed there.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President——

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Just a moment. But, as I recollect the remarks of the Senator from Montana [Mr. MYERS], yesterday or day before he referred to a decision of the Supreme Court of the United States, in which they held that the General Government had a right to lease its public land. Whether it was for a period of 5 years or 10 years would not seem to me a question upon which the Supreme Court would decide "yes" in one case and "no" in another. If they have the right to lease for 10 years, they have the right to lease for 50 years. So far as I can see, there is nothing unconstitutional in that regard in this bill.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President——

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I can hardly yield to the Senator, because I am myself the recipient of the courtesy of the Senator from Colorado.

Mr. WORKS. I merely want to ask the Senator from Connecticut a question. Suppose under this bill the Government should lease the land for 50 years, fixing the price to be paid according to the amount of water used or the power developed, and should provide when the dam, or whatever structure may be necessary, shall be constructed, when the work shall be commenced and when it shall be completed, and the lessee takes possession under a law of that kind, does the Senator think that under the laws of California some utility corporation could condemn the land for the purposes of irrigation, for example, under those conditions?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, the Senator is raising a collateral question.

Mr. WORKS. No; I am not, Mr. President. I beg the Senator's pardon. That is the very issue that is involved in this bill.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. It may be one of the issues involved in the bill or one of the objections to the bill which the Senator may have in mind that the State of California may not be able to condemn the public lands of the Government which the Government has leased to somebody for a period of years. Whether they have that right or whether they do not is a matter of law, which it is not necessary to consider in connection with this bill, so far as the authority of Congress to pass it is concerned. The fact, Mr. President, that under section 8 the "charges or rentals for the land leased may, in the discretion of the Secretary, be measured by the power developed and sold" is no argument at all against the power of Congress to lease the land. They could well say that the amount charged for the lease of the land shall be based upon its availability for a water-power site, or upon its availability for anything else; and they can put into the lease, if they have a right to lease the public lands, any conditions that they have a mind to, or that the two parties have a mind to contract for, as to how a dam shall be built, or how power shall be distributed. If the permittee or the lessee has a mind to agree to those conditions, it is nothing but a matter of contract between the parties, as it seems to me.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President, the Senator has not quite answered my question, because he has not included in what he has said all of the conditions that are embraced in the question. I think, however, the Senator is utterly mistaken in the view he takes that the Government may, by a mere condition in a lease, deprive a State of its sovereign power to control the waters of the stream; and that is precisely what they are attempting to do. It has been insisted upon heretofore, when we were discussing the other bill, that that might be done; but I think the Senator is mistaken in respect to that particular feature of the bill.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Of course I may be mistaken as to all of them. I do not know. I simply have an opinion about it. I say because the bill provides that the compensation or lease money for the land may, in the discretion of the Secretary, be determined by the number of horsepower developed on the water which flows by the land, that is a reasonable rule, if Congress wants to make it, for the determination of the lease money. The fact that it says that does not at all constitute an invasion upon the right of the State to control its own water power. In fact, the bill in two sections distinctly provides that the lessee must have first obtained from the State the right to exercise whatever rights he is going to exercise in the water power. The Government owns the land by the water and says: "We will lease to that man." Now, I can not see what there can be unconstitutional about that.

Mr. WORKS. The Senator entirely overlooks the fact that the matter of fixing the rates that shall be charged for the use of the water, whether it be for the development of power or for irrigation or for anything else, is a power that rests with the State. Here is an attempt to fix the value of the water that is to be used upon the basis of the amount of power that it will develop, which is a distinct invasion of the rights of the State.

Mr. SHAFROTH and Mr. MYERS addressed the Chair.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. There is no right of the State involved. A contract is being made between the United States Government and an individual or a municipality for the lease of real estate; and the two parties agree that one of them will pay, as rental for that real estate, an amount to be determined by the number of horsepower to be developed by the water in an adjoining stream. They might just as well agree, and could legally agree, that the rent should be determined by a board of appraisers upon the basis of the population of the State, if they had wanted to do so.

Mr. SHAFROTH. No; let me call the attention of the Senator to the fact that while he is talking about the two contractual parties, he entirely overlooks the State. The State has an interest here, and it has the power to say that in certain proceedings certain rules shall be followed in determining what the land is worth.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. The bill leaves the State just where it stands now, as I read the bill, because the bill provides that the Secretary of the Interior can not lease the public lands under this bill except in accordance with the laws of the State where the lands lie, and that they can not be leased by anybody who has not obeyed the laws of the State as to the use of the waters within that State. How can that constitute an invasion of the powers of the State to control the water?

Mr. SHAFROTH. Let me ask the Senator from Connecticut a question. Suppose, up in the State of Connecticut, the United States Government should buy a tract of land of, say, 300 acres, a natural water-power site. Can it be possible that when a person should want to improve that water-power site and construct a power plant there, the United States could step in and say: "I require so much per horsepower that may be generated there, and if you do not pay that you can not erect the plant"?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Why, Mr. President, if the United States should buy land in the State of Connecticut, it would have all the rights to the use of that real estate that a private proprietor would have.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Certainly.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. The Senator is aware that the laws as to water rights in the Eastern States are entirely different from the laws as to water rights in the semiarid States.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Not with respect to that.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Absolutely so.

Mr. SHAFROTH. The Government owns these lands in the State of Colorado as a proprietor only, and does not exercise any sovereignty over them. Consequently it is just the same as if it were to buy 300 acres on the Connecticut River and a person should come by and say, "I want that land for a power site." Is it possible that the United States Government could say: "I will not let you have it unless you give me a certain percentage of the water that flows by here"? Why, certainly not. It has only the rights of an individual. Therefore this bill, which attempts to make its rights different, invades the sovereignty of the State, and it should not be permitted to do it.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, I repeat that if the United States Government buys land in a New England State it has just the same rights—no more and no less—that a citizen would have. The citizen in the Senator's State has no such rights in the nonnavigable waters flowing over the lands which he owns as the citizen does in my State.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Oh, yes.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Well, I say, oh, no.

Mr. SHAFROTH. So far as this right of condemnation is concerned, he has.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I am not talking about condemnation.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Of course, the question as between riparian owners does not affect this question in any way whatever.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. In the Senator's State the State controls the waters.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Certainly.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. The proprietor does not. In my State the proprietor owns to the center of the stream. If the stream is on his own land, he has the right to dam it up without saying anything to the State. He has the right to use it for domestic purposes and for power purposes. The rule is entirely different in the Western States; but that is a side issue. That has nothing to do with this matter.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Then is it possible that in order to establish a water-power plant in the Senator's part of the country it becomes necessary to condemn the right of every person along the river, from the source to the mouth?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Why, Mr. President, you can not dam up a stream in my State to make an ice pond without compensating the proprietors lower down on the stream for whatever water you hold back from them.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I will state to the Senator that every one of the States that is to be the subject of this bill has the rule as it exists in my State, and not as it exists in the Senator's State.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I agree to that, and I agree that it is perfectly immaterial. The Senator is lugging in the law about the New England water rights, which has nothing to do with this bill. I did not bring it in. I say to the Senator that under the terms of this bill, as I read it and in my opinion, every State will have the control of its waters after the passage of this bill just as much as it does now.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Oh, no; it will not.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Only the United States, having leased a piece of land bordering upon a stream in a semiarid State, collects as rent, by agreement with the lessee, a sum which may, under the language of the bill, in the discretion of the Secretary of the Interior, be equivalent to so much a horsepower as developed by the power plant that is located there. The fact that you refer to the number of horsepower that may be developed as a possible measure of the rental money under a lease of real estate can not, it seems to me, be construed by any clear-minded man as an invasion by the United States of the water rights of the State.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Why, the Senator admits the power that he claims exists, regardless of whether it is double or treble or quadruple the value of the land. Now, if that is true, we are absolutely changing the power of eminent domain, which says that the value shall be as fixed under the procedure of the State and as defined by the State; and whenever we do that we are taking away the sovereignty of the State.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. It is not a question of eminent domain. It is a question of how much the lessee shall pay to the United States Government. There is no condemnation proceeding whatever involved. In the case suggested by the Senator from California [Mr. WORKS], a supposititious case, he asked what would be the situation if, after the power plant had been built upon the land leased by the Government to the person who had previously obtained from the State of California the right to use the water, California as a State wanted to come in and condemn the whole property, the land owned by the Government, subject to a lease to a citizen who had the right under the laws of California to use the water. That is a question which I would want to look up, perhaps, before I answered it. Perhaps the Senator has looked it up.

Mr. WORKS. The Senator from Connecticut is quite right in saying that the Government of the United States has the right to make such a contract as it desires to make respecting this land by way of lease, if that is not in violation of the Constitution, or by way of sale, just the same as any private individual can do, and to no greater extent. It is simply a proprietary owner of the land. As such, in these irrigated States it has no control over the water. It has not even any riparian rights. Now, if a private individual under those circumstances should execute a lease of this kind, and impose the conditions that are imposed in the lease, he could make it, unquestionably, but those provisions would be absolutely void. That is precisely the condition where the Government undertakes to deal with it in the same way. These provisions, undertaking to control the use of the water by the State, while they may be contained in the contract of lease, are absolutely void as against the State or anybody who seeks to obtain title to the water under the laws of the State.

I think the Senator from Connecticut has overlooked that feature of the situation in dealing with this question of the right of the Government to impose conditions. It has a right to impose such conditions as are not in conflict with the laws of the State. It has no right to impose them if they are in violation of the laws of the State.

Mr. BORAH. In other words, any contract which the Government makes with reference to its land is the same as if John Doe or Richard Roe should go in, owning that land, and make the same contract. It is subject to the laws of the State and to the direction of the State.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I have assumed that the laws of the State have been complied with, under the terms of the bill, before the Government makes the lease to the party.

Mr. SHAFROTH. They have not been complied with under the procedure of eminent domain.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I do not like to have the gory locks of that spectre shaken at me again, because I am not talking about eminent domain.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President, the question of eminent domain, of course, is not the only question involved here. Now, I am perfectly satisfied that under the laws of the State of California it would be utterly impossible to comply with these conditions. Then what would you do?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I should say that the Senator would not be damaged at all if that was the case.

Mr. WORKS. Still, the law itself may be void in its terms if it attempts to do that; and certainly Congress does not want to do that.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. If the conditions of a lease are impossible of execution, I suppose the lease would be set aside; but what has that to do with the question? What conditions are impossible of execution in the State of California under this bill?

Mr. WORKS. For instance, it is required that before the construction of the works can be begun the law of California must be complied with, and the right to take out the water must be acquired. Under the laws of California, all that you can do is to get a permit in the first instance to take out the water, and to construct the necessary dams under that statute; and the party gets no right at all to the water until the construction is actually completed and approved by the State authorities. Therefore, it is utterly impossible for the laws of the State of California to be complied with before this work commences.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Then I should think clearly the bill could not operate in the Senator's State.

Mr. POINDEXTER and Mr. WALSH addressed the Chair.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I think the Senator from Washington rose first. I will yield first to him, and then to the Senator from Montana.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I simply wished to comment on the Senator's statement that Congress has no power, under the constitutional term "dispose of * * * the territory or other property belonging to the United States," to lease the public lands.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Oh, there was a decision rendered in the Missouri case about 1846 or 1847 which held that the United States did have a right to lease; that it was not a determination to dispose of the land, and it was a five-year lease. It was a case involving the lead mines in Missouri. Senator Benton was the man who fought the leasing system in those days, and he carried it to the extent of becoming counsel in the case in the Supreme Court of the United States.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Yes. I want to quote just a word from what Mr. Benton said in that case to show that the identical argument which the Senator from Colorado is making now was made then. I read from the case of The United States, plaintiff in error, against John P. Gratiot, et al., defendants in error, reported in Fourteenth Peters, at page 526. I read first from the argument of counsel for the defendant, Mr. Benton, on page 532:

> The position has been assumed by the Attorney General that the United States may enter into the broad business of leasing the public lands, and, by consequence, that the President may have as many tenants on the public lands of the United States as he shall desire; that he may lease in perpetuity, and have those tenants to the extent of time. Such a power is solemnly protested against.

That is quite parallel to the attitude of the Senator from Colorado.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Yes; I have made a protest or two.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. Benton proceeded:

> No authority in the cession of the public lands to the United States is given but to dispose of them and to make rules and regulations respecting the preparation of them for sale, for their preservation, and their sale.

The Supreme Court in deciding the case uses this language, at page 538. I will read only a line:

> The words "dispose of" can not receive the construction contended for at the bar; that they vest in Congress the power only to sell and not to lease such lands. The disposal must be left to the discretion of Congress. And there can be no apprehensions of any encroachments upon State rights by the creation of a numerous tenantry within their borders, as has been so strenuously urged in the argument.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Yes. Now, Mr. President, nearly all of these decisions refer to this exercise of ownership of the public lands of a temporary nature, as is contained in this later decision. The statement is made that it is for a temporary purpose.

> The right of Alabama and every other new State to exercise all the powers of government which belong to and may be exercised by the original States of the Union must be admitted and remain unquestioned, except so far as they are temporarily deprived of control over the public lands.

That is the situation. Not only that, but time and again, in decisions of the Supreme Court, this right of the Government is considered a right to hold the lands in trust for the people until disposed of; and for 125 years the policy has been to dispose of them, and not to lease them. Consequently, if there was nothing else but a construction of the past acts of Congress with relation to the disposition of the public lands, together with the fact that we were brought into the Union by an enabling act confirming the rights of the various States as being upon an equal footing, that would show that there has been such a construction placed upon that expression in the Constitution, "dispose of," as indicated sale or parting of title, and consequently, with that construction, Colorado was admitted into the Union. Is it possible, under those circumstances, that it is right for the Government to change it? Is there not an implied contract upon the part of the Government, even if it were not in violation of the Constitution, to adhere to that principle that existed at the time Colorado consented to become a State of the Union?

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President——

Mr. SHAFROTH. I yield to the Senator from Montana.

Mr. WALSH. I thank the Senator from Colorado, although it may bring neither comfort nor satisfaction to him. I desire to say to the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BRANDEGEE] that, in my humble judgment, the views expressed by him concerning this matter are eminently sound and the arguments advanced are altogether unanswerable. It is exceedingly gratifying that a lawyer from the East, having listened to the discussion of this question, takes so readily the view of it that he has announced.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. If the Senator will allow me, I should like to ask the Senator from Idaho a question bearing on that matter.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Certainly.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Does not the Senator from Idaho think that the Government has a right to lease these public lands?

Mr. BORAH. I have not any doubt about that, at least for a limited period.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. What does the Senator complain of in this bill, then?

Mr. BORAH. I complain, in the first place, that it is a leasing system; that as a matter of policy it is wrong, because it is a leasing system. Let us suppose that the little State of Connecticut——

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Just a minute.

Mr. BORAH. Wait just a moment.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I agree that people can well differ about that; but, I mean, what does the Senator claim there is illegal or unconstitutional in the bill?

Mr. BORAH. I have not yet discussed that question at all.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Oh, very well.

Mr. BORAH. But here is the proposition: As a practical proposition, suppose that the State of Connecticut, like the State of Idaho, had 82 per cent of its entire area under the control of the National Government, and suppose that a leasing system were being introduced in the National Congress which had for its ultimate object the holding of that 82 per cent in the control of the National Government for all time to come. As a matter of policy it reaches almost to the dignity of a constitutional question, because in effect it deprives us of Statehood. It deprives us of the ability to build up those institutions which are indispensable to Statehood. As a practical proposition, it transfers the local affairs, the local conditions, and our local institutions to control at Washington. It is in violation of the entire spirit of our dual form of government. It destroys local self-government without which we can have no States. It is a vicious policy and its constitutionality involves other and graver constitutional questions than the mere power of the National Government to lease lands.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, I am perfectly familiar with that objection to this class of measures. The Senator's former colleague, Senator Heyburn, felt very deeply about that subject, principally in relation to the subject of forest reserves, and the amount of lands that were withdrawn for that purpose.

I appreciate the difficulty under which the western Senators labor when they picture that large portions of their States are to be withdrawn for years—and in some cases forever—from taxation, and so forth; but I was not discussing those subjects. I think I would sympathize very much with the Senators who are situated in those States in their views on the wisdom of that policy. I supposed, however, that the objections which were being made to this bill were legal and constitutional, and I was looking at it solely with that in view.

Mr. BORAH. I do not mean to say that there are not legal and constitutional questions involved in the matter, because, ultimately, by the processes provided for in this bill, the National Government does come to own these power plants and the water rights which are attached to them. If the lease expires and the Government takes over the property, and so forth, the Government, through a process which we claim is not constitutional, comes ultimately to own these properties and to control them and to prevent our developing in the way that the local authorities might seem to think best for the purpose of development.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I see that, of course. I was not discussing that at all, however.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I expect to treat this question from a practical standpoint, if I can get to it.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from Colorado a question.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I yield to the Senator from Montana.

Mr. MYERS. If this bill should provide that the compensation for the use of the land should be regulated by the amount of cubic feet per second which flows past in a stream, would that be any invasion of the rights of the State over the control of the waters?

Mr. SHAFROTH. Why, that is practically the way measurements are made.

Mr. MYERS. But if this bill should provide that the rental price of the land should be fixed according to the number of cubic feet per second of water that flow by in a stream, would that be any invasion of the rights of the State to control the water?

Mr. SHAFROTH. I think so, because the State has prescribed another way of ascertaining the value of the land.

Mr. MYERS. If the bill should say that if a thousand cubic feet per second flow by the land it shall be worth ten times as much as if a hundred cubic feet per second flow by the land, would that be any infringement on the rights of the State?

Mr. SHAFROTH. Yes; because——

Mr. MYERS. I can not see that at all.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Because the State has prescribed a certain measure of value in condemnation proceedings; and whenever you attempt to set up a different measure, whether it is for the benefit of the State or to the detriment of the State, it is an invasion of the right. If the State says they can get land upon payment of just compensation, that is the requirement, and it must not be measured by what the stream is worth or how much the water is worth.

Mr. MYERS. It must not have anything to do with the stream?

Mr. SHAFROTH. No, sir; because the State has the power of eminent domain, and if it waives that, or if it is superseded by the National Government prescribing another way of doing it, it is an invasion of the sovereignty of the State.

Mr. MYERS. All right. Now let me ask the Senator another question. Suppose this bill becomes a law just as it is, and suppose the Legislature of the State of Colorado enacts a law providing that nobody shall be allowed to appropriate any water of the flowing streams of that State for the purpose of generating hydroelectric power in connection with land leased from the Federal Government, nor shall any of the waters be so used, and forbids any man from appropriating any of the waters of a stream to be used under a lease in this bill. Would that law be effective?

Mr. SHAFROTH. Why, certainly not, because the constitution of the State of Colorado prescribes absolutely that the waters shall be used for this purpose.

Mr. MYERS. Then this is no invasion of your constitutional rights?

Mr. SHAFROTH. Oh, no. Here is the invasion of them: We have the power of eminent domain. The Federal Government has not the power of eminent domain. When we have a law of eminent domain, if the Federal Government comes in and says that such another mode of procedure or such another way of ascertaining the value shall exist in that State, it is an invasion of that right.

Mr. MYERS. The Senator always gets off on the right of eminent domain. That has nothing whatever to do with the question.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I think it has. I think that is the measure.

Mr. MYERS. Suppose a citizen of the State now has the right of exercising the power of eminent domain on United States lands: Can this bill take it away, or lessen that right in any degree?

Mr. SHAFROTH. It evidently practically takes it away as to the United States Government.

Mr. MYERS. Can you not condemn subject to the lease?

Mr. SHAFROTH. Why, you would never make any headway against the Government.

Mr. MYERS. But in the case of anybody who wanted to condemn, you would not take away the right?

Mr. SHAFROTH. Oh, no. You would find that it would cost so much that it would be impossible to condemn; but if you want to do what this bill is intended to accomplish—namely, that you shall get a revenue out of the waters of the State—that is just what you are doing.

Mr. MYERS. Why, the bill expressly disclaims that.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Oh, yes; it disclaims it, but it makes it so that nothing can be done unless that charge is made. If you were to pass such a law as that, and say in direct terms that the United States Government shall get a revenue out of the water, you would find that no one would agree that such an act would be constitutional; and yet in effect, indirectly, you are doing that identical thing.

Now, I want to call attention, if I may resume where I left off before the interruption, to this decision in Kansas versus Colorado. I explained the nature of the decision, and I want to read from page 92 of Two hundred and sixth United States Reports:

> As to those lands within the limits of the States, at least of the Western States, the National Government is the most considerable owner and has power to dispose of and make all needful rules and regulations respecting its property. We do not mean that its legislation can override State laws in respect to the general subject of reclamation. While arid lands are to be found mainly, if not only, in the Western and newer States, yet the powers of the National Government within the limits of those States are the same—no greater and no less—than those within the limits of the original 13, and it would be strange if, in the absence of a definite grant of power, the National Government could enter the territory of the States along the Atlantic and legislate in respect to improving by irrigation or otherwise the lands within their borders. Nor do we understand that hitherto Congress has acted in disregard to this limitation.

> But it is useless to pursue the inquiry further in this direction. It is enough for the purposes of this case that each State has full jurisdiction over the lands within its borders, including the beds of streams and other waters.

And again, on page 94:

> Such title being in the State, the lands are subject to State regulation and control, under the condition, however, of not interfering with the regulations which may be made by Congress with regard to public navigation and commerce. * * * Sometimes large areas so reclaimed are occupied—

And so forth.

That does not bear upon the question.

Mr. President, it seems to me this decision in the case of Kansas against Colorado, which says that the ownership of the Federal Government with relation to water is identically the same as the ownership of it in the New England States or in the Original Thirteen States, ought to make it clear that the Federal Government has no right directly to make any tax or interfere with the policy of the State as to the water, and whenever it undertakes a leasing system prescribing compensation for property taken in violation of the eminent domain of the State it seems to me that it is doing not only what is wrong but which, if expressed in clear language as the intent and meaning of this act, would be unconstitutional. It may be that its wording may be in such an indirect manner that the court would not declare it to be unconstitutional, but it seems to me that it would and must if the direct meaning of the act could be clearly shown to be the purpose of the bill.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. LEA of Tennessee in the chair). Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. SHAFROTH. Yes; I yield to the Senator.

Mr. CUMMINS. I recognize that the point we were discussing a few moments ago is not very relevant to the bill, but I am sure the Senator from Colorado desires to be right in the matter, and I want now to ask him to examine three rather recent cases of the Supreme Court of the United States which I shall cite to him, all of which hold directly that the United States has the sovereign power of eminent domain to carry out any power that is granted to it in the Constitution.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Yes; any governmental power.

Mr. CUMMINS. Any governmental power. Of course it has no power to exercise the right of eminent domain in order to effectuate its purposes merely as a proprietor.

Mr. SHAFROTH. There is no governmental power to take any water.

Mr. CUMMINS. I agree with the Senator from Colorado about that, but I was concerned with the principle which he announced with respect to the power of the General Government. The cases are Kohl against United States, in Ninety-first United States, at page 371; Fort Leavenworth Railroad Co. against Lowe, in One hundred and fourteenth United States, at page 531, and the Cherokee Nation against The Kansas Railway Co., in One hundred and thirty-fifth United States, at page 657. The only reason why I asked the Senator from Colorado the question is because I think it is intimately connected with another proposition which he made yesterday, in which I concur with him, namely, I think the State of Colorado has the right to condemn the public land of the United States within the limits of Colorado which is not being used for some governmental purpose, and these two things are rather closely connected with each other.

Mr. SHAFROTH. What is the page of the last decision, please?

Mr. CUMMINS. The page from which I would read, if I were citing the case to a court, is page 641.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Thank you.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Has the Senator from Iowa among the cases the one which involved the condemnation of land forming part of the battle field of Gettysburg?

Mr. CUMMINS. No. I supposed that, of course——

Mr. SUTHERLAND. That is an exceedingly strong case.

Mr. CUMMINS. That would be a very strong case in favor of the proposition I made. I did not suggest that, because I have always been gravely in doubt whether the purpose of taking property there was a purpose within a grant in the Constitution.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. The Supreme Court held that it was.

Mr. CUMMINS. It held that it was, and that the United States could condemn it.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I did not suppose that there was any doubt about the power.

Mr. CUMMINS. It was denied a few moments ago that the United States had any power of eminent domain as a sovereign power, and that it could not go into any State against the will of that State and take property for any governmental purpose.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I should like to cite to the Senator from Utah, if he doubts this proposition, the statement concerning the matter in Pollard's Lessee versus Hagan. All the proceedings by the United States are under and by virtue of the laws of the State, and this goes upon the theory that there is no delegated power which gives the right of eminent domain to the United States, and that therefore it does not possess it; but the Federal Government in the exercise of any of its functions to acquire land for peculiarly governmental purposes has a right to condemn under the very laws of the State, and those laws have been required in the constitution of every State which has been admitted into the Union.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. It seems to me the General Government may exercise the right of eminent domain to acquire lands whenever that is necessary to enable it to carry out any governmental purpose.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Certainly.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. And when it does it exercises its own power. It does not condemn under the laws of the State. It is one of the powers that are included in the general clause of the Constitution, which confers the so-called implied power to pass laws necessary to carry into execution the granted powers. Whenever the General Government has the power to do any particular thing, it has as an incident to it all the necessary subsidiary power, and it has it as a matter of its own right and not by virtue of the laws of some State, as I understand it.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Of course there is not any doubt but that the Federal Government has the right in things that are governmental to exercise not its sovereign power of eminent domain, but the sovereign power of the State in eminent domain. Let me read this decision.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Let me call the Senator's attention to the case I spoke of a moment ago; that is, the Gettysburg case. What was done there in the way of condemning and taking land was done under an act of Congress.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Certainly.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Not under the law of the State of Pennsylvania, where the battle field is situated.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I do not know whether the act of Congress prescribes what should be done, but I want to call the Senator's attention to this very decision. It seems to me that it is so clear there can not be any doubt about it:

> The right which belongs to the society or to the sovereign of disposing in case of necessity and for the public safety of all the wealth contained in the State is called the eminent domain. It is evident that this right is in certain cases necessary to him who governs, and is consequently a part of the empire or sovereign power. (Vat. Law of Nations, sec. 244.) This definition shows that the eminent domain, although a sovereign power, does not include all sovereign power, and this explains the sense in which it is used in this opinion. The compact made between the United States and the State of Georgia was sanctioned by the Constitution of the United States, by the third section of the fourth article of which it is declared, that "new States may be admitted by the Congress into this union, but no new State shall be formed or created within the jurisdiction of any other State, nor any State be formed by the junction of two or more States or parts of States without the consent of the legislatures of the States concerned, as well as of Congress.
> When Alabama was admitted into the Union on an equal footing with the original States she succeeded to all the rights of sovereignty, jurisdiction, and eminent domain which Georgia possessed at the date of the cession, except so far as this right was diminished by the public lands remaining in the possession and under the control of the United States for the temporary purposes provided for in the deed of cession and the legislative acts connected with it. Nothing remained to the United States, according to the terms of the agreement, but the public lands. And if an express stipulation had been inserted in the agreement granting the municipal right of sovereignty and eminent domain to the United States such stipulation would have been void and inoperative, because the United States have no constitutional capacity to exercise municipal jurisdiction, sovereignty, or eminent domain within the limits of a State or elsewhere, except in the cases in which it is expressly granted—

For temporary purposes.

Mr. President, we get confused in regard to the United States attempting to condemn something. It is not condemning something by virtue of its power of condemnation. It is condemning it by reason of the fact that it is for a public purpose, just like an individual or a company must condemn for something within the charter of the company, and it has a right to exercise the eminent domain of the State for that purpose. But evidently that decision is very plain.

Mr. CUMMINS and Mr. SUTHERLAND addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Colorado yield, and if so, to whom?

Mr. SHAFROTH. I yield first to the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. CUMMINS. I only have to say that there is nothing in these later opinions in conflict with the case from which the Senator from Colorado has just read, when they are examined closely.

Of course the United States has no power of eminent domain with respect to the municipal affairs of the State of Alabama, and, of course, the State of Colorado has the entire sovereignty in eminent domain so far as her laws and her sovereignty are concerned. But the proposition laid down in these cases is that when the Constitution has granted to the Federal Government a certain power or function, then with regard to that function the Federal Government is supreme; it has all the attributes and characteristics of sovereignty, and can employ all the powers of sovereignty, including that of eminent domain.

There are two of the cases to which I have called the Senator's attention in which the right of eminent domain has been granted by Congress. In one of them Congress granted a right of way across the Cherokee Indian lands and granted to the railway company which was to occupy the right of way the power of eminent domain. Another case arose in Minnesota where another had granted the power of eminent domain, and the suit was prosecuted in the courts of the United States, without any respect to, or any authority from, the laws of the State.

I beg the Senator's pardon for injecting this in his speech. I recognize that it is not very material to the argument he is making, but I think we ought to keep our views with regard to the power of the United States as straight as we can, and not to judge or determine the merits of this bill upon a false conception with regard to the supremacy or sovereignty of the United States.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, I will examine the authority to which the Senator has referred; but if the power of eminent domain exists in the National Government, would it not exist to the full extent that it may be desired to exercise it for a governmental purpose?

Mr. CUMMINS. Precisely; for no other purpose. It must be limited to the accomplishment or carrying out of a power that is granted by the States to the General Government.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Now, suppose, Mr. President, that the Congress of the United States should say that we want all of Colorado as a military reservation. That is within the power of the Government to exercise for the purpose of exercising its right to designate and to acquire things for governmental purposes. But suppose it should say we will acquire all of Colorado. You can wipe out a State if that power of eminent domain exists in the Federal Government.

There is confusion, it seems to me, upon the part of Senators who have disputed this proposition as to where the power of eminent domain exists. It exists in the State. It does not exist in the Federal Government, but the Federal Government can appeal and in the process of the eminent-domain power of the State acquire anything it wants for governmental purposes. But it can not wipe out a State. If it has this power of eminent domain, it has it against the State. The State has never ceded it to the Federal Government, and inasmuch as this decision which I have read in Kansas against Colorado says that unless it is in the grant it does not exist in the Federal Government, for that reason it seems to me, as to this power of eminent domain, it is an important matter now to determine as to whether the Government can take that which exists owned by the State and thus cripple the State's power of eminent domain over the waters of a State.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Delaware?

Mr. SHAFROTH. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Has the Senator considered in connection with the argument he has just made the limitation upon the power of the United States respecting "the erection of forts, magazines, arsenals, dockyards, and other needful buildings" contained in section 8 of Article 1 of the Constitution?

Mr. SHAFROTH. Certainly I have, and unquestionably the question is not whether the United States can exercise the power of eminent domain of the State for the purpose of acquiring that. It can. There is no doubt but that the Federal Government can appeal to the State and to the procedure of the State, where certain rules and regulations are prescribed, and acquire a site there. It can do that.

Mr. SAULSBURY. With the consent of the legislature.

Mr. SHAFROTH. With the consent of the legislature.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Precisely.

Mr. SHAFROTH. But it requires the consent of the legislature; and that very fact shows that the power of eminent domain does not exist independently in the National Government itself.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I will state to the Senator from Colorado that my interruption was a friendly one, as I had not heard him discuss that provision. It seems perfectly applicable to the present stage of the discussion.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Yes, sir. I thank the Senator very much.

Mr. CHILTON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from West Virginia?

Mr. SHAFROTH. I yield.

Mr. CHILTON. In the case of Fort Leavenworth Railroad Co. v. Lowe (114 U. S., p. 531), in disposing of this very question, the Supreme Court says:

> The General Government is not dependent upon the caprice of individuals or the will of State legislatures in the acquisition of such lands as may be required for the full and effective exercise of its powers.

I have run that down, and I will assure the Senator from Colorado that there can not be any doubt about it. It has been discussed and the proposition of law is exactly as stated by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS]. The reasons why the courts have so held are fully set forth in the decisions. I did not want to interrupt the Senator, but there is no question in the world but that the Supreme Court has settled the docrine just as I have read it.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Well, the Senator from West Virginia has heard the comment which I made just a while ago from the decision in Third Howard, in which it was directly stated that the Government had no power of eminent domain inherent in itself; and unquestionably that is settled by the decision in the case of Kansas against Colorado, to which I referred and which was a recent decision, more recent even than the one from which the Senator from West Virginia has just read. It seems to me that it is very plain and clear. In that decision, Two hundred and sixth United States Reports, page 46, it is stated:

> The Government of the United States is one of enumerated powers; that it has no inherent powers of sovereignty; that the enumeration of the powers granted is to be found in the Constitution of the United States, and in that alone; that the manifest purpose of the tenth amendment of the Constitution is to put beyond dispute the proposition that all powers not granted are reserved to the people, and that if, in the changes of the years, further powers ought to be possessed by Congress, they must be obtained by a new grant from the people. While Congress has general legislative jurisdiction over the Territories and may control the flow of waters in their streams, it has no power to control a like flow within the limits of a State except to preserve or improve the navigability of the stream, that the full control over those waters is, subject to the exception named, vested in the State. Hence the intervening petition of the United States is dismissed, without prejudice to any action which it may see fit to take in respect to the use of the water for maintaining or improving the navigability of the river.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President, I understood the Senator from Colorado a moment ago, in a colloquy with the Senator from Delaware [Mr. SAULSBURY], to assent to an assertion made by the Senator from Delaware, that the Government of the United States could not condemn a site for a post office in a State without the consent of the State. Did I understand that statement correctly?

Mr. SHAFROTH. I am inclined to think that is correct. It is always done; I know that.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President, I think both Senators are confusing the question of the power of eminent domain with the question of jurisdiction over the land which constitutes the site after it may be acquired by the General Government. Before the General Government can exercise exclusive jurisdiction over the land which it has acquired for a post-office site it must have the consent of the State.

Mr. SHAFROTH. There is no doubt of that.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. But if the United States has the power to build a post office, which undoubtedly it has——

Mr. SHAFROTH. Yes.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Then it has necessarily every subsidiary power that may be necessary to enable it to acquire the site for the post office.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I have not any doubt that the United States——

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Just a moment. If the Senator from Colorado is right, that the United States Government must obtain the consent of the State before it can do that, then it exercises its power at the sufferance of the State, and the State may prevent it if it passes appropriate legislation. Now, if the Senator will permit me——

Mr. SAULSBURY. May I suggest that I made no such statement as that attributed to me by the Senator from Utah?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. That is set at rest, it seems to me, by the decision, which I called attention to a moment ago, in the Gettysburg case.

Mr. SAULSBURY. If I may interrupt the Senator, I wish to say that I made no such assertion as that attributed to me by the Senator.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I perhaps misunderstood the Senator, but I understood that that was his statement, and that the Senator from Colorado assented to it.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President——

Mr. SUTHERLAND. If the Senator will pardon me a moment——

Mr. SHAFROTH. I wish the Senator to bear in mind that the Government has, by reason of its right to build post offices under the eminent-domain act of the State, a right to come in and condemn; it does not require an act of the legislature, except to cede jurisdiction.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. No.

Mr. SHAFROTH. But it does seem to me that it is exercising the power of eminent domain when it is going into a State.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. No; Mr. President, I can not assent to that. The Government of the United States, when it exercises the power of eminent domain to carry out one of its legitimate functions, exercises that power under the Constitution of the United States. If it has the power to do a thing, it has impliedly all subsidiary powers which are necessary to enable it to effectuate the power which is conferred.

Let me read the Senator what was said in the case of the United States against Gettysburg Electric Railway, a case to which I directed attention a moment ago. It is reported in 160 United States. I will read from page 680.

> Upon the question whether the proposed use of this land is a public one, we think there can be no well-founded doubt. And also, in our judgment, the Government has the constitutional power—

That means the power under the Constitution of the United States, not under some State constitution or under the laws of some State—

> The Government has the constitutional power to condemn the land for the proposed use. It is, of course, not necessary that the power of condemnation for such purpose be expressly given by the Constitution. The right to condemn at all is not so given. It results from the powers that are given, and it is implied because of its necessity and because it is appropriate in exercising those powers.

Nothing could be clearer or more explicit than that.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I do not think anything could be more explicit than the language which I have read, which has been approved time and time again. I will read it once more:

> And if an express stipulation had been inserted in the agreement granting the municipal right of sovereignty and eminent domain to the United States, such stipulation would have been void and inoperative, because the United States have no constitutional capacity to exercise municipal jurisdiction, sovereignty, or eminent domain within the limits of a State.

It seems to me, Mr. President, that that is a clear authority, and it has been approved in any number of cases, and it is one of the leading cases in the United States.

Mr. President, it seems to me that it is clear from these decisions—and we have been diverted by a discussion of the question of eminent domain—that the Government of the United States possesses no ownership in the waters of nonnavigable streams, and, under the case in Third Howard cited by me, I expected to invoke the principle that the United States Government had no right by any indirect method to do that which it could not do directly. I was interrupted by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS], because of a statement which I had made, and the discussion has traveled somewhat afield from the original proposition, but I believe that the authority is plain and clear and recognized by all that if the United States should attempt to lease, in a State, the waters of a nonnavigable stream, it would be held to be an absolutely unconstitutional act on its face, and that the Supreme Court of the United States would so declare. Under the pending bill the United States seeks to do indirectly what it can not do directly. That being the case, it seems to me this bill is in effect, although couched in words which might by liberal construction bear the intent and interpretation that it was not designed to effectuate that kind of Federal control, in violation of the Constitution. It may be that because of the indirect language used it might not be so held by a court, just as the courts have held that the Government can lease for a limited period of time; but I have no doubt that if land were attempted to be leased forever, so as to prevent the opportunity of sale, and if that should be stated to be the policy of the Government to lease its lands forever, it would be declared by the Supreme Court of the United States unconstitutional, because the Constitution provides that public lands shall be disposed of, and leasing forever is not a disposition, but is a permanent holding. I will resume the discussion of the provisions of the bill to-morrow.

Mr. SMOOT. I inquire if the Senator from Colorado desires to proceed further this afternoon? The hour is rather late.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I would prefer, if it be agreeable to the Senate, to suspend at this time and yield for an adjournment.

MILITARY PREPAREDNESS.

Mr. McCUMBER. I desire to give notice that to-morrow morning, immediately after the close of the routine morning business, with the permission of the Senate, I shall submit some remarks on certain phases of the so-called preparedness program.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, in relation to what the Senator from North Dakota has just said, I favor taking a recess until to-morrow. He could, however, deliver his remarks immediately upon the meeting of the Senate at the expiration of the recess with the unfinished business pending. The taking of a recess would not prevent him from making his remarks.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I hope the Senator from Montana will not move a recess. I desire to report the military reorganization bill, if I can get the opportunity to do so, to-morrow morning.

STATUE OF HENRY MOWER RICE.

Mr. CHILTON. From the Committee on Printing, I desire to make a report on Senate concurrent resolution 16, and I ask unanimous consent for its immediate consideration. It is in the usual form, it is according to custom in every way, I understand, and I should like to have it now considered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from West Virginia asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of a resolution which he reports from the Committee on Printing. Is there objection?

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator object to receiving the report?

Mr. PITTMAN. I want to know what the request is.

Mr. CHILTON. It is simply a report from the Committee on Printing regarding the printing of the proceedings in Congress upon the acceptance of the statue of Henry Mower Rice, of Minnesota.

Mr. PITTMAN. I have no objection.

Mr. SMOOT. Is it the usual resolution in such cases?

Mr. CHILTON. It is the usual resolution.

The Senate proceeded to consider the resolution, which had been reported from the Committee on Printing with an amendment, in line 7, after the words "sixteen thousand five hundred copies," to insert "with suitable illustration."

The amendment was agreed to.

The resolution as amended was agreed to, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That there be printed and bound, under the direction of the Joint Committee on Printing, the proceedings in Congress, together with the proceedings at the unveiling in Statuary Hall, upon the acceptance of the statue of Henry Mower Rice presented by the State of Minnesota, 16,500 copies, with suitable illustration, of which 5,000 shall be for the use of the Senate and 10,000 for the use of the House of Representatives, and the remaining 1,500 copies shall be for the use and distribution of the Senators and Representatives in Congress from the State of Minnesota.

COLLECTION OF DISCRIMINATING DUTIES.

Mr. JONES. I have a Senate resolution asking for certain information from the Treasury Department, which I should like to have considered, if I may, at this time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Washington asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of a resolution, which will be read.

The resolution (S. Res. 133) was read, considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to furnish the Senate:

First. With a tabulation showing, so far as possible, the amounts collected by the United States of extra or discriminating duties on imports in foreign vessels, by years and by nationalities of vessels bringing such imports into the United States, from the passage of the act of August 10, 1790, entitled "An act making further provision for the payments of the debts of the United States," to date.

Second. With a tabulation showing, so far as possible, the amounts collected by the United States of tonnage duties on foreign vessels, by years and by nationalities of vessels entering the ports of the United States from foreign countries, wherever and in such amounts as such tonnage duties were in excess of the tonnage duties imposed on vessels of the United States, from the first collection of such extra-tonnage duties on foreign vessels, in 1789, to date.

FUNERAL OF SENATOR SHIVELY.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If the Senate will indulge the Chair, the Vice President has asked the occupant of the chair to announce the appointment of the following committee to attend the funeral of the late Senator SHIVELY: Mr. KERN, Mr. SMITH of Arizona, Mr. WILLIAMS, Mr. HOLLIS, Mr. JOHNSON of Maine, Mr. POINDEXTER, Mr. STERLING, Mr. THOMPSON, Mr. ASHURST, and Mr. PAGE.

PROPOSED RECESS.

Mr. MYERS. I move that the Senate take a recess until to-morrow at 12 o'clock noon.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I hope the Senator will not move to take a recess. I should like very much to report the Army reorganization bill to-morrow, and if there is a single objection to it I can not do so if we have a recess.

Mr. MYERS. I do not think any Senator will object to the Senator making the report; but if the Senator thinks that a recess might interfere with the presentation of the report, I will withdraw the motion.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I do not think the Senator from Oregon need fear that there will be any objection.

Mr. CHILTON. I am quite sure the Senator need have no such fear.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will suggest that a motion to adjourn takes precedence.

Mr. MYERS. The Senator from Oregon can move to adjourn if he prefers.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I would not do so but for the fact that the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. McCUMBER] can make his speech in the morning with the water-power bill pending just the same, and he will do it in the morning hour. He tells me it will take an hour and a half, at least, to deliver his remarks, and I do not think an adjournment will at all disturb the business of the Senate.

Mr. MYERS. I have no objection to the Senator making a motion to adjourn.

Mr. SMOOT. I will say to the Senator that it is expected to bring up the urgent deficiency appropriation bill for consideration to-morrow.

Mr. MYERS. Then I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 5 o'clock and 35 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Friday, March 17, 1916, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, March 16, 1916.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Our Father in heaven, draw us by Thy holy influence into the heavenly zone, that we may behold with our spiritual eyes the glories round about us and hear with our spiritual ears, above the din, turmoil, and roar of battle on this good old earth, the voices of angels calling us to come up higher, yet higher into the realms of purity; that as a people we may have a clearer vision of government of the people, by the people, for the people; that a higher type of citizenship may obtain throughout the length and breadth of the land; that we may have a firmer grip on the things which make for righteousness in the home, in society, in government, and "render unto Cæsar the things that are Cæsar's and unto God the things that are God's," after the manner of the Master. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

MR. CANNON'S EIGHTIETH BIRTHDAY.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that on Saturday, May 6, following the approval of the Journal, my colleague, Mr. RODENBERG, have permission to occupy one hour.

Mr. FITZGERALD. For what purpose?

Mr. MANN. The reason for making the request is that May 7 falls on Sunday. That is the eightieth birthday of my colleague, Mr. CANNON. [Applause.] It seems appropriate that we have a short speech from my colleague, Mr. RODENBERG, on that subject, and I hope that on the same occasion we may have the pleasure of hearing from the Speaker of the House, the leader of the majority, and the gentleman from Illinois, my colleague [Mr. CANNON] himself, although I do not make that a part of the request.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] asks unanimous consent that on Saturday, May 6, after the reading of the Journal and the transaction of the business on the Speaker's table, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. RODENBERG] be permitted to occupy one hour. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

FUNERAL OF SENATOR SHIVELY.

The SPEAKER. Five of the members whom the Chair appointed on the committee to attend the funeral of Senator

SHIVELY can not go. They are Messrs. ADAIR, AUSTIN, GRAY, COX, and TREADWAY. In lieu of those gentlemen the Chair appoints Messrs. FERRIS, BAILEY, STEELE of Iowa, DYER, and WALSH.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, the following leave of absence was granted:

To Mr. GRIFFIN, for five days, on account of illness.

To Mr. GALLIVAN, for three days, on account of urgent business.

To Mr. HULL of Tennessee, for six days, on account of important business.

APPROPRIATIONS.

The SPEAKER. With the permission of the House, the Chair wishes to make a statement in the interest of the right conduct of business. There are certain committees which under the rules have the right to report appropriations. There are certain other committees—and that includes most of them—that have no such right; but some of those committees lug in appropriations in the bills which they report. Now, this is fair notice to all of them that if any of them do that in the future the Chair is going to refer such bills to the Committee on Appropriations, because there must be some sort of a limit on the reporting of appropriations.

POSTAL SAVINGS BANK.

Mr. MOON. Mr. Speaker, the bill (H. R. 562) to amend an act approved June 25, 1910, authorizing a postal savings system, has been returned from the Senate with amendments. I move to concur in all the Senate amendments, except those to the first and second sections of the bill, and to disagree to those and ask for a conference.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOON. Yes.

Mr. MANN. I evidently misunderstood the gentleman. I thought he was going to ask to nonconcur in all the Senate amendments, and then ask to have the bill printed, with the Senate amendments numbered, so we could know what they were.

Mr. MOON. I will ask that the bill be printed in the RECORD. The amendments to section 3 and the following sections are the same propositions that the House has passed time and again, in reference to administration. Most of them are now in the Post Office bill. We would like to concur in them, and get rid of them on the Post Office bill; but I ask to disagree to the amendments to the first and second sections.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman, then, have any objection to letting it go over until morning, and having the amendments numbered and printed, so that the House may know what the amendments are before concurring in them?

Mr. MOON. I do not object to that at all.

Mr. MANN. I do not think there will be any objection to concurring in them, but we would like to see them.

Mr. MOON. Then, at the request of the gentleman, I will defer the motion to concur, and will ask that the bill be printed in the RECORD.

Mr. MANN. I hope the gentleman will also ask unanimous consent to have the bill printed, with the Senate amendments numbered.

Mr. MOON. Mr. Speaker, I make that request also.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent to have the bill printed, with the Senate amendments numbered, and that it also be printed in the RECORD with the Senate amendments numbered, and that the bill lie on the Speaker's table. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The bill is as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That such part of section 6 of the act approved June 25, 1910, authorizing a system of postal savings depositories, as reads "but no one shall be permitted to deposit more than $100 in any one calendar month" is hereby amended to read as follows: "but the balance to the credit of any person, upon which interest is payable, shall not exceed $1,000, exclusive of accumulated interest"; and said act is further amended so that the proviso in section 7 thereof shall read as follows: "Provided, That the board of trustees may, in their discretion, and under such regulations as such board may promulgate, accept additional deposits not to exceed in the aggregate $1,000 for each depositor, but upon which no interest shall be paid."

SEC. 2. That postal savings funds received under the provisions of this act shall be deposited in solvent banks, whether organized under National or State laws, and whether member banks or not of a reserve bank created by the Federal reserve act approved December 23, 1913, being subject to National or State supervision and examination, and the sums deposited shall bear interest at the rate of not less than 2½ per cent per annum, which rate shall be uniform throughout the United States and Territories thereof; but 5 per cent of such funds shall be withdrawn by the board of trustees and kept with the Treasurer of the United States, who shall be treasurer of the board of trustees, in lawful money as a reserve. The board of trustees shall take from such banks such security in public bonds or other securities, authorized by act of Congress or supported by the taxing power, as the board may prescribe, approve, and deem sufficient and necessary to insure the safety and prompt payment of such deposits on demand. The funds received at the postal savings depository offices in each city, town, village, and other locality shall be deposited in banks located therein (substantially in proportion of the capital and surplus of each such bank) willing to receive such deposits under the terms of this act and the regulations made by authority thereof: Provided, however, If one or more member banks of a reserve bank created by the Federal reserve act, approved December 23, 1913, exists in the city, town, village, or locality where the postal deposits are made, such deposits shall be placed in such member banks substantially in proportion to the capital and surplus of each such bank, but if such member banks fail to qualify to receive such deposits, then any other bank located therein may, as hereinbefore provided, qualify and receive the same. If no such member bank and no other qualified bank exists in any city, town, village, or locality, or if none where such deposits are made will receive such deposits on the terms prescribed, then such funds shall be deposited under the terms of this act in the bank most convenient to such locality. If no such bank in any State or Territory is willing to receive such deposits on the terms prescribed, then the same shall be deposited with the treasurer of the board of trustees and shall be counted in making up the reserve of 5 per cent. Such funds may be withdrawn from the treasurer of said board of trustees, and all other postal savings funds, or any part of such funds, may be at any time withdrawn from the banks and savings depository offices for the repayment of postal savings depositories when required for that purpose. When, in the judgment of the President, war or other exigency involving the credit of the United States so requires, the board of trustees may invest all or any part of the postal savings funds, except the reserve fund of 5 per cent herein provided for, in the bonds or other securities of the United States. The board of trustees may in its discretion purchase from the holders thereof bonds which have been or may be issued under the provisions of section 10 of the act of June 25, 1910. Interest and profit accruing from the deposits or investment of postal savings funds shall be applied to the payment of interest due to postal savings depositories, as hereinbefore provided, and the excess thereof, if any, shall be covered into the Treasury of the United States as a part of the postal revenue: Provided further, That postal savings funds in the treasury of said board shall be subject to disposition as provided in this act, and not otherwise: And provided further, That the board of trustees may at any time dispose of bonds held as postal savings investments and use the proceeds to meet withdrawals of deposits by depositors. For the purposes of this act the word "Territory" as used herein shall be held to include the District of Columbia, the District of Alaska, and Porto Rico, and the word "bank" shall be held to include savings banks and trust companies doing a banking business.

SEC. 3. That on account of the increased weight of mails resulting from Postmaster General's Order No. 7349, of July 25, 1913, respecting rates upon and limit of weight of parcel-post packages in the local, first, and second zones, and effective from August 15, 1913, the Postmaster General is authorized to add to the compensation paid for transportation on railroad routes on and after August 15, 1913, for the remainder of the contract terms, not exceeding one-half of 1 per cent thereof per annum.

SEC. 4. That on account of the increased weight of mails resulting from Postmaster General's Order No. 7720, of December 18, 1913, respecting rates upon and limit of weight of parcel-post packages effective from January 1, 1914, the Postmaster General is authorized to add to the compensation paid for transportation on railroad routes on and after January 1, 1914, for the remainder of the contract terms, not exceeding 1 per cent thereof per annum.

SEC. 5. That the Postmaster General, in cases of emergency, between October 1 and April 1 of any year, may hereafter return to the mails empty mail bags theretofore withdrawn therefrom as required by law, and for such times may pay for their railroad transportation out of the appropriation for inland transportation by railroad routes at not exceeding the rate per pound per mile as shown by the last adjustment for mail service on the route over which they may be carried, and pay for necessary cartage out of the appropriation for freight or expressage.

SEC. 6. That when, during a weighing period, on account of floods or other causes, interruptions in service occur on railroad routes and the weights of mail are decreased below the normal, or where there is an omission to take weights, the Postmaster General, for the purpose of readjusting compensation on such railroad routes as are affected thereby, is hereafter authorized, in his discretion, to add to the weights of mails ascertained on such routes during that part of the weighing period when conditions are shown to have been normal the estimated weights for that part of the weighing period when conditions are shown to have been not normal, or where there has been an omission to take weights, based upon the average of weights taken during that part of the weighing period during which conditions are shown to have been normal, the actual weights and the estimated weights to form the basis for the average weight per day upon which to readjust the compensation according to law on such railroad routes for the transportation of the mails, notwithstanding the provision of the act of Congress approved March 3, 1905, requiring that the average weight shall be ascertained by the actual weighing of the mails for such a number of successive working days, not less than 90, as the Postmaster General may direct: Provided further, That readjustments from July 1, 1913, may be made under this provision on routes in the first section affected by the floods in the Ohio Valley and tributary territories, commencing about March 25, 1913.

SEC. 7. That so much of section 4 of "An act making appropriations for the service of the Post Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1913, and for other purposes," approved August 24, 1912, as provides that no adjustment shall be made unless the diverted mails equal at least 10 per cent of the average daily weight on any of the routes affected is hereby repealed.

SEC. 7. That so much of section 4 of "An act making appropriations as follows:

"All contracts for carrying the mail shall be in the name of the United States and shall be awarded to the lowest bidder tendering sufficient guaranties for faithful performance in accordance with the terms of the advertisement: Provided, however, That such contracts require due celerity, certainty, and security in the performance of the service; but the Postmaster General shall not be bound to consider the bid of any person who has willfully or negligently failed to perform a former contract."

SEC. 9. That whenever in the judgment of the Postmaster General the bids received for any star route are exorbitant or unreasonable, or whenever he has reason to believe that a combination of bidders has been entered into to fix the rate for star-route service, the Postmaster General be, and he is hereby, authorized, out of the appropriation for inland transportation by star routes, to employ and use such means or methods to provide the desired service as he may deem expedient, without reference to existing law or laws respecting the employment of personal service or the procurement of conveyances, materials, or supplies.

SEC. 10. That whenever an accepted bidder shall fail to enter into contract, or a contractor on any mail route shall fail or refuse to perform the service on said route according to his contract, or when a new route shall be established or new service required, or when, from any other cause, there shall not be a contractor legally bound or required to perform such service, the Postmaster General may make a temporary contract for carrying the mail on such route, without advertisement, for such period as may be necessary, not in any case exceeding one year, until the service shall have commenced under a contract made according to law: Provided, That the cost of temporary service rendered necessary by reason of the failure of any accepted bidder to enter into contract or a contractor to perform service shall be charged to such bidder or contractor.

SEC. 11. That if any person shall hereafter perform any service for any contractor or subcontractor in carrying the mail, he shall, upon filing in the department his contract for such service and satisfactory evidence of its performance, thereafter have a lien on any money due such contractor or subcontractor for such service to the amount of same; and if such contractor or subcontractor shall fail to pay the party or parties who have performed service as aforesaid the amount due for such service within two months after the expiration of the month in which such service shall have been performed the Postmaster General may cause the amount due to be paid said party or parties and charged to the contractor: Provided, That such payment shall not in any case exceed the rate of pay per annum of the contractor or subcontractor.

SEC. 12. That the act of March 4, 1909 (35 Stat., p. 1126), be amended to read as follows:

"That whoever shall willfully or maliciously injure, tear down, or destroy any letter box or other receptacle intended or used for the receipt or delivery of mail on any mail route, or shall break open the same, or shall willfully or maliciously injure, deface, or destroy any mail deposited therein, or shall willfully take or steal such mail from or out of such letter box or other receptacle, or shall willfully aid or assist in any of the aforementioned offenses, shall for every such offense be punished by a fine of not more than $1,000 or by imprisonment for not more than three years."

SEC. 13. That the limit of weight of mail matter of the first class shall be the same as is applicable to mail of the fourth class: Provided, That no article or package exceeding 4 pounds in weight shall be admitted to the mails under the penalty privilege unless it comes within the exceptions named in the acts of June 8, 1896 (chap. 370, 29 Stat., p. 262), and June 26, 1906 (chap. 3546, 34 Stat., p. 477).

SEC. 14. That postage stamps affixed to all mail matter or to stamped envelopes in which the same is inclosed shall, when deposited for mailing or delivery, be defaced by the postmaster at the mailing office: Provided, That when practicable postage stamps may be furnished to postmasters precanceled by printing on them the name of the post office at which they are to be used, under such regulations as the Postmaster General may prescribe.

SEC. 15. That section 2 of the act of April 28, 1904 (chap. 1759, 33 Stat., p. 440), be amended to read as follows:

"That under such regulations as the Postmaster General may establish for the collection of the lawful revenue and for facilitating the handling of such matter in the mails it shall be lawful to accept for transmission in the mails, without postage stamps affixed, quantities of not less than 300 identical pieces of third-class matter and of second-class matter and 250 identical pieces of fourth-class matter, and packages of money and securities mailed under postage at the first or fourth class rate by the Treasury Department: Provided, That postage shall be fully prepaid thereon at the rate required by law for a single piece of such matter."

SEC. 16. That the act approved January 21, 1914 (38 Stat., p. 278), authorizing the Postmaster General to adjust certain claims of postmasters for loss by burglary, fire, or other unavoidable casualty, be so amended as to include Navy mail clerks and assistant Navy mail clerks.

SEC. 17. That hereafter the Postmaster General may enter into contracts for the conduct of contract stations for a term not exceeding four years.

SEC. 18. That hereafter the Postmaster General may establish, under such rules and regulations as he may prescribe, one or more branch offices, nonaccounting offices, or stations of any post office for the transaction of such postal business as may be required for the convenience of the public.

SEC. 19. That on and after July 1, 1916, when the total compensation of any postmaster at a post office of the fourth class for four consecutive quarters shall amount to $1,000, exclusive of commissions on money orders issued, and the receipts of such post office for the same period shall aggregate as much as $1,900, the Auditor for the Post Office Department shall so report to the Postmaster General, who shall, in pursuance of such report, assign such post office to its proper class, to become effective at the beginning of the next succeeding quarterly period, and fix the salary of the postmaster accordingly.

SEC. 20. That all laws or parts of laws in conflict with the provisions of this act are hereby repealed.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Waldorf, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed with amendments bill of the following title, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

H. R. 562. An act to amend the act approved June 25, 1910, authorizing a Postal Savings System.

The message also announced that the Senate had insisted upon its amendments to bills of the following titles disagreed to by the House of Representatives, had agreed to the conference asked by the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. JOHNSON of Maine, Mr. HUGHES, and Mr. MCCUMBER as the conferees on the part of the Senate:

H. R. 10037. An act granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent children of soldiers and sailors of said war; and

H. R. 11078. An act granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent children of soldiers and sailors of said war.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. LAZARO, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bills of the following titles, when the Speaker signed the same:

H. R. 10032. An act to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Ohio River from a point on its banks in the city of Pittsburgh, Pa., at or near the locality known as Woods Run, to a point on the opposite shore of said river within the borough of McKees Rocks, Pa.;

H. R. 10487. An act reserving or excepting all ores or minerals on the lands, with the right of mining the same, on the site of the proposed post-office building at Calumet, Mich.;

H. R. 11628. An act granting the consent of Congress to the city of Lowell, county of Middlesex, State of Massachusetts, to construct a bridge across the Merrimack River;

H. R. 10238. An act granting the consent of Congress to Interstate Bridge Co. to construct a bridge across Mississippi River;

H. R. 4530. An act for the relief of Michael F. O'Hare;

H. R. 3636. An act to amend section 3646 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, as reenacted and amended by act of February 23, 1909; and

H. R. 403. An act granting to the State of Oklahoma permission to occupy a certain portion of the Fort Sill Military Reservation, Okla., and to maintain and operate thereon a fish hatchery.

ENROLLED BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTION PRESENTED TO THE PRESIDENT FOR HIS APPROVAL.

Mr. LAZARO, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that this day they had presented to the President of the United States for his approval the following enrolled bills and joint resolution:

H. R. 403. An act granting to the State of Oklahoma permission to occupy a certain portion of the Fort Sill Military Reservation, Okla., and to maintain and operate thereon a fish hatchery;

H. R. 3636. An act to amend section 3646 of the Revised Statutes of the United States as reenacted and amended by act of February 23, 1909;

H. R. 4530. An act for the relief of Michael F. O'Hare;

H. R. 10032. An act to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Ohio River from a point on its banks in the city of Pittsburgh, Pa., at or near the locality known as Woods Run, to a point on the opposite shore of said river within the borough of McKees Rocks, Pa.;

H. R. 10238. An act granting the consent of Congress to Interstate Bridge Co. to construct a bridge across Mississippi River;

H. R. 10487. An act reserving or excepting all ores or minerals on the lands, with the right of mining the same, on the site of the proposed post-office building at Calumet, Mich.;

H. R. 11628. An act granting the consent of Congress to the city of Lowell, county of Middlesex, State of Massachusetts, to construct a bridge across the Merrimack River; and

H. J. Res. 180. Joint resolution providing for an increase of the enlisted men of the Army in an emergency.

SUGAR.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of H. R. 11471; and pending that I ask unanimous consent that the general debate close at 4.30 p. m. to-day.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina moves that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of H. R. 11471; and pending that motion he asks that general debate on this bill close at 4.30 p. m. to-day.

Mr. FORDNEY. I wish to say to the gentleman from North Carolina that I have so many requests for time that I shall have to refuse half a dozen Members who want to speak.

Mr. KITCHIN. I will put it at 4.40 p. m.

Mr. FORDNEY. Make it 5 o'clock.

Mr. KITCHIN. No; let us put it at 4.40.

Mr. FORDNEY. All right.

The SPEAKER. And pending his motion the gentleman from North Carolina asks unanimous consent that general debate close at 4.40 p. m. to-day. Is there objection?

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I know that it will take some time to call the roll, and I suppose from what the gentleman from Illinois said yesterday morning that a motion to limit debate will be made if there is objection to the request. But yesterday morning when we were setting aside Calendar Wednesday—more commonly called "Holy Wednesday"—by unanimous consent, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] said:

Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I doubt whether the heavens will fall if we should dispense with Calendar Wednesday in order to dispatch real public business.

I want to know if the gentleman from Illinois thinks a debate of eight hours on this one-paragraph bill is real public business?

Mr. MANN. I certainly do. I consider this bill real business, as you will find out later on.

Mr. SIMS. I am talking about general debate, not confined to this bill, but on any subject under heaven. Does the gentleman regard that as real business.

Mr. MANN. The speeches made from this side of the House are real business.

Mr. SIMS. And the advantage to come to that side of the House from their speeches prompts the gentleman to call it real business and prompts the gentleman to have Calendar Wednesday set aside in order that they may go on with such "real business."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The motion of Mr. KITCHIN was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, with Mr. FITZGERALD in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is now in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill of which the Clerk will read the title.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 11471) to amend an act entitled "An act to reduce tariff duties and to provide revenue for the Government, and for other purposes," approved October 3, 1913.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. KEARNS].

Mr. KEARNS. Mr. Chairman, I think the American people ought to be congratulated on the fact that the leaders of the Democratic Party are so nearly unanimous in the opinion that there is at least one great American industry entitled to the protection of this Government against foreign invasion.

I can see in this action a slow but gradual getting together of the two great political parties on the immensely important question of a protective tariff. This getting together, I predict, will continue until the time will be reached when the protective system of Government will be just as lovingly embraced and as enthusiastically advocated by the Democratic Party in the future as it has been by the Republican Party ever since the latter's organization.

There is no question but that the great sugar industry of this country is entitled to a protection from foreign field and factory, and I am only sorry that the majority side of this House could not see its way clear to extend this protection to all branches of American industry and labor. We recognize, however, in this a partial acknowledgment on the part of that great party of the soundness of the protective system of government, this system that has so long been championed by the Republican Party.

I know it must require courage of the highest degree on the part of these great leaders of a truly great party to abandon this one distinct tradition that has been so distinctly characteristic of the Democratic Party in the past. This action will certainly be a great stimulant to the business interests of the country when it is realized that, after all these years, the tariff for revenue, or free-trade idea, is about to be thrown into the discard. These men ought to be earnestly encouraged in this heroic American stand that they have so lately assumed. When this protection is properly extended to other industries it will mean that the shoddy product of a cheap foreign labor will not again flood our markets, robbing the American workman of his right of employment. Then American capital will again invest in American enterprise. American labor will then find a market for every ounce of its energy and at an American standard of wage. Then American capital and American labor will not be dependent upon the continuance of the European war for prosperity.

I am indeed glad that the great sugar industry of this country is to receive a continued protection, and waiting in hope that this protection before many months will be extended to all of our great American business institutions, that they may flourish and labor employed regardless of whether or not a great European war continues to rage in all of its hideous profusion.

I am indeed sorry that there was not this unanimity of opinion a few days ago when we attempted to pass upon a resolution tending to request Americans to do all in their power to preserve the peace of this great Nation; and what I shall say further at this time will be directed more particularly to the questions that were involved in that discussion.

Mr. Chairman, at that time the membership of this House was called upon to take action upon what was known as the McLemore resolution. This resolution, among other things, undertook to warn Americans against traveling on armed merchant ships of belligerent countries.

A great many newspapers in reporting the proceedings of the House have been greatly biased in giving to the country just what actually occurred on that occasion; that is, these dispatches sent out from Washington were to a great extent sent out in the interests of munition and powder manufacturers, who are growing rich selling munitions of war to the allies.

The McLemore resolution contained much matter foreign to the issue, and in the form presented to the House was repulsive, perhaps, to every Member on the floor, except, possibly, Mr. MCLEMORE himself.

It should be borne in mind that the gentleman who introduced this resolution is a Democrat. The Committee on Rules reported this resolution out of the committee for consideration of the House on a motion to consider the resolution. A great many Republicans, including myself, together with a great many Democrats, fought against considering the resolution at all. We believed the question involved in the resolution was one of a diplomatic nature and ought to be handled exclusively by the President and the Secretary of State, without interference or embarrassment on the part of Congress. We held to the belief that Congress ought not to invade the province of the President and his Secretary of State in this very delicate matter. Holding these views, we voted to send the resolution back to the committee without taking any action at all, and in this way leave the whole matter with the President and his Secretary of State.

The facts leading up to this resolution covered a period of some five or six weeks and are now a matter of history. This trouble all grew out of the German submarine campaign against Great Britain's commerce of the seas. Great Britain had taken the stand that Germany's submarine warfare was in violation of all the rules and laws governing in such matters.

On the 18th day of January, 1916, the President of the United States, in a diplomatic letter sent to all the powers interested, stated our position relating to the use of the submarine, and in that letter the President told the world that Germany was right in its contention and that the allies were wrong. In the letter of January 18 Secretary Lansing set forth the position of our Government on the subject of submarines and armed merchant vessels in the following language:

* * * I do not feel that a belligerent should be deprived of the proper use of submarines in the invasion of commerce, since those instruments of war have proved their effectiveness in this practical branch of warfare on the high seas.

* * * * * * * *

Prior to the year 1915 belligerent operations against enemy commerce on the high seas had been conducted with cruisers carrying heavy armaments. In these conditions international law appeared to permit a merchant vessel to carry armament for defensive purposes without lessening its character as a private merchant vessel. This right seems to have been predicated on the superior defensive strength of ships of war and the limitation of armament to have been dependent on the fact that it could not be used effectively in offensive against enemy naval vessels, while it could defend the merchantmen against the generally inferior armament of piratical ships and privateers.

POWERLESS IN DEFENSE.

The use of the submarine, however, has changed these relations. Comparison of the defensive strength of a cruiser and a submarine shows that the latter, relying for protection on its power to submerge, is almost defenseless in point of construction. Even a merchant ship carrying a small-caliber gun would be able to use it effectively for offense against the submarine.

Moreover, pirates and sea rovers have been swept from the main trade channels of the sea and privateering has been abolished. Consequently the placing of guns on merchantmen at the present date of submarine warfare can be explained only on the ground of a purpose to render merchantmen superior in force to submarines and to prevent warning and visit and search by them. Any armament, therefore, on a merchant vessel would seem to have the character of an offensive armament.

If a submarine is required to stop and search a merchant vessel on the high seas, and in case it is found that she is of an enemy character and that conditions necessitate her destruction and the removal to a place of safety of persons on board, it would not seem just nor reasonable that the submarine should be compelled, while complying with these requirements, to expose itself to almost certain destruction by the guns on board the merchant vessel.

INNOCENT LIVES AT STAKE.

It would therefore appear to be a reasonable and reciprocally just arrangement if it could be agreed by the opposing belligerents that submarines should be caused to adhere strictly to the rules of international law in the matter of stopping and searching merchant vessels, determining their belligerent nationality, and removing the crews and passengers to places of safety before sinking the vessels as prizes of war, and that merchant vessels of belligerent nationality should be prohibited from carrying any armament whatsoever.

In proposing this formula as a basis of conditional declarations by the belligerent Government I do so in the full conviction that each Government will consider primarily the humane purposes of saving the lives of innocent people rather than the insistence upon doubtful legal rights which may be denied on account of new conditions.

STAND ON QUESTION SOUGHT.

I would be pleased to be informed whether your Government would be willing to make such a declaration conditioned upon their enemies making a similar declaration.

I should add that my Government is impressed with the reasonableness of the argument that a merchant vessel carrying an armament of any sort, in view of the character of the submarine warfare and the defensive weakness of undersea craft, should be held to be an auxiliary cruiser and so treated by a neutral as well as by a belligerent Government and is seriously considering instructing its officials accordingly.

This letter was given wide publication. Perhaps every Member of Congress read it and thoroughly digested it, and I undertake to say that nine-tenths of the membership of this House thoroughly agreed with the President and Secretary Lansing when they said to the warring nations:

I do not feel that a belligerent should be deprived of the proper use of submarines in the invasion of commerce.

And further on they made use of the following language:

I should add that my Government is impressed with the reasonableness of the argument that a merchant vessel carrying an armament of any sort, in view of the character of the submarine warfare and the defensive weakness of undersea craft, should be held to be an auxiliary cruiser and so treated by a neutral as well as by a belligerent Government.

So it will readily be seen from a reading of that letter that the attitude of the United States Government was that submarine warfare was recognized to be legal and that an armed merchant ship is armed but for one purpose, and that purpose is to destroy an enemy's ship. We believe that this was a wise and patriotic conclusion. For myself, I concluded that, come what might, I would stand by the President in this position. But just before this resolution came to a vote it seems the President had changed his position in the matter and had taken the position that Americans had the absolute legal right to take passage on an armed merchant vessel of a belligerent country sailing through the war zone. This position raised a very serious stir in both Houses of Congress. Friends of the President, all of them being Democrats, flocked to the White House and advised him of the danger of his change of attitude upon this very serious question. So serious did it become that resolutions were introduced in the Senate, and whatever muss was stirred up in the Senate was at the hands of Democrats and friends of the administration. There was not a Republican who took an active part or did anything that would in any way embarrass the President in his negotiations with foreign countries.

The President, however, had become set in his record view of the situation, and he demanded a vote in each House of Congress on the subject of a warning resolution. He wanted to know the opinion of Congress as to whether American citizens should be allowed the privilege of riding on armed belligerent ships. He demanded a vote upon this question and this question alone. He then stated to the world that American citizens had this privilege, and he wanted to hear from the membership of this House directly upon this subject. There was a protest set up all over the country from every loyal American, protesting against our citizens traveling on armed merchant ships flying a belligerent flag. These protests came from the mouths of practically every loyal American who did not want to see his country become embroiled in this greatest and bloodiest war that has ever threatened the destruction of civilization.

As I said before, the Committee on Rules reported this resolution for consideration by the House, and over our protest it came before us for consideration. After it had been forced upon us, those Republicans and Democrats who had the interest of America—and America alone—at heart, considered that we ought to tell the President what we honestly believed and what we honestly thought the American people believed; and for this reason, after it had reached this stage, we protested against the resolution being tabled. If this were all we were going to do, the House was doing a vain thing, because the McLemore resolution was, in the first instance, nailed fast to the table in the committee room, and where was there any earthly use of voting it out of the committee in order to vote to send it back again? That was all that was done. As I have said, the question was before us against our will, and since we found ourselves in this position, we thought it our public duty to tell the President the truth. He had asked us a direct question, and we thought since we were going to attempt an answer we ought to answer him honestly, fairly, and patriotically. He is the President of the greatest Nation in the world and is entitled to fair treatment. The question he had asked us was a very simple one, and we believed he wanted our candid views, and for these reasons we voted against tabling the resolution.

After it had reached this stage, we had wanted the right to cut out all the verbiage in the resolution and so amend it that it would present one simple proposition, to wit:

Should Americans be advised to forego a legal right, if, indeed, they have any such right, to travel on an armed merchantman during the European hostilities?

Since it was up to us to act, we believed such a warning would not surrender one American right and would go far to keep our own country out of this war.

Mr. Chairman, we know that possibly 99 per cent of the people in America, excepting in districts wholly controlled by munition and powder plants, entertain the view that such a warning as this ought to be issued. They feel that no foolhardy or venturesome man or woman who happens to be an American and wants to "enjoy the thrills of such a trip" should be allowed to take passage on one of these ships, and in the event that ship should be destroyed by a German submarine, it would mean another backdown on the part of our Government or, in all probability, would mean war with Germany.

The people of this country do not want war with Germany or any other country. We claim to be neutral, and as neutrals we ought to do nothing that would have the appearance of prejudice in favor of one country as against another. It seems to me that all of us who are loyal, patriotic citizens of America are willing to forego for the time being any doubtful right, legal or otherwise, that we may have to travel on these ships. We ought not want to put ourselves in a position that might embarrass our Government and might finally drag the American people into this disastrous and shocking war. I will say that 95 per cent of the Republicans who voted to table this resolution are Members of Congress who represent districts whose constituency have no other business except manufacturing munitions of war to be shipped to the allies. They are at this time very prosperous by reason of this trade with the allied nations, but it is a blood-soaked prosperity. That abnormal prosperity will last only as long as a delivery of their goods can be made on British shores. The allies and those who are opposed to warning American citizens against riding on armed merchantmen believe that the cheapest and safest insurance that these ships can write to insure their safe passage across the ocean is to see to it that American citizens are aboard. If they can not make deliveries to the allies, the allies will not buy our powder and our cannons and our shells. In other words, England comes to America, loads a ship with munitions of war, puts on board an American citizen, sails from our port, then mans the ship with monstrous guns and naval officers. The guns are to be used by trained marksmen to destroy German submarines. The Americans are to be used to say to an enemy of the allies, "You can not destroy this ship, because American citizens are aboard." This seems, to my mind, to be as stupid a position as it is preposterous. I have no interest in either side in this war, but two years ago I was told by high authority to be neutral, and I am trying to be.

Germany has a wonderful fleet of submarines. Those submarines were built for no other purpose except to destroy commerce of her enemies. She has many hundreds of them. No one knows how many, except Germany herself. We recognize the legality of submarine warfare, because Secretary Lansing said so in his letter of January 18. We recognize the legality of submarine warfare, because we are building and preparing to build hundreds of them ourselves. We have now nearly a hundred of them and appropriations made for at least a hundred more. We appropriated and have appropriated in the past millions of dollars for their construction, to be used by us in case we should ever be forced into war. What are we to do with them, if this should not be international law? I am only looking at the interest of America. I do not care what the allies or the central powers do as long as they do not disturb the rights of Americans, but I am trying to look at the future of this country in case we should become involved in war with some other nation or combination of nations. We have but few merchantmen of our own, and we would certainly want to destroy with our submarines the armed merchant ships of an enemy country. Compared with other seagoing vessels, a submarine is a frail craft and easily destroyed, as is set forth in the letter of January 18. A submarine to be effective must have the first shot. It would seem from England's position in this dispute, if her contention should be adopted and enforced, her armed merchant ships would be given the first shot. She has armed these ships with dangerous and far-reaching guns, thereby making a warning: "Dangerous if not fatal to the submarine." If she does not intend to destroy an enemy's submarine, there is no necessity of thus arming her merchant ships.

Senator STONE, another Democrat and close to the President, in a speech on the floor of the Senate gives voice to this opinion when he criticized the President's definition of defensive warfare, as relating to armed merchant ships. He said:

As I understand it, the President's attitude is this: He has concluded to support the contention that belligerent merchant ships have a right under international law to bear arms for defensive purposes. What he may regard as a defensive armament I do not know. In fact, I doubt that any man would venture authoritatively to define that kind of armament.

And further in his speech he says that if the President's policy were adhered to—

It would tend to plunge us headlong into war.

This is the opinion of the Democratic leader in the Senate and a friend of the President's and not necessarily my opinion.

Senator GORE, another Democrat and lifelong friend of the President, made open charges against him on the floor of the Senate. These charges were so serious that I do not believe it is well to again repeat them, as I am sure Republicans do not care to do anything that would in any way tend to embarrass this administration.

Senator STONE took the position that guns are made to shoot, and for no other purpose. I do not know who was back of the President or who caused him to change his position as set forth in the letter of January 18. The entire country had agreed with what he said in that letter, except the munition districts of the East. Whatever may be the case, I am glad I did not cast my vote on the side of those Republican Members of the House who represent the munition and powder manufacturing districts of the East. I am sometimes afraid the powder men think at least as much of the enormous profits they are making as they do of the safety of our Nation.

Every Democrat who made a speech on this subject favoring the tabling of the McLemore resolution on the day it was up for consideration confessed that he was against the President and his views. Every one of them said that Americans ought not to so travel, and that they had no right to so travel on such ships. We, on the other hand, said to the President we want to be with you, and, being with you, our advice is to request Americans to stay off of such ships. Our position of a steadfast loyalty to the President and this country could dictate to us no other course.

When the real truth is unfolded to the country at large as to just what was done relative to the McLemore resolution the people will then understand that every man who voted against requesting Americans not to travel on armed ships voted against the interests of Americans and the President himself.

Let us see what they did. Men who made speeches favoring the tabling of the resolution, except those who live in munitions districts, almost without exception, said Americans ought not to travel on such ships, and then voted directly opposite. Their vote, if it meant anything, would at least tend to encourage thoughtless and unpatriotic Americans to so travel. Their speeches were made, it seems, to allay the wrath of the populace, and their votes were cast, as they claimed, to uphold the hands of the President. How this could uphold his hands or mean anything to the country at all surpasses my understanding. Their attitude, their conduct, and their speeches will be viewed by the country as political buncombe of the worst sort. Their conduct amounted to a false pretense. They appeared to do something and then admit they did nothing. They seem to forget that their speeches, as well as their votes, would be carried to the central powers, and these countries would be advised that these lawmakers were performing the greatest feat of political jugglery that was ever performed, perhaps, in the House of Representatives.

I am afraid after the people fully digest the conduct of these Members—and the people are neither fools nor knaves—their conduct will be the object of a most bitter contempt in their eyes.

After this question had been forced upon us and we were required to vote, we did so that we might answer the question, "Shall we warn or not?" We wanted to say to him and Mr. Lansing, "Do as you please, and if the worst comes the people of America will stand by American interests; but it is our opinion that our citizens ought, at least, be asked to stay off of armed merchant ships flying a belligerent flag until this war is over. There are other ships, flying neutral flags, upon which our people can travel abroad if they want to go."

The vote in the Senate upon the Gore resolution was entirely different, as there the rules are different from the rules of the House.

In the Senate the resolution need not go to a committee, but can be presented by the author of the resolution himself. This is what Senator GORE did, and the Senate voted to table the Gore resolution, thereby saying they would not meddle with the business of the President and the Secretary of State. That is exactly what we tried to do when we voted to keep the McLemore resolution out of the House at all. But after all, there has been much good come out of this. The President heard the speeches of his friends on the floor of the Senate and the House. He had heard them all say that the American people wanted her citizens to be warned in the name of their country and for its safety to refrain from riding on these ships. Within 24 hours after the vote was taken in the House there was issued from the White House to the press a statement that American citizens would in some way be kept off of these ships. Whether it would be by direct warning or the refusal of passports was not indicated. Up to this time passports have not been issued to American citizens to ride on armed merchant ships. Those who tried to vote for a warning accomplished a great good. Since they had to vote at all, they were voting their conscience and they were voting in the interest of patriotism.

Mr. Chairman, since I had to vote, I voted in the interests of 100,000,000 American citizens. I voted this way because I do not believe there is one American mother who has one son to spare in this bloody carnival of war-crazed Europe. When I voted I will confess I was thinking more of the writhing, twisting windrows of dead and dying men on European battlefields than I was of the President of the United States. When I voted I will confess that I was thinking less of President Wilson and more about the blood-stained hills, slopes, and valleys of Europe. When I voted I plead guilty to the charge that I was thinking little of Woodrow Wilson, but I was thinking more of the millions of young men, the brawn and the brain, the flower and the chivalry of American manhood. When I voted I plead guilty to the indictment that I thought but little of those eastern capitalists who have grown fat by drinking the blood that is flowing from the gaping wound of bleeding Europe. I was thinking more of the millions of American firesides and family circles that are to-day happy because we are at peace with the world.

Just before I voted I was walking from the office building to the Capitol. I thought of an expression used by Mr. REAVIS, from Nebraska, in his speech a few hours before. He had said, "I am thinking of the hills and plains of that locality that yesterday were white with snow, the color scheme of which to-day has been changed to red at Verdun." As I thought of this I looked across the Potomac far into the hills beyond, they too were white with snow. I did not want to see that color scheme changed to scarlet, made red with American blood.

Mr. Chairman, I am glad to know that if a crisis comes there is not a man in Congress but will stand for America and her rights.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. MARTIN].

Mr. MARTIN. Mr. Chairman, representing, as I do, the largest sugar-growing district of Louisiana, I am naturally deeply interested in legislation affecting sugar.

The purpose of the bill now under consideration is to repeal that provision of the Underwood bill admitting all sugar into this country free of duty after May 1 of the present year.

If this bill becomes a law, it will mean that the sugar farmers of this country may, for a time at least, continue to cultivate the sugar beet and sugar cane.

If this bill should not become a law, it will result in completing the disaster and destruction that immediately followed the enactment of the Underwood bill in the sugar-growing districts.

No one living outside of a sugar district can appreciate the conditions that followed the enactment of this measure. The horizontal cut of 25 per cent in the sugar tariff and the promise of free trade after May 1 of the present year so depressed the market for a short period that sugar sold for much less than it costs to produce it.

This sudden fall in the market price of sugar, coming as it did immediately after an overflow that in many sections of my district did not leave sufficient cane for planting purposes, resulted in untold hardship and suffering. Creditors, who were willing to stand by the cane planter in order that he might recover from the effects of the flood, refused to advance another dollar in the face of free sugar.

As judge of my district at that time, it became my unpleasant and painful duty to play a conspicuous part in what followed, and I grew sick at heart when I was called upon to sign writs of seizure and sale, which resulted in the sacrifice of properties, many of which had been in the same families for nearly a century.

Sugar properties immediately decreased in value more than 50 per cent, and were usually adjudicated to the seizing creditor for the lack of other bidders. Many of our sugar mills were dismantled and the machinery therein sold at a great sacrifice for transportation to Cuba and Mexico, where the industry was on a boom, as a result of the same legislation that brought ruin and disaster in this country.

Those who were able to hold their properties and those who became the unwilling purchasers of others were now in a quandary. They knew not what to do. Thousands were thrown out of employment, and many of our once fertile fields were either permitted to grow up in weeds or were converted into cattle pastures and pigpens. Our people in desperation were searching for some industry to take the place of that which was about to be destroyed.

Assisted by the National Government, experts were employed for the purpose of teaching our people how to grow crops other than sugar cane. In one season three counties in my district purchased $3,000 worth of cauliflower seed, and hundreds of acres were planted in this vegetable. But along came one of the tropical storms, for which south Louisiana is noted, and did not leave enough cauliflower for domestic table use.

Such were the conditions in the sugar districts when the European war broke out. Its effect was almost immediate. Unable to secure adequate supplies from former sources England, France, and other European countries found it necessary to purchase large quantities of sugar from this country and from Cuba.

This was an important factor in swelling the export trade in sugar and in diminishing our supply, and the industry of this country was thus afforded indirect protection.

The effect of the European war more than offset the reduction in the tariff made by the Underwood bill. This great conflict across the waters has saved the sugar industry for the time being, but God forbid that the life of this industry should depend upon the duration of the death struggle now going on in another continent. [Applause on Republican side.]

The suspension of the free-sugar clause of the Underwood bill and the continuance of the present duty will enable the sugar industry to survive just as long as the present war continues. But when peace has been restored, and the internal affairs of the countries now engaged in this conflict have been adjusted, then sugar, like many other industries in this country, will have to be afforded adequate protection in order to meet the competition brought about by foreign cheap labor.

EXCISE TAX.

But, Mr. Chairman, there is a great combination in this country which, in season and out of season, by fair means and foul, is working to destroy the domestic sugar industry.

As long as the sugar growers of this country were only producing the raw product, the refining interests interposed no objection to a tariff. But within the past few years the refining interests have come in contact with serious competition at the hands of the domestic producers, and they now fear that they may be deprived of a privilege they have long enjoyed—that of regulating and manipulating the market price of sugar.

The beet-sugar producers of the West are making refined sugars, and the sugar producers of the South, by the use of improved machinery, are placing upon the market a finished article that goes direct into consumption. Realizing that they can no longer hope to purchase raw sugars to any extent in this country, and realizing further that they must now meet and compete with the domestic sugar growers in the open market, the refining interests are now making every effort to wipe out the domestic industry.

Their activity during the last Congress is too well known to require comment, and when the Underwood law went upon the statute books, contemplating as it did free sugar on May 1 of this year, this great interest had good reason for believing that the day was not far distant when the sugar market of this country would be in their grasp and absolutely under their control and domination.

The announcement made by the Secretary of the Treasury that he would recommend the suspension of the free-sugar clause of the Underwood bill and the subsequent indorsement of this recommendation by the President was, to the refining interests, like a clap of thunder from a clear sky.

But nothing daunted they have now devised a scheme which, if adopted, would at once crush the domestic sugar industry out of existence. The mouthpiece of these interests, the self-constituted representative of an imaginary wholesale grocers' association, Mr. Frank C. Lowry, has written an open letter to the President, suggesting the advisability of placing an excise, consumption, or producers' tax on sugar.

It is proposed that sugar be permitted to go on the free list on May 1 of the present year, and in lieu of a duty that all sugar consumed in this country be made to pay an excise tax of 1 cent a pound.

By this method of taxation the President is informed that $84,000,000 in the way of revenue can be raised annually.

A wonderful plan indeed for raising a revenue, but Mr. Lowry takes particular pains to conceal both the purpose and effect of this plan. Its purpose is so clear that he who runs may read. Knowing that the sugar industry of this country is dependent upon a protective tariff, and knowing that it could not survive such an iniquitous method of taxation, they hope by this ingenious method to encompass the destruction of this great industry.

With the domestic industry destroyed and out of the way, the refining interests would then be left a clear field and we would be entirely dependent upon foreign countries for our supply of sugar, and if perchance this country should become involved with a great sea power we would be at the mercy of our enemies, and our people would be deprived of a product that is now both a luxury and a necessity.

That England is at this time able to supply her people with sugar is due alone to the fact that she is mistress of the seas. That Germany has an ample supply of sugar on hand is due alone to the fact that she produces a sufficient supply within her own borders. If this great war has taught one lesson that the United States should take to heart, it is that it is only by the encouragement and protection of our own industries that we can ever hope to become independent of the world. [Applause on Republican side.]

It is true that the sugar market is now up, but it is equally true that this is due to the conditions brought about by the European war. But what would the price of sugar now be in this country if the domestic supply were wiped out and every pound of sugar had to be imported into this country? Strike this industry out of existence, and before the dawn of another year those who are to-day crying "free breakfast table" will be appealing to Congress to restore competition to the end that they may be relieved of the oppressive prices fixed and determined by the refining interests.

I know that it is contended that even though the domestic industry should be destroyed there would still be competition by reason of the fact that there are many sugar refineries in this country operating independent of each other. To those who are laboring under this delusion, I would refer them to the hearings held before the Hardwick committee in 1911, when by dint of cross-examination the sugar magnates themselves were made to admit that to a great extent they parceled out the markets and did not trespass upon each other's territory.

That the refiners fix the price of sugar and purposely and deliberately depress the market when the domestic product is placed thereon is shown by the following letters written by Mr. J. T. Witherspoon, local manager of the American Sugar Refining Co., at New Orleans, to the officers of that company in New York. These letters were offered in evidence on the part of the Government in the suit of the United States against American Sugar Refining Co., in New Orleans, in December, 1912, for violation of the Sherman antitrust law. It will be noted that both of these letters were written in the latter part of October, just before the harvest season, which begins about November 1 and lasts for three months.

NEW ORLEANS, October 27, 1904.

Mr. H. C. MOTT,
No. 117 Wall Street, New Orleans.

DEAR SIR: It was mentioned yesterday that some of the parties here who have sold us large lots of sugar at a fixed price under the New York price day of arrival would probably enter into an arrangement with the Federal Refinery, of New York, whereby this concern throughout November and December would buy small lots on the New York market at not less than 4¼ for 96 test, and thereby fix the New York quotations at this figure, which in turn would be the supposed figure for settlement of sugars arriving here.

While this would be a most contemptuous plan, still there are some people here not too good to make the attempt, and if the Federal is willing, I am satisfied that some of the large buyers here would reimburse them for any loss they might sustain.

I only mention this to show you what might possibly take place and for you to be on your guard. * * *

Commencing with the latter part of next week, the daily arrivals here on account of contracts already made will be large. These contracts, as you know, will be settled at a differential under the New York price day of arrival. Hence it behooves you to depress the New York markets as much as possible, for the lower the New York quotation is the less these sugars will cost us.

Yours, very truly,

J. T. WITHERSPOON.

NEW ORLEANS, October 28, 1908.

Mr. W. B. THOMAS,
President the American Sugar Refining Co.,
New York, N. Y.

MY DEAR MR. THOMAS: I want to bring to your attention the competition in the way of refined sugars that we will have in New Orleans during the coming winter. * * *

What I particularly desire to call your attention to is that the higher we hold our prices for granulated sugar here during the next three months, naturally, the more profit these plantations will make on their product; and if the information once gets abroad that it is more profitable for the different plantations to produce granulated sugar than to turn out raws or clarified, I am afraid next season many others will commence doing likewise; consequently it might be well for you to consider the proposition of permitting New Orleans, during the next three months, to maintain a difference in price below New York of at least 10 cents, and at periods of extreme dullness, when these outsiders here are quoting low prices and selling their product, of even 20 cents per hundred pounds.

What I am particularly interested in is seeing the little outside competition develop as little as possible.

Yours, very truly,

J. T. WITHERSPOON.

The meaning of these letters is clear and unmistakable. They show that notwithstanding that some measure of competition exists between the refiners and the domestic producers, they still control the market to some extent; and if this can be done in the face of competition, what can and will be done if all competition is destroyed?

But what is this excise tax that is being advocated by Mr. Lowry? It is the same tax that is now being levied upon whisky, beer, tobacco, and similar articles. It is a tax levied not alone for the purpose of producing revenue but also for the purpose of limiting and discouraging the production of the commodity.

By what method of reasoning is sugar placed in the same category as whisky and beer?

Sugar is now a necessity, and if the revenues of this Government are to be raised by placing an excise tax on sugar, then, with equal justice and fairness, it should be placed on other articles of necessity, such as wheat, meat, shoes, and clothing. This method of taxation is antagonistic to the historic policy of this Government, and it is not only revolting to a sense of justice, but would result in the destruction rather than protection and encouragement of great American industries. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. Chairman, I can not believe that this unfair, unjust, and un-American method of taxation will be seriously considered by Congress, but the fact that resolutions offered in another branch of this body would seem to indicate that the Lowry plan had attracted some attention has prompted me to speak at this time.

It is bad enough that, viewed in the light of the Baltimore platform and the legislation which immediately followed, the sugar industry should have been classed as being illegitimate; but to now penalize that industry and subject it to a revenue tax such as is placed on whisky and beer would be the unkindest cut of all.

RELATIVE COST OF PRODUCING SUGAR.

As stated at the outset of this address, sugar can at this time be raised at a profit because of the additional indirect protection afforded the industry by the European war, but that when peace has been restored and the countries now engaged in war have resumed the production and exportation of sugar the industry will have to be given additional protection in order to meet foreign competition.

In support of this assertion I desire to submit the following facts and figures:

The cost of producing a pound of sugar in Cuba is from 1½ to 2 cents. All our importations of sugar—excepting, of course, our insular possessions, whose output enters this country free of duty—come almost entirely from Cuba. After the Underwood law went into effect, making, as it did, a horizontal cut of 25 per cent in the sugar tariff, the duty on sugar was 1.264 cents per pound; and, deducting the preferential duty in favor of Cuban sugars, it will be found that the sugars from this island only pay a duty of 1.01 cents per pound. Transportation charges from Cuba to this country amount to 15 cents per 100 pounds. Cuban sugars can therefore be delivered in this country for not more than 3.16 cents per pound.

The cost of production of cane sugar in Louisiana, as shown by the following figures taken from a report made in 1913 by the Department of Commerce in its Miscellaneous Series No. 9, entitled "The Sugar Industry," averages 3.62 cents per pound for the years 1909 and 1910.

Cost of production of cane sugar in Louisiana in the years 1910 and 1909.

	1910[1]			1909[2]
	Cost per ton of cane.	Cost per pound of sugar.	Per-centage of cost.	Cost per ton of cane.	Cost per pound of sugar.	Per-centage of cost.

[1] Fifteen factories; 959,849 tons of cane ground; $5,278,048 manufacturing cost; 141,608,822 pounds of sugar.

[2] Fourteen factories; 792,624 tons of cane ground; $4,484,904 manufacturing cost; 123,887,437 pounds of sugar.

The Cuban product, therefore, with the duty now carried in the Underwood bill, has an advantage of 0.51 cent per pound over the cane sugar produced in this country, and even under the Payne-Aldrich bill, which carried a duty of 1.348 cents per pound on Cuban sugars, had an advantage of approximately 0.17 cent per pound over the domestic cane sugars.

Bearing in mind the advantage that the Cuban sugars have in the markets of this country, let us now consider the influence of the war upon the industry and the certain results to follow after the war.

Stimulated by the high prices induced by the war, a tremendous impetus has been given the sugar industry in Cuba. The cane acreage has been extended enormously, and to meet this expansion no less than 10 additional sugar factories have been constructed.

According to the latest statistical estimate of the Cuban crop for 1916, as shown by the International Sugar Journal, there is now enough cane planted and nearing maturity to produce at least three and one-half million tons of sugar. The total sugar supply of the United States and its insular possessions is estimated as follows:

	Tons.
Louisiana and Texas cane sugars	200,000
Beet-sugar production	750,000
Porto Rico	350,000
Hawaiian Islands	575,000
Philippine Islands	120,000
Total	1,995,000

The total available sugar supply of the United States and its insular possessions is therefore 1,995,000 tons, and as the sugar consumed in this country amounts to approximately 3,750,000 tons, it follows that the importations of sugar necessary to supply the sugar consumed will amount to 1,755,000 tons.

The Cuban crop of three and one-half million tons will therefore not only be more than sufficient to supply our needs but will leave a surplus of 1,745,000 tons, and unless this sugar is absorbed by European countries, whose usual source of supply is now cut off, this country, even though we take into consideration the natural increase in consumption, will be overstocked with sugar, and as a result the sugar market will suffer.

I speak advisedly, therefore, when I say that when the sugar-producing world has returned to its normal state the sugar industry of this country will have to be afforded additional and adequate protection if this industry is to be fostered and encouraged and protected from the foreign competition sure to follow when the European war ends.

NECESSITY FOR THIS LEGISLATION.

The report from the Ways and Means Committee, made by Mr. KITCHIN and accompanying this bill, gives the following reasons for recommending this legislation:

> Had the normal conditions existing at the time of the passage of the act of October 3, 1913, not been disturbed by the European war, it would not have been necessary to continue the present rates of duty on sugar after May 1, 1916.
> This legislation is made necessary in order that the Treasury may have the benefit of the revenue receipts from sugar to assist in meeting the decline in customs and postal receipts, due to the disturbed conditions resulting from the European war, and also to assist in meeting the decline in ordinary internal-revenue receipts.
> Your committee therefore recommends that the free-sugar provision of paragraphs 177 and 178 of the sugar schedule of the act of October 3, 1913, be repealed, in order that the present rates of duty upon sugar and its kindred products may remain in full force and effect, to the end that the Treasury may not under existing international trade conditions be deprived of the receipts from sugar.

It is both disappointing and much to be regretted that the Democratic Party should deem it necessary to offer an apology for this bill. The sugar-beet farmers of the West and the cane growers of the South, who have upward of $200,000,000 invested in this industry, and who are depending upon this legislation to save them from utter ruin, beg to assure the majority members of the Ways and Means Committee that no apology is necessary.

The statement in this report to the effect that the duty is being retained only because of the disturbed conditions brought about by the European war, to the end that the Treasury may not be deprived of the revenue derived from this source, and the very strong implication which necessarily follows, that when the war ends and conditions are normal there will exist no further necessity for this duty, and the same will be abolished, is not calculated to inspire the sugar growers with any great confidence in the future of this industry.

This report is, in effect, a notice served by the Democratic Party upon the sugar growers of this country that this legislation is to be passed solely for the purpose of replenishing a depleted Treasury and not for the purpose of repairing the wrong, injury, and injustice done a great industry by the provisions of the Underwood bill.

Those interested in sugar are made to thoroughly realize and understand that the free-sugar clause of the Underwood bill is being repealed not because of any consideration for them but because this administration finds that it must have additional revenue to run the Government and is using sugar temporarily for this purpose.

Let us hope that when the tariff is next revised there will be no necessity for apologies, but that the revision will be based on the more humane and broad policy of adequate protection to all American industries.

DELAY DANGEROUS.

But whether this bill is intended to produce revenue or whether it is intended to repair the wrong and injustice done the sugar producers of this country, it is of the greatest importance that it should be passed speedily and become a law. Delay at this time is dangerous. Dangerous to the Treasury if its purpose be to meet the threatened deficit, and dangerous to the sugar producers if its purpose be to save them from further disaster.

Unless this bill is upon the statute books by May 1 of this year sugar will be imported into this country duty free, and even though it should become a law shortly after this date it will still have failed to accomplish its purpose. If on May 1 this bill has failed of enactment, then foreign sugars will be rushed into this country in enormous quantities so as to escape duty, and as a result the Government will lose the revenue and the sugar market will be demoralized, even though the bill should afterwards become a law.

This bill has yet to pass the Senate, and in view of the fact that there is still much important and pressing legislation to be considered and acted upon by that body, and in view of the further fact that the Senate is a deliberative body and is not prone to act with haste upon any measure, it would seem that there is every reason why this measure should be speedily passed by this body and sent to the Senate, where it is to be hoped it will be passed without amendment before May 1.

Relying upon the recommendation made by the Secretary of the Treasury that the present duty be retained, and relying upon the President's message to the same effect, and believing that this Congress would speedily carry out this recommendation, the sugar producers of this country have invested large sums of money and planted a tremendous acreage, with the hope of somewhat recovering from their past losses.

And while they do not now question the good faith of the President, the Secretary of the Treasury, and this Congress, they still realize the uncertainties of legislation, and they will not be able to secure the advances so necessary for the cultivation and harvesting of a sugar crop until all uncertainty has been removed and this bill has become a law.

TARIFF BOARD.

If the sugar industry is saved from impending disaster by the enactment of the bill now under consideration, it will then not only court but welcome an investigation with the view of determining the extent to which it should be protected from foreign competition.

The fact that the President has changed his mind and now favors the appointment of a tariff commission, in accord with that advocated in the platform of the Progressive Party, has given rise to the hope that the sugar producers of this country will at last be given a square deal, and will not be continually harassed and threatened with every change of administration.

Of course, much depends upon the personnel of this board and the purpose for which it is appointed. To be efficient, this board must be made up of men who will take a broad and comprehensive view of the tariff question, with the view of according to each of the great industries of this country such a measure of protection as may be necessary in order to preserve its existence, and at the same time protect those engaged in such industries from foreign aggression and competition.

Does the President purpose to appoint such a board if the administration bill introduced by Congressman RAINEY becomes a law? We have had no expression from the President indicating the scope and purpose of the work to be undertaken by this board, except his letter to Majority Leader KITCHIN, which, to say the least, is not encouraging.

In the course of his letter the President, in referring to the proposed tariff board, says:

> I have had in this change of mind no thought whatever of a change of attitude toward the so-called protection question.

In what, then, has the President changed?

If, as his letter seems to indicate, he is opposed to a protective tariff, then for what purpose is a tariff board to be appointed?

If this board is to be expected and directed to adhere to the policy of a tariff for revenue only, then it would seem to follow that its duties will be confined only to those articles which the board at its option may select for this purpose, regardless of the merits or demerits of the claim of any particular industry for protection.

And again, if revenue be the only end desired, then it follows that even those industries most deserving of protection will be given but scant consideration if it is possible to raise the revenue needed for this Government by the means of taxing incomes, notes, bonds, stocks, and other methods of direct taxation to which this administration seems to be wedded.

There are now pending before the Ways and Means Committee two bills looking to the appointment and organization of a tariff commission—one introduced by Mr. RAINEY, and known as the administration bill, and the other introduced by Mr. BARNHART.

Under the provisions of the former the appointment of the five members of the proposed tariff commission is left to the President, and not more than three of the members can belong to the same political party. Under the provisions of the Barnhart bill, which is also a Democratic measure, only one of the five members of the commission can be appointed by the President, it being left to the majority and minority Members of both branches of Congress to select the other four.

That the Barnhart measure is the more meritorious of the two bills there can be no question, and this seems to be the opinion of many of the leaders of all parties.

While it is true that the administration measure provides that only three members shall belong to the same party, it does not state from what party the other two members shall be appointed, and the President would be at liberty to make such appointments in his discretion from the Republican, Progressive, Prohibition, or Socialist Parties.

He could follow the law to the letter and yet have the commission composed entirely of men in absolute accord with his views on the tariff question, which would mean that we would have a commission that would enter upon its work not with a view of so distributing the tariff as to protect, encourage, and upbuild our great American industries, but with the view solely of raising revenue sufficient to meet the needs of this Government, and, this having been done, to refuse to listen to further appeals for protection on the grounds that the commission favored protection for revenue only.

The Barnhart bill, on the other hand, provides that not less than two of the members of the commission shall be selected from the minority party, thus insuring at least some measure of consideration for those who believe that the tariff should be equitably distributed in such a manner as to give fair and adequate protection to those industries in need of such legislation and whose existence is now threatened by reason of our present free-trade policy.

A tariff commission that will approach this most important question with an open mind, prepared to give all industries a fair hearing, with the view of granting such protection as may be necessary to safeguard and foster such industries, to the end that they may not be injured or destroyed by like industries in foreign countries, will prove of inestimable value to this country.

It may be that the President contemplates the appointment of such a commission, but the fact that in recommending the appointment of this commission he has taken occasion to state that he has in no way changed his attitude on the "so-called protection question," and the further fact that he insists upon naming all the members of this commission, has in some degree shaken the confidence of those most anxious to see such a commission created.

Many of the great industries of this country owe their existence to-day to the European war; but this war will not last always, and when peace has been restored this country will be flooded with the goods and products produced by foreign cheap labor, unless the necessary measures are taken to prevent it.

If the prosperity of this country is to be maintained, then some steps must be taken to meet this threatened situation, and a competent tariff commission could solve the problem intelligently and satisfactorily.

The great industries of Louisiana, such as sugar, rice, and lumber, were not only unfairly and unjustly dealt with under the provisions of the Underwood bill, but they must and should be given additional protection when the producing world has been restored to its normal state, and if a competent tariff commission should be created, then all these industries ask is that they be accorded a fair hearing, due consideration, and justice.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HOWARD].

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. Chairman, it is very seldom that I find myself at variance with the majority of my brethren on this side of the Chamber, but upon this measure that is about to be passed through the House there is a principle involved, so far as I am concerned, that the exigencies of the occasion are not great enough to have me cast aside now.

I have always believed and so now believe in a tariff for revenue, which, of course, gives to domestic producers incidental protection to whatever extent the revenue rate is fixed.

In laying revenue taxes it is my firm and unalterable position that they should be levied upon the luxuries, and not upon the necessaries of life. This bill strikes a heavy blow at this principle which I have been taught to believe is true Democratic doctrine.

Mr. Chairman, to raise approximately $45,000,000 for governmental purposes we tax the people approximately $90,000,000, the other half of which goes into the coffers of the Sugar Trust.

Of course, I understand, as every man in this country understands who has a thimbleful of brains, that our customs revenues have been woefully impaired by the inability of some of the great nations at war to exchange commerce with us at all, and that those nations having the freedom of the seas are taxing their own industries to the extreme limit to supply their pressing and immediate demands brought about by the conflict now raging in Europe. It is necessary to find other sources of taxation to meet the current demands upon the Treasury and to meet the very great increase in our appropriations for the Army and Navy, but I contend that, even under such conditions as now confront us, for which no one except a crowd of demagogic politicians would censure the administration, it is neither necessary nor fair to the masses to continue this tax on sugar.

Gentlemen have said that the price of sugar is higher to-day than it has been in years, and that the reduction already in effect has not been reflected in the price to the consumer. That is true. Since August 1, 1914, there has been a gradual increase in the price of sugar, and every gentleman on this floor knows the reason for this increase. As soon as war was declared in Europe the sugar market here, as well as there, was shot all to pieces. France harvested hardly a third of her crop, Belgium practically none, and 2,000,000 tons of sugar under ordinary conditions imported from Austria and Germany were no longer available, and Russia was eliminated as an exporter. This, of course, meant a very great reduction in our supply of sugar without a corresponding reduction in consumption.

In the first six months of 1914, 2,131,098 tons of sugar was consumed in the United States, this being 245,131 tons, or 12.99 per cent, more than was consumed in 1913. During practically this entire six months' period the people were obtaining from the retailer 20 to 25 pounds of sugar for a dollar; to-day they get only 15 pounds.

The present duty of 1 cent a pound on sugar is the equivalent of 33⅓ per cent of the cost of production of refined sugar. Then if this duty is reflected in the price to the consumer—and all tariff experts agree that it is and our experience as consumers of sugar in normal times substantiates their statement—why not place a consumption tax of one-half cent a pound on all sugars, which would amount to a saving of approximately forty-two and a half million dollars to the people, and every penny of this sum would go into the Treasury, and the reduction in the price of sugar by this method would reduce the cost of sugar 1 cent per pound and the people would be in pocket at the end of a year just the exact amount they paid into the Treasury in a consumption tax. Or if we are to continue this tax and a 1 cent a pound rate is necessary and we need the revenue, then why divide it equally with the Sugar Trust? This bill means that the people's sugar bill for the next 12 months will be eighty millions more than it would have been had it not been reenacted. Then, if the people are to part with eighty millions, why not all of the eighty millions go into the Treasury of the United States by way of a consumption tax of 1 cent a pound rather than a tariff tax of 1 cent a pound, which means the same to the people but a direct loss of forty millions to the Treasury?

Mr. Chairman, let us lay this tax on luxuries. Put a 35 per cent ad valorem tax on raw silk, which is not now contributing one penny in revenue, consumed almost exclusively by the rich and a small percentage of our people who are able to bear the tax. This will raise $35,000,000. India rubber, used largely in the manufacture of automobile tires, contributes nothing to the Treasury, and a 10 per cent ad valorem tax on raw rubber will produce an additional sum equivalent to the amount a continuation of the sugar tax will produce.

It is my purpose to make such a proposal on a motion to recommit, thereby maintaining our integrity as to a time-honored principle of a great party that has heretofore borne a reputation for the fulfillment of all pledges made to the people.

The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LONGWORTH] welcomed us into the Republican fold yesterday. If you gentlemen get any comfort out of welcoming me into your fold you will have to take a hyperdermic along with your welcome sufficient in size and strength to allay the sufferings of a colic-stricken Missouri mule. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GREEN].

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, we are here to bury a part of the Underwood bill, and without intending any disrespect to the few and lonely mourners, I want to say that it is the most enjoyable funeral I ever attended. [Laughter.] I feel as though my span of life had been in some way lengthened. I never expected to live long enough to see the Democratic chairman of the Ways and Mean Committee introduce a bill for a protective tariff on sugar, and I never expected that my great-grandchild would ever learn of any competition between the Democratic Members of this House to see which should bring in a bill for a tariff commission.

Of course, this is only a halfway conversion, but we welcome them. When so many gentlemen are getting on the anxious seats it will not be long before a large number of them, in the language of a noted evangelist, will be "hitting the sawdust trail." [Laughter.]

Mr. Chairman, I think our Democratic friends in one respect have not treated us exactly fair. There had been no tariff bill introduced for two years, no tariff agitation in the House, apparently nothing doing, and apparently nothing about to be done, and we all thought it was a good time to take a day off and go in swimming. The first thing we know we find Democrats are trying to run away with all of our clothes. [Laughter.] Of course, we are willing they should be rehabilitated in this one act, and, if the thing keeps on, by next November it will be in order for some one on this side to rise up and make a motion that it be made unanimous. The only objection will be some ancient fossil, reading like a voice from the tombs, from the Democratic platform of 1904, "We denounce protection as a robbery of the many to enrich the few."

It is necessary that this bill should be passed, but I am not satisfied with the reasons given for its passage by gentlemen on the other side.

When the Ways and Means Committee last had the floor I was much interested in the remarks of the gentleman from North Carolina, the distinguished chairman of the Ways and Means Committee, a gentleman for whom I always had the highest respect, and for whom I have come to have an affectionate regard. He spoke at that time with so much wit and humor, in so pleasing a manner, in a somewhat whimsical and utterly irresponsible way that I do not know when I have been so much entertained. [Laughter.] I do not mean to say that I did not get any information from the gentleman, because I did; and also a lot of misinformation. I had never fully understood what was meant by a tariff for revenue only. There were some that seemed to think that it meant a tariff for incidental protection; others that it meant a tariff with protection in spots, such as Louisiana sugar or Texas goats, the preference being given by the Democratic system to the goats. But the gentleman made this all perfectly clear and I understand it fully now. A tariff for revenue only is one that decreases the revenue, and that is the only thing that it does do; but when the gentleman was speaking on this particular point he was so extremely modest and moderate—a fault to which he is so little given that I am sure the House will excuse him—that he did not half state the case. I hasten to come to his assistance and to the assistance of my friend from Mississippi [Mr. COLLIER], who has just spoken upon the same subject.

For the purpose of full understanding of the necessity for this bill, and of what kind of a law the Underwood tariff is as a revenue producer, I want to make a comparison of two years, the calendar year 1913 and the calendar year 1915. This comparison will be highly favorable to the other side, because in the calendar year 1913, during the last three months certain portions of the Underwood tariff were in force. During the calendar year 1913 the imports were $1,792,000,000, speaking in round numbers, and in the calendar year 1915 the imports were $1,778,000,000—only $14,000,000 less—but the customs receipts collected in the year 1913 were $310,000,000, and the amount collected under the Underwood tariff in the year 1913 was $197,000,000. In other words, while the imports were only $14,000,000 less, the revenue collected was $113,000,000 less, and yet they talk about the war having caused the depreciation in the revenues under the Underwood law!

If this bill is not passed it is a fair estimate to say that with the same amount of imports the customs receipts will be $150,000,000 less per year than under the Payne bill. Let us take a more recent instance, and, indeed, I am more concerned in what may happen to us in the future than I am in what has happened in the past, because I believe we will have a more severe experience in the future than we have had in the past. In January, 1916, the imports were $21,028,861 greater than they were in January, 1913, and the customs revenue collected in January, 1916, was only $15,529,802, while the customs revenue collected in January, 1913, was $29,334,124. Thus, with $21,000,000 more of imports in January, 1916, they collected only a little over half of the revenue which was produced in 1913. But the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. COLLIER] says that during the first few months of the Underwood tariff law, before the war broke out, they got the revenue necessary to carry on the Government.

It is true that with the help of the sale of some battleships, together with the income tax and with the increase in the imports, they did take in somewhat more than was taken in during the same months under the Payne law, and they also expended a great deal more. During the first seven months of 1914 the imports were $121,000,000 larger than they were during the same months of 1913.

Mr. HILL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Yes.

Mr. HILL. I would like to make a correction right now. The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. COLLIER] last night made the statement which the gentleman has just made, that the receipts from customs revenue for the first seven months of 1913 were less than they were for the first seven months of 1914 under the Underwood law. He is absolutely and totally mistaken, and I said last night that I would look up the figures and I have looked them up this morning, and they are $23,000,000 greater.

Mr. COLLIER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. With pleasure.

Mr. COLLIER. I think the gentleman from Connecticut is in error when he says that I stated that the imports received were so and so. I said the receipts.

Mr. HILL. I say the receipts.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I shall have to decline to yield if the gentleman from Mississippi is going to enter into a discussion with the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. HILL].

Mr. Chairman, as I have just stated, the imports were $121,944,698 more, and the revenue was $23,360,548 less, comparing the first seven months of 1914 with the first seven months of 1913. As the gentleman said, they did get the revenue, but how did they get it? They got it by displacing the products of American mills, of American farms, of American labor. That was the way they got it. They got it by bringing about the greatest list of failures both in number and amount that the financial history of this country has ever known. They got it by creating the greatest number of idle freight cars and putting more miles of railroad under a receivership than had ever been done before.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a short question?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Yes.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Who benefited by that?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Nobody but some importers of New York City and the immediate vicinity. Never was revenue collected in a more costly way; never was there such a case of a few gaining at the expense of the many as was done when this revenue was collected in this manner. They took away the wages of between two and three million American workingmen and, for all practical purposes, handed them over to foreign citizens. According to a statement made by the Department of Labor, a bureau conducted by this administration, 381,000 men were idle in the winter of 1913–14 in the city of New York alone.

Mr. Chairman, for the present we are enjoying a prosperity as the result of a traffic in the implements of death. Our mills are whirring as they manufacture the weapons of destruction. It is said that hundreds of thousands of dollars in value have been exported in a single day of the last week from the city of New York alone, but this prosperity is unnatural, ephemeral, and fleeting. Peace—blessed peace—so much wished for by all of us, so much prayed for everywhere, will bring us back again under the Underwood law, where experiences we have had will be but a foretaste of what is to come upon us. When the embargo that is created by the war is removed, once more our ports will be flooded with foreign products; once more the fires in our mills will go out; once more our streets will be filled with workingmen, walking the streets until prosperity is restored under a Republican administration by a Republican tariff. [Applause.]

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, I yield one minute to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. COLLIER].

Mr. COLLIER. Mr. Chairman, I wish to say to the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. HILL] that I think he is in error in saying that I said the customs receipts were more.

I intended to say, and the stenographer's notes bear out my contention, that the Underwood Act produced more revenue from January 1, 1914, to August 1, 1914, by over $17,000,000 than the Payne Tariff Act produced from January 1, 1913, to August 1, 1913, but I included the returns from the income tax for 1914, just as the gentleman included thirty-four million and odd dollars returns received from the corporation tax in 1913.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield one minute to the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. HILL].

Mr. HILL. Mr. Chairman, I understood the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. COLLIER] to say, and I think Members generally understood him to say, that the customs receipts for the period referred to, the first seven months of the calendar year of 1914, were greater under the Underwood law than under the Payne law for the first seven months of the calendar year of 1913, and I immediately went to him in the cloakroom and asked for his figures. He did not have them, and I have therefore compiled them this morning. His remarks do not appear in the RECORD to-day. As his statement from his stenographer's notes shows that I was mistaken, and that he referred to the whole bill, of course I have nothing further to say, except to make this suggestion, that the total amount received from the whole customs and revenue law by the Government included the proceeds of the sale of two battleships for $12,000,000 to Greece——

Mr. COLLIER. No; I did not——

Mr. HILL. In the month of July, 1914, if I am not mistaken.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. CROSSER].

Mr. CROSSER. Mr. Chairman, it is not at all pleasant to have to disagree with some of my associates on this side of the House, neither is it pleasant to one's ears to hear sarcastic invitations from gentlemen on the other side to join their party, and I assure them that I am not going to do so. There are two reasons why I can not support this bill. The first is that I solemnly stated to the people whom I have the honor to represent that I would not do so; that I would not only help to put this article on the free list but likewise every other necessity of life. Believing that my pledge to the people is of more importance than any man's opinion as to the wisdom of this legislation, if there were no other reason, then for that reason alone I would vote against this bill. But there is another reason. I think that the results which would flow from this legislation would be not only injustice but would be immoral. I never yet have been able to see the philosophy or the wisdom in making the great rank and file of the American people pay taxes in this way. I have been suspicious for a good many years as to the means used in getting popular sentiment in favor of what seems to me to be such an outrageous system of taxation, and accordingly I was not greatly surprised when I read a letter in the hearings before the United States Senate committee to investigate in regard to the maintenance of a lobby to influence legislation. This letter is addressed to Mr. C. B. Warren, president of the Michigan Sugar Co., Detroit, Mich., and is written by a man named Hamlin, who was employed by the American sugar industries as their attorney and represented them in Washington and attended to their interests in matters of legislation. I am going to read as much of this letter as I can during the short time I have:

MARCH 20, 1912.

Mr. C. B. WARREN,
Union Trust Building, Detroit, Mich.

DEAR MR. WARREN: Since our meeting on Saturday I have had two conferences with Mr. Hinman, who controls the Chicago Inter Ocean. It seems to me that the matters discussed deserve our serious consideration. Mr. FORDNEY may have spoken to you something about the matter. It seems that Mr. Hinman has purchased, or arranged to purchase, $200,000 of bonds of the Inter Ocean, formerly held by the Yerkes estate, but, as I gather it, he is not in shape to handle the proposition personally and desires to place these bonds. The total bond issue against the paper is $600,000, including the above, and bear interest at 5 per cent and mature in 1926. Of the $200,000 mentioned, $165,000 has already been placed, and Mr. Hinman desires assistance in handling the remaining $35,000. In placing the bonds already sold Mr. Hinman has had the assistance of the Vice President and ex-Speaker CANNON, both of whom are interested in seeing him carry through this transaction. His proposal is that we assist him in taking care of the remainder of these bonds, $50,000 of the proceeds to go to working capital.

The Inter Ocean has had its vicissitudes, and is now operating at some loss, but Mr. Hinman assures me that it is on the upgrade. He tells me that they are practically free from floating indebtedness and have never defaulted in an interest payment. The Inter Ocean is one of the three papers which hold Associated Press franchises in the city of Chicago, and is the only Chicago daily which publishes a weekly edition. This weekly edition has a circulation of nearly 100,000, almost exclusively among the farmers in sections which it is most desirable for us to reach. I think no paper published in that section of the country is so generally quoted by the agricultural and country press as is the Inter Ocean. The paper has always been friendly to our interests, and should we aid Mr. Hinman a specialty will be made of the sugar tariff, and our business will receive particular attention all along the line. The daily circulation of the paper is about 86,000. Mr. Hinman tells me that he has a standing offer of $1,000,000 for the paper, and while these securities are not such as to be disposed of readily, it seems to me they are perfectly safe, as a paper with the circulation, franchise, and standing such as the Inter Ocean surely ought always to be worth $600,000. It certainly seems to me that it would be a good business for our people to make this investment, and thereby establish an organ in the Middle West which will give our industry the attention it deserves. So far as my own company is concerned, I feel safe in saying that we will do our share.

If these bonds, or a considerable portion of them, were taken over and then distributed among the larger concerns, the amount invested by anyone would not be large, neither would the money be given in the way of a contribution.

I gather from my talk with Mr. Hinman that the matter is somewhat urgent in so far as time is concerned. Mr. Hinman personally owns about three-fourths of the stock of the company. Mr. Oxnard seems to think that his people would look with favor upon helping.

I am writing only to yourself and Mr. Morey. If two or three of the stronger concerns could underwrite the remainder of these bonds, or a substantial portion of them, I believe we would have no difficulty in distributing them among the various interests affected.

You had better communicate with me by wire on receipt of this, giving your general impressions concerning same.

Very truly, yours.

The following letter, written by the same Mr. Hamlin, gives us some idea of the manner in which tariff speeches are prepared:

FEBRUARY 1, 1912.

Mr. C. B. WARREN,
Union Trust Building, Detroit, Mich.

DEAR MR. WARREN: I wired you to-day as follows:

"Have Hathaway prepare immediately and forward me brief which can be used as basis for presentation of our side of question when bill is before House. Bill will not be in under 10 days and probably longer, but want this very earliest moment possible. Urgent personal business calls me West for two or three days, but will be back before anything turns up. Might be well for Hathaway come here do this work on ground. Am writing."

Mr. Pickett, of Iowa, who is classed as an insurgent, will make one of the principal speeches in opposition to any sugar measure which may be brought in. Mr. Palmer is now at work on the necessary data. He will take the question up from the standpoint of its being a refiners' propaganda and also from the agricultural end.

Mr. MONDELL, of Wyoming, also wishes to enter the fight on the floor and to be equipped with the necessary information. It is for him that I want Mr. Hathaway to prepare a brief. Have two purposes in this, the principal one being that in furnishing information for two persons it is well to have the question approached from two different viewpoints, as it is difficult for one man to prepare a brief for two persons without their running along the same line. In addition to this we want to give ourselves all the time we can, for when the bill is once introduced, under the system adopted for other bills, it is apt to be pushed along very rapidly, and there will be very little chance for preparation. This is very important, and the sooner it is done the better. It might be well if Mr. Hathaway could come here and do the work on the ground. If he does, I will arrange matters so that he can get into immediate touch with Mr. MONDELL and know exactly what he wants. It seems to me wise to have this question presented as far as possible by Members whose districts or States are not largely interested in this industry.

A matter of most urgent personal importance demands that I go to Colorado for a couple of days. I have checked the matter up here carefully and satisfied myself by first-hand information that our matter will not come up for at least 10 days and will probably be longer. Everything is working all right and I shall not be away a minute longer than is absolutely necessary. The matter on which I go is of the gravest importance or I would not think of leaving at this time.

The inclosed sugar story appeared in the Washington Post this morning. Mr. UNDERWOOD stated to-day that if the information came from an authoritative source it was the individual judgment of some member of the committee, as the committee itself had reached no conclusion whatever as to the rate of duty.

Very truly, yours.

Another letter explains to some extent the methods of publicity pursued by the interests. It is as follows:

DECEMBER 2, 1911.

Mr. C. B. WARREN,
Union Trust Building, Detroit, Mich.

DEAR MR. WARREN: I am very much pleased with the results of the little trip I made, and believe it has done considerable good. We are getting matters started and, if followed up, think we will secure the line of publicity which will do much to rectify the false impression which prevails concerning our industry. Visited one big town on each day of my trip and invariably succeeded in getting our story in at least one of the leading papers. Of course, some handled it more satisfactorily than others, but, generally speaking, they all did well. I am inclosing herewith a copy of the Pioneer Press interview, both because it is a fair sample of our best results and for the reason that you will be directly interested in the local features of it. Am having a marked copy of the Pioneer Press sent to every newspaper in Minnesota and the two Dakotas. The papers which carried our story are Cleveland Plain Dealer, Chicago Inter-Ocean, Springfield News, St. Paul Pioneer Press, Indianapolis News, Minneapolis Tribune, Des Moines Capital, Des Moines Register and Leader, and Kansas City Times. Find that the Associated Press have handled some of our stuff in very good shape. The sale of the Chaska plant and its benefit to the beet industry generally was handled in this manner. You probably saw it, but will try and locate it and forward clipping.

While in Indianapolis I took up the matter of publicity with the American Press Association. This concern furnishes matter for the country press. It is not patented inside stuff, but goes on the outside of the paper as news. Am trying it out in a limited way in Indiana, and if successful there believe we can get a big line of publicity at a very reasonable figure in this manner. Furnished them with two stories—one upon the agricultural benefits of beet growing, and the other upon the tariff and price of sugar—the two occupying one column of space. This goes to 250 Indiana papers, and the cost to us is $125, including delivery. For twice this amount they would have given us an entire page, so you will see the expense is small if we can secure the results. I will have a full check-up on this before our Chicago meeting and believe we will want to take it up in all the States which it is most desirable to reach.

I believe by the time we meet in Chicago that I will have a plan of publicity to submit which will give us what we desire within a reasonable range of cost. I find that wherever I can get a chance to take these questions up with people it is not difficult to clear up the situation, although I find that there is an almost universal prejudice against us among newspaper people and a general misunderstanding of the situation everywhere. I am leaving for Washington to-morrow morning and will arrive Tuesday morning.

Thanks for your telegram with reference to contribution. Others have responded with like promptness, and we will be in good shape financially to take care of everything which can arise up to the first of the year.

Very truly, yours.

Here is another letter, which for obvious reasons will interest us:

MAY 6, 1912.

Mr. GEORGE W. HINMAN,
The Inter Ocean, Chicago, Ill.

MY DEAR MR. HINMAN: I have been very much engaged for the past few days, which will account for my delay in answering yours of the 29th ultimo.

The letter sent out was marked "Personal and confidential," and you can depend upon its being treated in that way. I did not ask our people to wire, and as yet can give you no definite information, but should hear from them at an early date. Have been unfortunate in missing Mr. FORDNEY. Went to see him two or three times and called at his hotel to-day only to find that he is in Michigan. You have doubtless heard from Mr. Scheutte that Mr. Warren expressed himself very favorably, but seems to want to procrastinate in this matter. I shall keep you advised of anything that takes place.

Very truly, yours.

The Senate committee stated at the hearing that the Mr. FORDNEY referred to in the foregoing letter is a Member of Congress.

The Democratic Party in 1912 made a vigorous campaign upon the proposition that it would lower the cost of living by reducing the tariff, and, Mr. Chairman, it gave me a great deal of satisfaction to know that the price of sugar, one of the articles most necessary to the life of every citizen in the land, was actually reduced a little more than 1 cent a pound, which was the amount of the reduction of the tariff on sugar made by the Underwood law passed by the last Congress. Under the new rates from March 1 to July 1, 1914, the refiners' selling price of refined sugar averaged 3.81 cents per pound as compared with an average price for the previous 10 years of 4.85 cents per pound.

Now, note the effect upon the price of sugar of the announcement that the duty on sugar should be retained. The price rapidly advanced during October and November, 1915, until it reached 5.73 cents per pound, and to-day it has reached a point where it sells for 6.65 cents per pound.

Of course the author of the bill disclaims any intention of giving the sugar barons any special privilege to throttle the American people. We are given to understand that the reason for making it possible for them to get this bounty or bonus is that the Government may get some revenue. Now, if they want only the revenue it would be easy enough for the Government to procure for itself as revenue the total increase in the price of sugar. If we must have a tax upon what the people consume, let the Government reduce the tax upon sugar imported to one-half the amount proposed to be levied, and then levy a tax of equal amount upon the sugar produced within the limits of the United States and its Territories. This would secure the total increase in price to the Government as revenue and would provide fair competition for the sugar producers of this country. This would prevent them from monopolizing the market and unreasonably advancing the price. As I have already said, I do not believe in taxing the people according to the amount of food they must have. That is wrong. That is infamous. But if we are going to tax people according to the quantity they must eat, then let us tax equally what is produced here and what is imported. That, at least, will make it certain that the Government will receive as revenue whatever may be the increase in the price on account of the tax.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. HULL].

Mr. HULL of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, when my confirmed reactionary stand-pat friends on the other side raise the black flag of special privilege and hark back to the Payne law, I am always reminded of the remark of that distinguished Senator from Iowa, Mr. Dolliver, to the effect that the year 1909 was notable for two great frauds practiced on the American people, namely, the alleged discovery of the North Pole by Dr. Cook and the enactment of the Payne-Aldrich law, and that the President with equal enthusiasm sent a telegram of hearty congratulations to the authors of each.

Mr. Chairman, it would be impossible to describe the diligent, strenuous, and vain efforts of our friends upon the other side to find an issue on which they can with some plausibility go before the people in the coming campaign. They have been attempting through some of their great leaders, like Senator Root, to frame up some kind of an issue with respect to our foreign affairs, but some of the stand-pat gentlemen on the other side, having overindulged, a few days ago, in the political goose step, destroyed whatever plans were being perfected in that direction. They now turn to the old idea of a stand-pat high-protective tariff. They are endeavoring as best they can to revive this old issue, now rapidly becoming academic and obsolete.

In my judgment, Mr. Chairman, viewing existing conditions, both present and prospective, protection, the kind of monopoly-breeding protection which gentlemen on the other side have been accustomed to proclaim in this country, as an issue is practically dead. High protection will certainly not be a material or controlling issue in the coming campaign. The country has unbounded prosperity under the Underwood law. But in their efforts to present that issue we find at every turn conflicting views and suggestions emanating from gentlemen on the other side of the House. Some of them insist that the war was sufficient to overcome the evils of the Underwood tariff law, enough to bring about prosperity in this country, while others say that the war was not able to overcome its other evils enough to allow it to yield a sufficient amount of revenue to the Government. Both of those propositions taken together are untenable and absurd. Gentlemen upon the other side must agree and admit that the war has affected our revenues or it has not affected our prosperity. They must also admit that even though they assume that the war has had no material effect upon either——

Mr. MEEKER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HULL of Tennessee. Yes.

Mr. MEEKER. I would like to ask if there is a tax on exports?

Mr. HULL of Tennessee. I take it that the gentleman has read the Constitution of the United States.

Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] stated the truth in his remarks on yesterday when referring to this bill he said that the Treasury needs the money and that is all there is to it. That is true with respect to Democratic action in dealing with the tariff; it looks solely to the needs of the Treasury.

Now, gentlemen upon the other side have undertaken to twit Democrats by pretending to assume that we have abandoned our principle with respect to the removal of the tariff tax from sugar. If gentlemen upon the other side will convince the beet-sugar manufacturers and the cane-sugar growers and manufacturers that we have abandoned that or any other principle with respect to tariff taxation, then I will be willing to listen to the remarks of the gentlemen made in this spirit of criticism. If gentlemen upon the other side will bring a single beet-sugar manufacturer or a cane-sugar grower before this House and let him state in his judgment that the Democratic Party has abandoned permanently any phase of its doctrine with respect to sugar, then I will have more deference for the remarks which gentlemen have been making on this floor. The truth is, Mr. Chairman, the Democratic Party, in charge of the Government, yielded, as the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] stated, to expediency in the light of pressing war emergencies. We yielded to expediency in this one instance, while our friends upon the other side yield to expediency in all instances. Now, I was surprised at the remarks of my friend from Connecticut [Mr. HILL]. He stated that when the Republican Party went out of power they left $149,000,000 cash in the Treasury, and he states that at present there is only $44,000,000, and that, eliminating the amounts deposited for the redemption of national-bank notes, and other funds, which in some senses are not strictly available for expenditure, the Republicans left $80,000,000 in the Treasury, whereas we now have only $16,000,000. I am sure the gentleman overlooked the fact that $75,000,000 of income tax, which has already accrued and will be paid into the Treasury during this fiscal year, which accrued at the rate of $6,500,000 per month, would properly be an item in his calculation. If that is included, then there would be $6,500,000 multiplied by eight, or $54,000,000, added to the $16,000,000 which he gives the present administration credit for.

Mr. HILL. I said the figures were taken from the daily Treasury report of March 3, 1913, and March 4, 1916, during three years of time.

Mr. HULL of Tennessee. I understand, Mr. Chairman; but I am making the statement that the income tax accrued to the Treasury last year at the rate of about $6,500,000 per month.

Mr. HILL. That will not accrue at all in four months after this statement is made.

Mr. HULL of Tennessee. This fiscal year.

Mr. HILL. Will not accrue until four months after this statement is made.

Mr. HULL of Tennessee. The gentleman is accounting for the corporation tax under the Payne law and refuses to include the income tax accrued at present.

Mr. HILL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman allow an interruption?

Mr. HULL of Tennessee. Yes.

Mr. HILL. It does include the income tax for last year, but not for this year, because that will not come in until June and July.

Mr. HULL of Tennessee. But, Mr. Chairman, we are talking about the present resources of the Treasury in this fiscal year.

Mr. HILL. That is exactly what I say.

Mr. HULL of Tennessee. I will undertake to say that at the end of this fiscal year there will be as much and more money paid into the Treasury than has ever been paid into the Treasury in the history of the Government in a single fiscal year. I will say, further, that when the income tax that has accrued is considered in this calculation—which is but fair and proper—our present state of the Treasury as compared with its condition on the 4th of March, 1916, will be very close to those figures.

Now, it has been the habit of gentlemen on the other side to undertake to make the impression that under Democratic tax laws we have deficits, and that the balance of trade is sometimes against this Government. I glanced over the figures some days ago, and I found that although it has been claimed that a deficit is almost an impossibility under Republican rule, and that the balances of trade are always in our favor under their rule, since 1861 down to the present year the balance of trade has been against this country 16 years, and that it was against it during 2 years of Democratic administration and 14 years of Republican administration. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

I also found that from 1861 to 1916 there have been 14 deficits in the ordinary receipts and expenditures of the Government, including postal receipts and deficiencies. Of those 14, 5 occurred under Democratic rule and 9 under Republican rule. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

I went a little further and looked into the deficits that have occurred in our total receipts and expenditures since 1861. I found that 27 deficits had occurred in the total receipts and expenditures of the Government, and I discovered that 5 of these had occurred under Democratic administration and 22 of them had occurred under Republican administration. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

The fact is, Mr. Chairman, that while we hear much talk about the state of the Treasury, yet up to 1890 it had never been the practice of the Government to count as an asset of the Treasury either money deposited for the redemption of national-bank notes or the subsidiary coin, which was only legal tender to the extent of $5; but under the financial stress of that year our Republican friends then enacted a law which transferred all these so-called assets and trust funds—I think about $54,000,000—from one side of the ledger to the other. In that way they made a pretense of having some money in the Treasury at the end of that administration, to the extent of two or three million dollars.

But they have not only approved that act; they have gone further than that. They have not only utilized the current receipts and the subsidiary coin and the deposits for the redemption of national-bank notes, but they have invaded almost every trust fund in the Treasury at some time or another during their incumbency. I may further say that, when the Payne law was reported to this House, gentlemen who now talk very loudly about the alleged depleted condition of the Treasury solemnly brought into this House a report, unanimously signed by them, in which they asserted as a matter of sound finance that, in estimating the condition of the Treasury and the expenditures for a fiscal year in advance, it was good fiscal policy to include 5 per cent of the unexpended appropriations already made as an amount available for general expenditures. The result was that this report, in its estimates, deducted from our prospective and estimated expenditures 5 per cent of appropriations already made, amounting to $45,906,000.

Let me read you this extract from that report, dated March 18, 1909, accompanying the Payne tariff bill:

It is proved by experience and from an examination of the appropriations from year to year that a balance of from 6 to 8 per cent of the appropriations calling for the payment of money is unexpended at the end of each fiscal year. In estimating for the expenditure of money for the year 1910, the committee has made a deduction of only 5 per cent on this account, in order to furnish a conservative estimate. The estimates of the revenue to be derived from customs made by the committee, and found below, are on the basis of the importations for the fiscal year 1906. That year was selected because it was the last year of normal conditions. If the year 1907 had been taken as a basis, at least $30,000,000 would be added to this estimate, and it is quite probable that the importations under this bill during the second year of its existence will equal or exceed those of 1907, and that the revenue will approach the same amount.

With these explanations, the committee submits the following table showing the estimate of the amount of money required to meet the expenditures under the appropriations for 1910, and the estimate for revenue, viz:

Total appropriations for 1910		$1,044,014,298.23
Deduct estimated sinking-fund appropriation	$60,000,000.00
Deduct bank-note redemption (paid by banks)	30,000,000.00
Deduct Panama Canal appropriation, to be provided by bonds	35,886,190.58
		125,886,190.58
		918,128,107.65
Deduct 5 per cent estimated appropriations which are not usually expended		45,906,405.88
Amount for which revenue is to be provided		872,221,701.77
Estimated revenues, report Secretary Treasury:
From internal revenue	$250,000,000
From miscellaneous revenue	62,000,000
From postal revenue	223,340,712
Estimated by committee from—
Customs under proposed bill	305,225,173
Internal revenue on legacies, etc	20,000,000
Internal revenue on cigarettes, increase	1,500,000
		862,065,885.00
Deficit		10,155,816.77

Now, if any Democrat on this floor had even suggested that policy at present he would almost have been driven out of this Hall by the denunciation and criticism of gentlemen on the other side. This Democratic administration has never been reduced to that extremity, and I predict that it never will be.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Tennessee has expired.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is recognized for five minutes more.

Mr. HULL of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I listened to the reading of an English publication by the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. HILL] on yesterday inclining toward a protective tariff. I have here a publication which would be taken for a resolution adopted by the Home Market Club, of Boston, or gotten out by the American Economist, which stands for ultra-high protection. This, however, in reality was adopted by the Association of Saxon Manufacturers. We have heard much pretended fear expressed by a few individuals in regard to the prospective dumping by Europe of its surplus products upon us, but I find upon an investigation that Europe is in far greater fear of this result from the United States than any intelligent citizen of this country is in fear of this result from Europe. This association solemnly resolved that raw materials, semimanufactures, and manufactures themselves be subjected, so far as imports are concerned, to an embargo, limiting imports to only a percentage of those that were coming in before the war, in order that Germany might have time to readjust her commercial conditions and to build up and to revive her industries and her financial affairs from the ruinous effects of the war. Here is a translation of that resolution:

FOREIGN TARIFFS.

[Jan. 17, 1916.]

GERMANY—PROPOSED MEASURES FOR PROTECTION OF GERMAN MARKET.

[Handel und Gewerbe, Nov. 20, 1915.]

The Association of Saxon Manufacturers (Verband Sächsischer Industrieller) adopted the following resolution on October 7, 1915:

"In view of the danger of a scarcity of raw materials, semimanufactures, and manufactures that may be caused by the change in the economic life of Germany from war conditions to those of peace, and the possibility that a sudden resumption of commercial relations with the present hostile countries upon the conclusion of the war will result in the flooding of the German market with foreign products, the Association of Saxon Manufacturers considers it necessary that the Bundesrath (Federal Council) adopt proper measures to guard against such displacement of German industry from the German market, and believes that this could be accomplished most expeditiously by a temporary restriction of foreign imports of semimanufactures and manufactures to a fixed portion of such imports prior to the war."

Mr. Chairman, I have in the same connection a statement from a noted English economist. When the Payne law was pending the Republicans in the Senate published and circulated extensively as a public document an argument by Mr. J. Ellis Barker, of England, entitled "One Hundred Points Against Free Trade." They circulated that all over the country. I have here now a recent magazine article by this same gentleman, whose arguments and statements they are estopped from denying, showing clearly and convincingly, according to the census of the United States for 1909 and the census of England for 1907, the relative cost of production in this country and in England in about twenty important industries. I read:

[Excerpt from a London magazine on Great Britain's war finance and economic future, entitled "A forecast and a warning," by J. Ellis Barker. (Source.—The Nineteenth Century and After, Dec., 1915.)]

The greatest resource of every nation is, in Colbert's words, the labor of the people. Unfortunately, the labor of the British people is very largely wasted. If we compare the productivity of labor in this country and in the United States we find, incredible as it may sound, that American labor is about three times as efficient as is British labor; that one American worker produces approximately as much as do three British workers. This assertion can be proved by means of the British and the United States censuses of production. The British census of production refers to the year 1907 and the American census to the year 1909. The two years lie so near together that one may fairly compare the results given. There is, of course, a difficulty in comparing the efficiency of British and American labor. In the first place the industries in the two countries have not always been officially classified in the same manner. Therefore many industries, such as the iron industry, can not be compared by means of the census figures. In the second place the qualities of American and British produce frequently differ widely. These considerations have necessarily narrowed the range of comparative figures. The following table contains statistics relating to some British and American industries which may fairly be compared. They will show conclusively that in many of the comparable industries the American workers produce approximately three times as large a quantity of goods as do their English colleagues, and that they succeed in producing three times as much, not because they work three times as hard, but because, as is shown in the table, the United States use in the identical industries approximately three times as much horsepower per 1,000 men as does Great Britain. The following figures are extracted from a fuller table, which appeared in an article of mine published in the Fortnightly Review for August, 1913, to which I would refer those who desire further details. They were much discussed at the time, but they have hitherto not been successfully challenged.

The figures given, which have not been selected for the purpose of fixing a case, show irrefutably that the British manufacturing industries as a whole are almost incredibly inefficient. Wherever we look we find that the American worker produces per year approximately three times as much as does his British colleague. Even the British cotton industry, the premier industry of the country, is, both on the spinning and on the weaving side, not provided with the best labor-saving machinery, as I pointed out very fully in an article in this review three years ago.

The comparison of production per wage earner per year in England and the United States is based upon wholesale prices. It is true that the shop prices of many commodities are higher in the United States than in England. However, this difference is due very largely to the fact that the American retailers require a larger profit because they have larger expenses, and because the business of distribution is more costly in the United States than here because distances are greater. In most cases the wholesale prices of comparable commodities are nearly identical in both countries. The fact that the American workers produce on an average approximately three times as much as their British colleagues employed in the same industries can therefore not be gainsaid.

It is, of course, generally known that in many cases American workers employ far more perfect machinery than do their British colleagues, but it is not generally known, and it seems almost unbelievable, that the American workers employ, besides better machinery, about three times as much power as do the British workers engaged in the same trades. If we allow for the fact that the American industries possess not only better machines but in addition three times as much power with which to drive them, it is obvious that the mechanical efficiency of the American industries is considerably more than three times as great as that of the corresponding British industries.

The lamentable inefficiency of British production is apparent not only in manufacturing, but in agriculture and mining as well. The coal tables of 1912, published by the British Board of Trade in March, 1914, contain many interesting figures relating to coal production in England and abroad. Coal is the bread of the manufacturing industries. Its importance to the nation can scarcely be exaggerated. Let us see how British coal production compares with coal production elsewhere.

Tons of coal produced per annum per person employed.

It will be noticed that the coal production per man per year is about twice as large in Australia, New Zealand, and Canada as it is in the United Kingdom, and that it is almost three times as large in the United States as it is in this country. This startling difference can only partly be explained by the fact that in many cases the coal seams are thicker in the United States than in Great Britain and are to be found at a lesser depth. This startling discrepancy in output is largely, if not chiefly, ascribable to this, that the British miner, as the British industrial worker, is hostile to improved machinery and is determinedly bent upon limiting output. It is ominous that whereas British coal production per man has steadily been decreasing during the last 30 years, American, Australian, New Zealand, and Canadian coal production per man has been steadily increasing. The British miner has unfortunately succeeded in more than nullifying the technical improvements made in coal production which in other countries have greatly increased production per man.

While an increasing coal production per man in America, Australia, and New Zealand has brought about the cheapening of coal, or has, at least, prevented it becoming dearer, greatly increased wages notwithstanding, the reduction in the British output per man, combined with increased wages, has fatally increased the price of British coal. This will appear from the following figures:

The figures given show that the British coal miners have succeeded in reducing the output of coal per man and creating an artificial scarcity. In former years British coal was approximately as cheap as American coal, and in some years it was cheaper. Of that advantage the manufacturing interests have now been deprived. Of late years, owing to increased wages and reduced output, English coal prices have been 50 per cent higher than American coal prices. Hence, the British manufacturing interests suffer not only from insufficient output due to inefficient machinery and insufficient power to drive it, but also from unnecessarily high coal prices.

While British masters were opposed to industrial progress and to all innovations from conservatism, from indifference, or from sheer laziness, their men looked upon improved organization and machinery with positive and undisguised hostility, for they had been taught by their leaders that their greatest interest lay in a high wage and in a low output; that every increase in output injured the other workers and themselves. It seems incredible that such a foolish fallacy should have been allowed to restrict and stifle the development of the British industries. Unfortunately the British workers, as a whole, are at present as hostile to the introduction of modern methods and improved machinery as they were in the machine-smashing era a century ago. The world is a great cooperative society. Men are paid money wages, but as they spend in purchasing goods they are in reality paid in goods, in food, clothes, etc. A man who produces food is paid in clothes, and a man who make clothes has to buy food. If both produce "scientifically" as little as possible they will lack food and clothes, whatever their wages may be. If, on the other hand, both produce much there will be abundance and prosperity. Production determines wages. Small production and high wages are incompatible. High production and high wages go hand in hand. In the United States wages are from two to three times as high as in this country, because production per man is from two to three times as great, goods are very little dearer in the United States than in England, high wages notwithstanding. The result is that the very highly-paid American workman can purchase with their large wages an abundance of food, clothes, etc., and can save large amounts in addition.

In the lengthy table summarizing British and American production per worker per year, printed on another page, the gross value of the goods produced is given. Of course, a worker who converts in a day a piece of leather into a pair of boots worth 15s. does not really produce 15s. worth of goods. To arrive at the real value of his day's work we must deduct from the value of the goods made by him, the cost of the raw material, and the general factory expenses. By deducting these we find that the net production per worker per week is as follows in the United States and Great Britain, according to the censuses of production:

Net produce per worker per week.

It will be noticed that in the trades enumerated the American workers produce per week, as a rule, from two to three times as much net as their British colleagues. As no worker can possibly obtain for his work more than the entire value of his work, it is clear that the British worker, in cardboard boxes, for instance, can not obtain more than $5.25 per week unless he produces more. This table, which has not previously been given, explains why wages are high in America and relatively low in this country.

Mr. FORDNEY. I yield to the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. SLEMP].

Mr. SLEMP. Mr. Chairman, in introducing the free-sugar bill in the House of Representatives on March 14, 1912, Mr. UNDERWOOD said:

There is no bill that more clearly marks the dividing line between the two political parties of this country than does this bill—

The bill admitting sugar into this country free of duty. This is another way of stating that, should there be confusion in any man's mind as to whether he belonged to the Republican Party or to the Democratic Party, there was at least one sure and permanent guide in eliminating this confusion, and that is that if a man favored free sugar he was a Democrat and if he favored a duty on sugar he was a Republican. [Applause on the Republican side.] Mr. UNDERWOOD also stated that the differences between the two parties on this subject were of historical standing and so fundamental as not to be composed.

In spite of this position taken by the former Democratic leader of the House of Representatives, and in spite of the fact that advocacy of free sugar offers to Democrats generally their only means of self-identification, the Democratic members of the Ways and Means Committee joined with the Republican members of the committee in adopting the Republican position in favor of retaining the present sugar duty, and I congratulate them upon their action.

I voted for a retention of the duties on sugar in 1912, in 1913, and will do so again when this bill comes before the House.

It is interesting, however, to note the reasons advanced by the Democratic leaders for changing their position and advocating this Republican doctrine. Their report says:

This legislation is made necessary in order that the Treasury may have the benefit of the revenue receipts from sugar to assist in meeting the decline in customs and postal receipts, due to the disturbed conditions resulting from the European war, and also to assist in meeting the decline in ordinary internal-revenue receipts.

It becomes, therefore, the subject of investigation as to whether there has been any decline in postal revenues, ordinary internal-revenue receipts, and custom duties; and if so, whether such decline has been brought about by conditions resulting from the European war.

Treating these subjects in order, let us examine the situation relating to postal revenues. Mr. UNDERWOOD, on December 17, 1915, while addressing another body on the subject of the Underwood tariff bill and the sufficiency of the revenues therefrom, said:

It was assumed at the time the present law was written that postal receipts would take care of postal expenditures, and I believe that can be assumed as a fact to-day and for the immediate future.

One gets confirmation of this view in a statement issued by Postmaster General Burleson, November 5, 1915, in which he announces the "return of postal receipts to practically a normal rate of increase."

Mr. Burleson goes so far as to use this normality of the increase in postal receipts to prove the return of prosperity and normal business conditions, the lack of such returning prosperity being a very sore subject with our Democratic officials.

The Third Assistant Postmaster General, Mr. Dockery, sustains Mr. Burleson in reference to postal receipts in a statement issued December 20, 1915, in which he states that—

A veritable slump occurred in August, the first month of the war, and sharp decline in receipts followed monthly until November, when they reached the point of lowest depression—

This was more than 16 months ago.

Then the tide turned. Poise was regained and business began to adjust itself to existing conditions, and have been climbing up ever since, in step with increasing prosperity and commercial activity throughout the country.

I also read Mr. Dockery's letter to me of March 15, in further confirmation of the statement that postal receipts are increasing and not decreasing:

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT,
THIRD ASSISTANT POSTMASTER GENERAL,
Washington, March 15, 1916.

Hon. C. B. SLEMP,
House of Representatives.

MY DEAR MR. SLEMP: In compliance with your request by telephone to-day I submit the following statement of postal receipts at the 50 largest post offices for the months of January and February, 1913, 1914, 1915, and 1916, respectively:

	1913	1914	1915	1916
January	$12,386,358.08	$12,629,225.55	$11,586,330.10	$12,832,655.81
February	11,242,080.96	11,607,402.66	11,074,330.13	12,805,615.20

Yours, very truly,

A. M. DOCKERY,
Third Assistant Postmaster General.

Thus do Mr. Dockery and Mr. Burleson refute the claims that there is a decline in postal revenues and therefore render unjustifiable a claim that the sugar duties are retained because of the falling off of postal receipts. It would be idle to comment on the lack of coordination of consistency or sincerity in Democratic leaders issuing statements that are so contradictory. So much for this feature.

Let us next examine the ordinary internal-revenue receipts. These receipts for five years, for the eight months preceding March 1, are as follows:

Eight months ending—
Feb. 29, 1912	$195,861,423
Feb. 28, 1913	207,650,113
Feb. 28, 1914	209,855,503
Feb. 28, 1915	216,268,964
Feb. 29, 1916	252,775,774

It will be seen from these figures, which are the latest figures available at the Treasury Department, that there has been a steady increase in ordinary internal-revenue receipts for the past five years. They show conclusively the Democratic contention that the proposed retention of duties on sugar as due to a decline in internal-revenue receipts to be utterly fallacious and without any foundation whatever. There might have occurred a decline in ordinary internal-revenue receipts after the passage of the Underwood tariff bill because of the demoralization it occasioned to the business interests of this country and the consequent limiting of the ability to purchase internal-revenue articles on the part of the American people, and doubtless there would have been a falling off of such receipts for a few months at the beginning of the European war. The Democratic Party was prompt to recognize this decline, however, and immediately imposed the present onerous stamp taxes on the American public to make up for such decline. These stamp taxes still remain and are included within the figures just given. It will be observed that the ordinary internal-revenue receipts for the eight months ending February 29, 1916, was $252,775,774. It is estimated that this includes about $60,000,000 duties collected as war taxes. If this should be eliminated, there would remain about $193,000,000 as purely ordinary internal-revenue receipts, which would compare favorably with such receipts under the Republican administrations. As a matter of fact, however, by including these war taxes the Democratic Party for eight months has had available at least $60,000,000 more from these sources than the Republican administration ever had. For an entire year this additional revenue amounts to about $90,000,000. There is no reason therefore for the Democrats to argue a restoration of the duties on sugar on the theory that there is a decline in the ordinary internal-revenue receipts. The logical Democratic argument should be to remove the remaining duties on sugar because of the excessive amount of revenue received from ordinary internal-revenue receipts, which excess is shown to be much greater than the total amount that will be secured through the duties on sugar, estimated to be about $50,000,000. So much for this feature.

Let us now examine the customs revenues with reference to their decline.

It is not only confusing but amazing for Democratic leaders to complain of the decline in customs duties, when their whole theory of tariff legislation involved a reduction in customs duties. This reduction has not only been defended but made a subject of boast and pride by Democratic leaders, who contended that diminished customs revenues was positive proof of the saving to the American people brought about by the Underwood tariff bill. Now, they would inaugurate new legislation and take the Republicans' position on sugar because customs duties were reduced. Mr. UNDERWOOD has stated time and again, not only at the time of the passage of the Underwood tariff bill but subsequently, that he expected such decline in customs revenue; that the Underwood tariff bill was based on that theory; and that loss in customs revenue thereby is to be made up by an increased corporation tax and the imposition of the income tax. If one should agree with the argument of Mr. UNDERWOOD on December 17, 1915, it would render absurd the Democratic contention of the members of the Ways and Means Committee in regard to decline in customs revenue, as a basis for sugar legislation. He claimed that the falling off in the customs revenue for the year 1914, as compared with 1912, was only $19,193,045, and as compared with 1913, the last year of the Payne law, only $26,762,868. He shows, however, in defending his bill from a revenue standpoint that the income-tax law added more than $45,000,000 new money to offset this loss in customs revenue. Thus by his new legislation he more than makes up for the loss in customs revenue and actually adds $19,000,000 new money to the Treasury.

From Mr. UNDERWOOD'S statement, therefore, it would be absurd for the Democratic Party to change their historical position on the sugar question on account of a decline in duties for which they have more than compensated.

The situation has not been stated fairly, because no part of the year 1915 was considered by Mr. UNDERWOOD, else he would have been forced to admit the complete failure of his bill as a customs-revenue producer. Let us, then, see what are the facts. The customs receipts for the eight months' period to the last day of February for each year for the last five years are as follows:

Eight months ending—
Feb. 29, 1912	$201,858,207
Feb. 28, 1913	222,887,540
Feb. 28, 1914	199,614,527
Feb. 28, 1915	138,684,521
Feb. 29, 1916	131,854,332

I take eight-month periods because the circulars issued by the Treasury Department contained this information from June 30 of each year to the date of the issue of the circulars, and I considered March 1 as a fair and recent date for comparison. The figures show conclusively that there has been a marked decline in customs revenues, and that this decline amounts to more than 33⅓ per cent of what had been collected under Republican law. We can all agree on this. Democrats, Republicans, Socialists, and everyone else can unite on this point. The figures are indisputable; customs revenues have fallen off, and the statement of the Ways and Means Committee to this extent, and to this extent only, is correct.

We come now to a discussion of the cause of this decline, and the remedy therefor. The Democratic leaders claim that this decline was brought about by disturbed conditions resulting from the European war. They claim that the European war brought about a decline in importations, and that this necessarily meant the decline in customs revenues. Their whole argument would fall to the ground if importations were normal, and yet customs revenues declined.

Republicans claim that there is a decline in customs revenues, but that this decline is due to the placing of articles on the free list, and in other reductions in the tariff schedule, brought about by the Underwood tariff bill. They claim that importations are practically normal and ever increasing.

Let us see which is right.

I now give figures showing the value of our imports for the past four calendar years, the duty collected, and the average duty rate, for about 92 per cent of our total imports.

Calendar year.	Value of imports.	Duty collected.	Average duty rate
			Per cent.
1912[1]	$1,818,000,000	$326,340,000	18
1913[2]	1,792,600,000	310,800,000	17
1914[3]	1,789,250,000	241,250,000	13
1915[4]	1,778,000,000	198,606,000	11

[1] Full year under Republican law.
[2] Last three months under Democratic law.
[3] Last five months under war conditions—temporary curtailment.
[4] Full war period.

An analysis of these figures shows that in 1915, a full year war period, imports fell off but slightly over 1½ per cent compared with 1912, a full Republican year; but customs revenues fell off over 39 per cent. They demonstrate the normality of importations and coincidentally the decline in customs revenues.

Imports declined 1.50 per cent; customs declined 39 per cent.

The inquiry naturally runs as to what duties would have been collected had the Payne bill been in force during the preceding years. It is impossible to determine this, because no one can say what effect on importations tariff reductions would make; but assuming they would have been the same—and under the circumstances involved in our business opportunities arising from the European war I believe this to be fair—some interesting figures result.

If we take certain articles on the dutiable list in the Payne bill which were placed on the free list in the Underwood bill and apply the Payne duties thereto we obtain for the six months ending December 31, 1915, the following amounts as representing the loss of revenues on each article transferred from the dutiable to the free list:

Loss in revenue 6 months ending Dec. 31, 1915.

Articles made free:
Wool	$15,000,000
Loss of revenue on sugar	6,600,000
Live animals	3,500,000
Corn	150,000
Quebracho extract	370,000
Bituminous coal	360,000
Flax and hemp	200,000
Burlaps	3,500,000
Cured fish	300,000
Fresh fish	500,000
Iron ore	100,000
Pig-iron scrap	250,000
Railroad bars	150,000
Leather	300,000
Fresh meat	750,000
Milk	250,000
Cod-liver oil	140,000
Boards	880,000
Laths and shingles	600,000
Wood pulp	700,000
Total	34,600,000

Here is an approximate loss from the placing of these articles on the free list for six months of $34,600,000. On the same basis for the entire year of 1915 there would have been a loss of twice this amount, or $69,200,000 as a total loss in revenue for the year 1915 by placing those articles on the free list. It is difficult, on account of classifications, to estimate the losses in duties on articles on which the duty was simply reduced and the article not placed on the free list. An estimate of $3,000,000 per month loss due to such reductions would be found to be fair, or $36,000,000 per annum. Or we have as a summary of revenue loss:

Loss in duties by the Underwood tariff bill, calendar year 1915, by transferring articles from the dutiable to the free list	$69,200,000
Loss in duties in other reduction of duties	36,000,000

Now, Mr. Chairman, the cost of Mr. Wilson's proposed program of preparedness is $98,000,000. So had our old tariff rates been in existence during the past year of 1915 we could have collected enough revenue therefrom to pay for this entire program of preparedness and still have a surplus in the Treasury.

If we take more recent figures, the results show that we are going from bad to worse, so far as the Democratic tariff law is concerned. The average rate of duty on all imports coming into this country in December was only 9½ per cent and for January only 8 per cent, as against an average of about 17 per cent under the last full calendar year of the Republican tariff law. The importations for December, 1915, for example, were $171,832,505, an amount of imported goods seldom exceeded in our history, and yet we collected from this huge body of foreign goods less than $17,000,000, whereas under a Republican tariff law we collected in December, 1912, on an average rate of 15.7 per cent, more than $24,000,000 from importations amounting to $154,095,444, or $17,000,000 less. The same story is told by the duties collected from January, 1916, importations, that amounted to $184,192,000, the largest amount of goods ever brought into this country in any January, and yet we collected only $15,544,000 of customs duties, at an average rate of duty of 8 per cent, whereas in January, 1913, with only $163,000,000 of importations, we collected under a Republican law, at an average rate of about 18 per cent, over $29,000,000 for our Treasury. I would not accept these monthly statements as defining any general condition except for the fact that the conclusions therefrom are borne out entirely during the existence of the Underwood tariff law. They again show that the decline in customs revenues is due to the removal of tariff duties instead of to the restriction of importations.

If we apply Payne rates to the importations for January, 1916, we will have more interesting results.

These importations cover about $184,000,000. Applying the average rate under the Payne bill during the last Republican year of 17 per cent to these importations we would get $31,240,000, or an increase of about $15,700,000 over the amount received under the Underwood bill, or, summarizing:

Duties estimated had Payne rates been in effect month of January, 1916	$31,240,000
Duties actually collected January, 1916	15,500,000
Loss for month of January, 1916	15,740,000

To check this estimate I give the loss in revenue for most of the articles transferred from the dutiable to the free list in the Underwood bill for the month of January, 1916:

Approximate loss in revenue, month of January, 1916.

Articles placed on free list:
Wool	$8,900,000
Sugar	1,250,000
Fresh meats	220,000
Cured fish	120,000
Dressed fish	100,000
Cattle	80,000
Quebracho	185,000
Bituminous coal	70,000
Leather	80,000
Boards	80,000
Iron ore	15,000
Laths and shingles	50,000
Wood pulp	30,000
Flax	7,000
Hemp	12,000
Total	11,199,000

This represents the loss on the transfer to the free list and the loss on sugar alone for one single month of January, 1916. The remainder, I have no doubt, would be had from a restoration of other duties of the Payne bill, other than the free list. Assuming $3,000,000 gains from such revenues, we would have as a loss $14,000,000 for this month, which is somewhat less than the estimate above.

One only needs to multiply this $14,000,000 by 12 to get the annual loss in revenue due to the change in the tariff law, based upon the January importations and duties therefrom. It will for the year 1916 amount to a loss of $168,000,000 per annum, which we are now giving to the foreigner at the expense of our home producer and at the expense of our home wage earner. If these duties were restored, according to these figures, they would be sufficient to meet the entire additional expenditures required by the preparedness program, including all the provisions that the President advocates in regard to all increase in Army, Navy, and fortifications, and still leave a surplus of over $70,000,000, which would justify removing the onerous and unjust war tax now imposed upon the people, or to summarize:

Estimated loss revenue, 1916, due to disregarding Payne rates		$168,000,000
Cost President's preparedness:
Additional program	$98,000,000
Stamp and other war taxes	90,000,000
		188,000,000

Let this restoration of sugar duties be the forerunner of other changes in tariff duties in accordance with the long-established principles of the Republican Party. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, in the message delivered by the President at the opening of the present Congress he stated that "National defense is the particular matter that lies at the very front of my whole thought as I address you to-day." He advocated a larger Army and Navy. To provide the necessary revenues he recommended the retention of the present emergency tax and the duty on sugar, as well as certain new taxes. His recommendations concerning the emergency tax and the duty on sugar agree with the previous recommendations of the Secretary of the Treasury upon the same subjects.

The President, however, goes further than simply to advise increasing the Army and Navy. In speaking upon the "single theme, the preparation of the Nation to care for its own security," he says:

> While we speak of the preparation of the Nation to make sure of her security and her effective power we must not fall into the patent error of supposing that her real strength comes from armaments and mere safeguards of written law. It comes, of course, from her people, their energy, their success in their undertakings, their free opportunity to use the natural resources of our great homeland and of the lands outside our continental borders which look to us for protection, for encouragement, and for assistance in their development; from the organization and freedom and vitality of our economic life. The domestic questions which engaged the attention of the last Congress are more vital to the Nation in this its time of test than at any other time. We can not adequately make ready for any trial of our strength unless we wisely and promptly direct the force of our laws into these all-important fields of domestic action. A matter which, it seems to me, we should have very much at heart is the creation of the right instrumentalities by which to mobilize our economic resources in any time of national necessity.

He further recommends an appropriation that would enable him to organize, from leading civilians, a board "who can sugget the best way in which to bring about prompt cooperation among the manufacturers of the country, should it be necessary, and those who would assist to bring the technical skill of the country to the aid of the Government in the solution of particular problems of defense." With the utmost emphasis he declares:

> What is most important is that the industries and resources of the country should be available and ready for mobilization.

Finally, in the last paragraph, the President sums up his entire message in these words:

> For what we are seeking now, what in my mind is the single thought of this message, is national efficiency and security.

It is very evident from the report of the Secretary of the Treasury and the message of the President that the administration favors the retention of the present duty on sugar as a practical means of securing necessary governmental revenues to carry out the present program of national defense. Such a reason for a duty on sugar is more or less transient. When the extraordinary expenses incident to the sudden increase of the Army and Navy have been met and the equilibrium of national expenditures is again restored the advisability of a duty on sugar might not be apparent and the pendulum would once more swing toward free sugar.

In former years I occasionally attended a circus to witness the high and lofty tumbling of the acrobats. This form of entertainment has a peculiar fascination for me. During the past three years I have had no occasion to attend the circus. The acrobatic feats of the present administration have afforded all the diversion that any sane citizen could desire.

Originally, the administration declared for Panama tolls. Afterwards it begged Congress to repeal the toll bill "for secret reasons," which it was not willing to give even to the leaders of the Democratic Party in Congress. It declared for noninterference in Mexico; then sent a military and naval expedition to Vera Cruz; then withdrew all armed forces from Vera Cruz. It stated that the Mexicans could settle their own internal difficulties; then determined that Huerta should not be president; then assisted Villa against Huerta; then turned its support to Carranza in opposition to Villa. Now, the American guns placed in Villa's hands have been turned against our people. A year ago the administration pooh-poohed the idea of preparedness. Now the President says, "Preparedness stands in the very front of my whole thought." Two years ago the only increase which the administration favored for the American Navy was the dreadnaught Friendship and the enemy destroyer Fellowship. Now the President wants within the next year the construction of 2 battleships, 2 battle cruisers, 3 scout cruisers, 15 destroyers, 5 field submarines, 25 coast submarines, 2 gunboats, and 1 hospital ship. Still further increase is to be made throughout subsequent years. Twice the administration has favored a tax on automobiles and twice this plan of taxation has been withdrawn. It raised its hands in holy horror against making war loans by American financiers; then it permitted the greatest war loan in history to be floated in the United States. With righteous indignation it declared for progressive democracy, then formed alliances with machine Democrats in every State. In the alleged interest of a free market basket it passed a law removing the duty on sugar. Under the guise of a revenue tariff it now asks for a duty on sugar.

It declared for the protection of American trade on the high seas, but passed a law that drove many of our ships from the ocean. With strident voice it proclaimed that there should be no combinations in restraint of trade; then enacted a law which specifically exempted farmers and laborers from such combinations. To-day the administration is using the single-term plank of the Democatic national platform of 1912 as a springboard from which it may turn a back somersault into the White House for another four years.

While the administration is now temporarily standing on the sound Republican doctrine of national defense and urging that legislation should be shaped so that the industries and resources of the country "shall be ready and available for mobilization" to the end that we may have "national efficiency and security," I desire to take advantage of the opportunity and discuss—

THE DUTY ON SUGAR AS A MEANS OF NATIONAL DEFENSE.

Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, I am glad to take part in this discussion to-day. I must concede that I believe men who differ with me politically are honest in their convictions; but the man who is honest in his conviction that this great sugar industry can survive in this country without protection must be in a very unsettled frame of mind if he is familiar with the industry, with the cost of production and the cost of the establishment of the industry, in this country, and the cost of establishment and cost of the production of sugar abroad.

I have on the frame behind me a picture of a magnificent beet-sugar factory. I thought by looking at that picture you could determine better the importance of this great industry. We have in the United States to-day 77 of those sugar factories. Twelve of them are not in operation. Last year 17 were out of commission.

These 77 factories have cost $100,000,000. Gentlemen, an industry with an investment in the machinery and plant of $100,000,000 is an important industry. This is all American-owned capital. Since the enactment of our present tariff law, of which my beloved friend, Mr. UNDERWOOD, is the author—and I love him as I do a brother—there has not been the establishment of a single sugar factory in the United States. Since the enactment of that law on the 22d day of October, 1913, there have been some 20 sugar factories built on the island of Cuba, 11 of which were built during the calendar year 1915.

Mr. MAYS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FORDNEY. I will; yes.

Mr. MAYS. Is the gentleman not informed that six factories are in process of construction in Utah and Idaho at the present time?

Mr. FORDNEY. No; I am not, but I am informed that there are four now under contract for construction in the whole United States, contracted for since the Secretary of the Treasury announced that you were going to repeal the free-sugar clause in the Underwood Tariff Act. [Applause on the Republican side.] They will be built, provided they can secure beet seed for the coming year.

Gentlemen, the sugar industry is one of great importance to the South. Cane sugar was first introduced in Louisiana by the Jesuit fathers in 1751. Down to 1795 molasses only was made from cane. Then the production of sugar began.

In 1789, when the first tariff law of this country was enacted, it gave a stimulus to that industry, and I want to read to you the enacting clause of that law, approved July 4, 1789:

> Whereas it is necessary for the support of Government, for the discharge of debts of the United States, and the encouragement and protection of manufactures that duties be laid on goods, wares, and merchandise imported into the United States.

Yet some of our friends will say that we never had a protective tariff on sugar until after the Civil War. In that very act of 1789 the duty placed upon brown sugar was 1½ cents per pound and 3 cents a pound on loaf sugar.

The growth of the cane industry of the South began in about 1820, and because there are several gentlemen who want to speak on this subject I will not go into that in detail, but I will call your attention to the production of sugar in the South from 1852 down to date.

From and including the year 1852 down to 1860 there was an average each year of sugar produced in Louisiana of 156,000 tons.

From 1861 to 1870 the average was 63,000 tons. During a portion of that period the industry in the South was practically destroyed by the Civil War.

From 1871 to 1880, inclusive, the production was 79,000 tons annually.

Now, listen, gentlemen. From 1881 to 1890 the average production was 133,000 tons.

Under the stimulus of the McKinley tariff law, which provided for a bounty on the production of sugar in the United States, from 1891 to 1895—which period took in a portion of the time the Wilson tariff law was upon our statute books, when the duty was 40 per cent ad valorem, or about 80 cents per 100 pounds—the industry produced 263,000 tons per year.

From 1896 to 1900, inclusive, the annual production was 273,000 tons, and from 1901 to 1905, 330,000 tons under the influence and encouragement of the Dingley tariff law. [Applause on the Republican side.]

From 1906 to 1912, inclusive, the production was 352,000 tons annually under a Republican tariff law. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Under the reduction in the rates of duty of our present existing tariff law the average production dropped to 188,000 tons, or a loss of 46½ per cent in the States of Louisiana and Texas. Now comes the most disastrous part of all. Day before yesterday I received by telegraph a statement that the output of Louisiana and Texas sugar for the years 1915 and 1916 is but 121,000 tons, a loss of about 70 per cent in that industry under the influence of existing law.

The first successful effort in the United States in the production of beet sugar was made by one E. H. Dyer, who established a factory at Alvarado, Cal., in 1879. It seemed as though that industry would fail up to 1883, with a total of six factories in the United States that year; but a few years later the industry began to bloom as the roses of June. My friends, one gentleman said yesterday in answer to my friend and colleague from Michigan [Mr. LOUD] that it was not meritorious to impose this tax upon all the people for three sugar factories in the gentleman's district. I do not give the exact words, but that was the gist of his argument. The gentleman forgets that there are 77 of these magnificent factories in the United States, scattered over 17 States of this Union. Stop and think of it for a minute, you who oppose this magnificent industry.

Another gentleman [Mr. KEATING, from Colorado] said that we never had as low a price for sugar in this country as we had from the adoption of the Underwood tariff law down to the beginning of the war in Europe. Let me give him a little light on the subject. From the time the beet-sugar industry of this country produced 40,000 tons annually to the time it has increased to its present greatness, or to 700,000 tons—a little less than at present—the average wholesale price of granulated sugar was lowered in the markets of the United States from $4.97 per hundred pounds to $4.11 per hundred pounds. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Do you believe the sugar refiners were responsible for that reduction? If you are of that opinion just get the sugar statistical and trade journals and study the prices and quotations. When the domestic crop is on the market, from October until the following March or April, and sometimes May—at which time our domestic is exhausted—you will find that ever since the beet-sugar industry in this country became well established the price of sugar, when the domestic crop was on the market, has been lowered to the consumer. And immediately upon the going off the market of the domestic product the price has gone up for the balance of the year.

The gentleman from Colorado [Mr. KEATING], who represents a great sugar-producing State, said yesterday that the owners of the seaboard refineries, the trusts, as he called them, were all in favor of a protective tariff on sugar. I called his attention to the fact that he was in error, but he stated that it was I that was wrong, and told me to consult the records of my own committee. I did, and here is what I find.

There came before the committee Claus A. Spreckels, president of the Federal Sugar Refining Co., who is the paymaster of Frank C. Lowry, whom I will mention before I conclude. Here is what he said when before the Hardwick sugar investigating committee, of which I was a member.

Mr. HINDS, of Maine: "In other words, perhaps you would take the tariff all off and have free trade?" Mr. Spreckels said: "I would have free trade absolutely." [Applause on the Republican side.]

Charles E. Heike, secretary of the American Sugar Refining Co., appeared before that same investigating committee, and I asked him the following question:

Now, Mr. Heike, if the duty were removed absolutely on sugar, could we produce cane or beet sugar in this country?
Mr. HEIKE. I doubt it very much.
Mr. FORDNEY. Free trade would destroy the industry absolutely in this country, would it not?
Mr. HEIKE. Yes.
Mr. FORDNEY. And you would approve of that?
Mr. HEIKE. Yes.

That was the secretary of the American Sugar Refining Co. that the gentleman from Colorado said wanted protection.

William C. Gilmore, a partner of Arbuckle Bros., testified. He was asked by Judge Madison, poor fellow, since deceased:

In other words, you think the thing to do is to take off the duty, and that it would be to your advantage to take it off as a refiner of cane sugar?
Mr. GILMORE. Yes; I am in favor of free trade in sugar.

Mr. Post, president of the National Sugar Refining Co.—at that time under the control of the Havemeyers, but the court since held that $10,000,000 of common stock of that company was watered and invalid, and that threw the company, so I have been informed, into the hands of the National Sugar Refining Co.—said:

If Congress did not need the revenue from sugar; that is a different proposition, but they have to have it from something, and sugar seems to be the thing that has paid a part of it for a great many years. As far as I am personally concerned I would like to see free sugar.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Will the gentleman yield?
Mr. FORDNEY. Yes.
Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Did they give any reason why they wanted free sugar?
Mr. FORDNEY. Yes. They said it would destroy the domestic industry and permit them to control the price. They frankly admitted that.

Now, Mr. William A. Jamison, a partner of Arbuckle Bros., when asked the question, when beet sugar came on the market, what was the cause of the reduction in price, if it was on account of their not having sugar enough to run his factory full blast, said, "Oh, no; on account of the beet product. If there was no duty, I do not think the beet would be so prosperous, and we would probably sell more sugar."

Later on, when asked the question if he favored free sugar, he said yes. Going on a little further, I wish to refer to Mr. Lowry, who has been so conspicuous around here of late years. I never knew him to speak the truth except when he was under oath before the lobby investigating committee, and admitted that he wrote the sugar article—the Farmers' Sugar Bowl—in the Democratic campaign textbook of 1912. [Laughter on the Republican side.]

Mr. Lowry, who had been questioned as to the reduction of the price of sugar in the country, said:

The demand came on us so fast we could not take care of it, and we went to 7 cents. Arbuckle & Co. were delivering promptly, and they went to 7 cents. We were about 10 days oversold at the time, and Arbuckle was the only refiner prepared to give immediate delivery, and he jumped his price to 7.5 cents. We had, as I remember it, somewhere in the neighborhood of enough raw sugar on hand to make 60,000 or 75,000 barrels of sugar, and the trade was coming to us so fast that it soon cleaned us up. We did not want to be cleaned out. We wanted to keep in the market and supply our customers right along, and we put the price at 7.25, and at 7.25 the market stopped, and from that time on, whether we talk about beet sugars or cane sugars, the market became absolutely a jobbers' market. The beet-sugar price was 6.5 cents.
Mr. FORDNEY. What are you selling for now?
Mr. LOWRY. We have been cutting the market this last week and got down to 5.65.
Mr. FORDNEY. 5.65 now, why?
Mr. LOWRY. The same price made by the Michigan Beet Sugar Co.

Those are the gentlemen who represent the seaboard refineries that the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. KEATING] said were in favor of a duty on sugar.

Mr. SLOAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?
Mr. FORDNEY. Yes.
Mr. SLOAN. Is that Frank C. Lowry whom the gentleman mentioned the same Frank C. Lowry who for years represented himself to be the secretary and treasurer of the Wholesale Grocers' Association or committee of the United States, and who afterwards, before the committee, admitted that he was all there was of that association, that it had no membership except himself, that the membership paid no dues, but that he had expended $25,000 in his propaganda for free sugar, contributed almost entirely by Claus A. Spreckels?

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Chairman, before I answer the gentleman let me say that I have several more witnesses who all testified along the same line. Every man who came before the committee, who was a refiner, or in any way connected with refineries, wanted free sugar. Now, in answer to the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. SLOAN], I will say that he is the same man. There is only one Frank C. Lowry on earth. [Laughter.] Mr. Lowry came before the committee and represented himself as secretary and treasurer of the Wholesale Groceries' Association of this country, and had been sending broadcast all over this land literature advocating free trade on sugar. He placed that literature in every package of sugar that went out from his factory in New York, and when questioned under oath he tried to dodge the question, but finally admitted that there was no such thing as the Wholesale Grocers' Association of America, that he was all there was to it, except his paymaster, Mr. Spreckels, who had put up more than $25,000 for the publications and the printing of this literature to which he referred. [Applause on the Republican side.]

He admitted that there were no dues, there never had been; there never had been a meeting; there were no monthly, annual, semiannual, or any other kind of dues; there was no such thing as such an association except himself, and he was a mighty slippery object, in my eye. Let me tell you a little more about Frank C. Lowry. He is the sales agent of the Federal Sugar Refining Co. Through a commission firm in New York City he and that commission firm purchase, as he testified before the lobby investigating committee, all the raw sugar for the Federal Sugar Refining Co., and sell all the refined sugar the company makes. Mr. Lowry has been very industrious in appearing before the Committee on Ways and Means every time anything came up which enabled him to get in a word in favor of free sugar. He has lost hope altogether now of getting free sugar since the introduction of this bill. The week before last he was over here and personally called upon some of the Democratic members of the Committee on Ways and Means, but upon no Republican, and he now advocates a consumption tax—an internal-revenue tax—on sugar, but free trade on imported sugar. If you will remember, some time ago, under Mr. Taft's administration, certain men of the American Sugar Refining Co. and of the Arbuckle Bros. Co. and of the Federal Sugar Refining Co. were indicted by the Federal Government for underweighing of imported raw sugars. The American Sugar Refining Co. settled their case with the Government and paid, in round numbers, $3,000,000 in fines. The Arbuckle Bros. Co. settled their case with the Federal Government and paid, in round numbers, a fine of $700,000.

I have here a clipping from a paper of last Wednesday, and I called up the Attorney General—one of the finest gentlemen on earth—and asked him as to the accuracy of the statement in this clipping in the newspaper, and he assured me that it was correct. I then asked him if it would be proper for me to use it publicly and he said, "Mr. FORDNEY, I never have thought there was any good reason why any man should not speak the truth at all times. [Applause.] What you say is true and, therefore, you are at liberty to use it." Last week the Federal Sugar Refining Co., Mr. Lowry's company, paid the Government $67,173 for fraudulently underweighing imported raw sugars. He also testified before the lobby investigating committee that he had been requested by certain gentlemen—prominent Democrats, fine gentlemen, good friends of mine—to write the "Farmers' sugar bowl" in the Democratic campaign textbook of 1912, that he did write it, and that it is published in the textbook practically word for word as he wrote it. Let me say to my friends upon the other side of the House, you have been misled by a man in whom I have but very little confidence. The gentleman from Colorado [Mr. KEATING] yesterday spoke of the great profits, the enormous profits, of the beet-sugar factories of this country. There is no question, it is not denied by anyone, that at the present time, because of the unsettled conditions caused by the war in Europe, the price of sugar in this country and the whole world, except in Germany and Austria-Hungary, has gone skyward. I received a telegram this morning, which I will read to you, quoting the price to-day for raw sugars in this country and in Cuba, where it has gradually advanced, while it has not advanced in Germany. Here is the telegram which I received at my request:

Federal Reporter, March 14, quotes raw sugar in Germany for crop grown from 1916 plantings as established at $3.31 per hundred. Same paper quotes April and May Cuban raws delivered in bond New York $4.62 to $4.75 per hundred. This shows advantage of national economic preparedness.

Mr. Chairman, that shows a good cause why we should have protection to a great food supply in this country that we might be prepared to supply ourselves in case we were at war with any great foreign power.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a moment?

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes.

Mr. MADDEN. Of course the price of sugar has gone up, because exports of sugar from September 1, 1912, to August 31, 1913, were only $1,714,000 in round numbers, while from September, 1913, to September, 1914, they were $4,300,000, and from September, 1914, to August 31, 1915, $36,816,000, all on account of the war abroad.

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes; I will come to that in a moment. I want to say to the gentleman from Colorado that he is greatly mistaken in saying that this great industry is the cause of an advance in the price of sugar. I will show him that twice since the war has occurred in Europe the domestic crop has brought down the price of sugar offered by the seaboard refiners.

But, as I have before stated, at all times when there is no beet sugar on the market our seaboard refineries have raised their prices. The gentleman from Colorado [Mr. KEATING] said yesterday that there never had been a time in the history of this country when the price of sugar had been as low as it was between the date of the enactment of the Underwood tariff act down to the declaration of war in Europe, August 1, 1914. Now, the gentleman is partly correct. If you will remember, however, in the Underwood tariff law the item affecting sugar did not take effect until March 1, 1914, and between the enactment of the law and the date that the sugar schedule took effect sugar was lower than ever before. [Applause on the Republican side.] But immediately after the 1st day of March the margin between raw and refined sugar advanced until in October, before the domestic crop came on the market, the margin was as high as $1.25 per 100 pounds. The time when sugar was cheapest was between the enactment of the law and the date the schedule took effect, March 1, 1914. I have here this map, that anybody can see who wishes to do so. This map shows the fluctuations in the price of raw and refined sugar and the margin between raw and refined. Now, the gentleman spoke of the great profit to these beet-sugar industries. Let me tell him something. The Federal Sugar Refining Co. has a capacity of 8,000 barrels of refined sugar per day. Mr. Lowry testified that their capital is $10,000,000—$3,300,000 cash paid in, $6,700,000 watered stock. It has a refining capacity of 8,000 barrels a day, or about 400,000 tons per year.

Gentlemen, the greatest crop ever produced from beets in this country is this last season now closed, 1915–16, of about 760,000 tons. These factories cost $100,000,000. Mr. Lowry's company, with their $3,300,000 investment, produces about 70 per cent as much as our total beet-sugar production, but here is the important point. Labor in the refineries in refining imported raw sugar receives about one-third of a cent per pound for converting the raw sugar into refined sugar, while the labor in the beet industry receives in round numbers 3½ cents a pound, or more than 10 times the amount paid the labor in the refineries. [Applause on the Republican side.] And yet my friend from Colorado, where the largest amount of domestic sugar made from beets of any State in the Union is produced, would crush out that industry in his own home State and aid the refiners, such as Mr. Lowry, who, when they can not get a duty by law, evidently propose to get it any way [applause on the Republican side] and then settle to the best advantage possible with the Federal Government for fraud.

Mr. FESS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FORDNEY. I do.

Mr. FESS. Suppose we had no home production at all, what would be the price we would pay?

Mr. FORDNEY. Let me tell you, my friend. Germany, prior to the war in Europe, produced about 2,500,000 tons of sugar annually. She exported about one and a half to one and three-quarters million tons of that sugar annually. That sugar chiefly went to England. England does not produce any sugar at all. She had refineries prior to the war to refine 45 per cent of her total consumption. She looked to the rest of the world for the balance of her refined sugar.

The price of sugar to-day in Germany, including the consumption tax of 1.51 per 100 pounds, is but 4.93 cents per 100 pounds. Sugar has not advanced in price in Germany since the declaration of war, while on the other hand, my friend, England, the very second day after the declaration of war, came to Cuba to buy her raw sugar and laid in a six months' supply, and in 10 days, from August 3, 1914, to August 13, 1914, the price of raw sugar from Cuba, where we get the majority of our supply, jumped up from $3.22 to $6.52 per 100 pounds, and the people of England the first 17 months of the war paid $127,000,000 wholesale in the increase for her sugar. England, because of the increase in price, has paid $127,000,000 more in 17 months than paid by the German people for the same amount of sugar, as I a little later will show fully. That means the wholesale price laid down in England, not the retail price. The retail price in England to-day is 9 cents a pound.

England, coming to Cuba for her raw sugar, from whence we import one-half our total consumption, imposed a great burden upon the people of the United States, and the increase in the wholesale price of sugar to the people of this country during that 17 months amounts to $180,000,000. We produce in this country but 20 per cent of our total consumption. We get 25 per cent of our consumption from our insular possessions and about 50 per cent from Cuba, and 5 per cent from all other countries in the world. Where would we be to-day for sugar, gentlemen, if we were at war with a great nation and our ships, as few as they may be, were driven from the high seas, and we were obliged to depend upon our own industries for our supply? We would be in a most chaotic condition. Our people would suffer for want of one of the principal food supplies—sugar.

Mr. FESS. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes, sir; I yield.

Mr. FESS. We produce 20 per cent. What would be our capacity under favorable legislation? Can we produce more than that?

Mr. FORDNEY. We are producing this year from the factories that are running about all our factories can produce.

Mr. FESS. What I meant was, do we have the land capable of producing more?

Mr. FORDNEY. Oh, yes. Because of the increased price of sugar this year each factory in the country sought for and obtained a very high acreage, and consequently the 65 factories in commission, of a total of 77 factories, this year will produce more sugar than the 71 factories did when in commission in 1913, because of the great rush and demand for sugar. But it must be borne in mind that that can not always last. Our beet-sugar and our cane-sugar industry to-day could thrive with no duty at all because of the advanced price brought about by the war in Europe. But what will come to the industry the minute war is ended? You know and I know. The seaboard refineries would crush the domestic industry out of existence immediately. The seaboard refiners have a capacity to-day, without adding anything more to their machinery, for refining sugar for 125,000,000 to 150,000,000 people. But the gentleman asks if we have soil adapted to the raising of beets in this country for sugar to supply all our consumption. I will call his attention to a report made by Secretary of Agriculture Wilson during his term in office. He sent men out and made tests of the soil to see whether or not we had sufficient area in the United States adapted to the growing of beets to supply us with all the sugar that might be consumed in the country. This is what he found: Tests were made covering some 274,000,000 acres of land.

Germany last year produced two and one-half million tons of sugar from 1,007,000 acres, equal to just about one-half the territory of the congressional district that I have the honor to represent in this House. Mr. Wilson's report was that if one crop were produced from the 274,000,000 acres of soil tested, such a crop as has been produced in Michigan, it would produce more sugar than has been consumed by all the people of all the world since the birth of our Savior. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. FESS. Will the gentleman yield again?

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes.

Mr. FESS. Does beet-sugar cultivation ruin the soil?

Mr. FORDNEY. The soil in beet-sugar cultivation, when the crops are rotated, yields greater crops after beets than from any other thing that can be planted in the soil. As an illustration, a Mr. Doyle, of Saginaw County, Mich., who appeared before the Hardwick investigating committee, called our attention to the fact that he had planted in one field on his farm of 160 acres 65 acres of beets. The next year he sowed the 160 acres to oats. As the crops came on, he saw there was a marked difference in the crops on the land that had been planted with beets the year previous and the land on which other crops were raised. He cut the oats and kept the crops separately and when he thrashed his oats gathered from the 95 acres that had been planted to some other crops, he found that they averaged 52 bushels to the acre, and off of the land planted to beets the year before he thrashed 72 bushels of oats to the acre.

History shows that in Germany, my friends, to follow a crop of beets with a potato crop, for instance, the yield is 102 per cent greater than following any other crops produced on the land. And with all kinds of grain it is from one-quarter to one-third more. It is the best fertilizer that can be used on the farm for any crop following a crop of beets.

Now, let me call your attention to another thing. I do not see the gentleman present, but only a few days ago a letter was handed to me by a Member of this House from New York State written by a sugar broker in his district who handled sugar of the seaboard refiners. This broker complained bitterly of the competition of the far-western beet sugar, which he claimed was sold at ruinously low prices east of the Mississippi. The whole underlying thought in his letter and his sole reason for complaint was that domestic beet sugar was being sold at lower prices than necessary—that he was being undersold and the market demoralized. To me, it is a pretty good indication when a domestic industry can demoralize prices which importers are endeavoring to maintain.

The gentleman asked me to reply to that broker, and I did. Do not forget that ever since the beet-sugar industry has been established in this country there never has been a time but that all beet sugar has sold from 10 to 60 cents per 100 pounds below the prices of refined cane sugar. This last fall the margin was 50 cents per 100 pounds. But let me show you something of the profits. Here is Mr. Lowry, representing a great concern. By the way, the president of the firm he represents is now a member of a great corporation just organized in New York under the laws of the State of New Jersey, with a capital of $50,000,000, to purchase sugar plantations in Cuba, and in one day $10,000,000 of that capital was paid in and the common stock, which represented no investment, first sold at $35 a share, and before the day closed it ran up to $46 a share, while the preferred stock ran up from seventy-odd dollars a share to $87 the very first day it was offered on the market.

Now, follow these figures, please. Early last week the margin between raw and refined left a profit to the seaboard refineries of 73 cents per 100 pounds. Seventy-three cents per 100 pounds is $2.55 for a barrel of 350 pounds of sugar. On Saturday that profit had gone down to 38 cents per 100 pounds. Thirty-eight cents per 100 pounds on a barrel of sugar of 350 pounds yields a profit of $1.33 per barrel, and on 8,000 barrels a day output a profit of $1.33 per barrel would be $10,640, or $3,200,000 in 300 days on a capital of three and one-third million dollars. [Applause on the Republican side.] And at the higher margin, $6,400,000 per year.

At the same time the gentleman from Louisiana will bear me out in the assertion that the American Sugar Refining Co. has a factory in New Orleans, where they refine 12,000 barrels a day. They, too, are complaining about a duty on sugar, wanting free trade, and their profits, my friends, on the higher margin of seventy-odd cents per 100 pounds in 300 days would be $9,500,000 on a capital of $5,000,000. Let some man deny that.

I have stated to you, gentlemen, that the margin runs up at times to more than $1.25 per 100 pounds, or nearly $4 a barrel. Yet, in the face of all this our Democratic friends, honest in their convictions, can not see that when they vote for free trade they vote to destroy the great domestic industry, and to throw the entire production of our sugar into the hands of the seaboard refiners. If we were to have a war with some great nation a few well-directed shots at a seaboard refinery would put it out of commission. If we had 300 beet-sugar factories, distributed all over the land, in all the States of this Union, all the powers of Europe could not destroy them against Uncle Sam and his Government. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Oh, my friends, I tell you if we are going to enter into the theory of preparedness, for Heaven's sake let us prepare to furnish our people with one of the greatest food supplies of the country. [Applause on the Republican side.]

I have shown you that during the 14 years that domestic sugar increased in production from 40,000 to 700,000 tons the price of granulated sugar has gone down to the consumers of this country 85 cents a hundred pounds. Gentlemen, what does it mean? Figure it up, if you will. It means some $68,000,000 a year to our consumers, or, in the 14 years, the magnificent sum of $970,000,000 which this domestic sugar saves the consumers of this country. [Applause on the Republican side.]

In the face of all the opposition that has been presented here since I have had the honor to be a Member of this House there scarcely has been a Congress in the nine in which I have participated when an attack has not been made upon this great industry. I remember the American Sugar Refining Co.'s vice president, Mr. Atkins, who came here in 1900 and wanted free trade with Cuba at the time Cuban reciprocity was being considered, and appealed to the people then. We knew but little about the conditions down there or the ownership of those great sugar industries there. He appealed to the Committee on Ways and Means, and said, "If you do not give some relief to those people in Cuba you will see the greatest panic in Cuba ever experienced among any people in the world." The old fox at the same time had a sugar plantation of 30,000 acres in Cuba. [Laughter on the Republican side.] He produced 30,000 tons of sugar, which he was importing and bringing to New York.

When the Ways and Means Committee was having hearings on the Underwood tariff law, Mr. Adkins appeared and testified that he had increased his farm, which he said was a farm of "moderate size." And I remembered what he had said in 1900, and I asked him, "Mr. Adkins, how many acres have you in that little farm of yours?" He replied, "Oh, 45,000 acres; that is all." [Laughter on the Republican side.] I asked him, "How much sugar do you produce now?" and he answered, "Somewhere between 35,000 and 40,000 tons a year." That is the little farm that the vice president of the American Sugar Refining Co. owns in Cuba.

And now come Mr. Spreckels and Mr. Seligman and Mr. Morgan and Mr. Ryan and Mr. Horace Havemeyer—I have the names—who are the directors of this new $50,000,000 concern, organized in January, and they are going to purchase the most valuable sugar plantations in Cuba. Mr. Horace Havemeyer told me, at the time the Hardwick sugar-investigating committee was conducting its hearings, that on his plantation in Cuba he produced sugar at a cost as low as 1 cent a pound. He said he was producing sugar at a lower cost than was the fair average in the island, but the fair average did not exceed 1½ cents a pound.

Mr. MEEKER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Michigan yield to the gentleman from Missouri?

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes.

Mr. MEEKER. Before you close this discussion I wish you would kindly give to the House a catalogue of the domestic industries that were benefited by the passage of the Underwood tariff bill. [Laughter on the Republican side.]

Mr. FORDNEY. Well, perhaps my understanding and that of the Democratic Party as to what is of benefit will differ.

Gentlemen, the passage of the pending bill is a matter of great importance. I have endeavored not to offend any Democrat. I do not intend to. I am in a peculiar position here. I want votes for this bill from that side of the House. I am like the Irishman who was very sick, and who was being prepared for death by the good father who was at his bedside. He said, "Now, Pat, you are going to die. You renounce the devil and all his works?"

"Now, look here, father," said Pat, "I've been a rather bad man in my lifetime. I ain't just certain which way I am going, and I think it a mighty bad time to be making enemies." [Laughter.]

My Democratic friends, this is your bill. We are helping you. We will give you every Republican vote on this side of the House. [Applause.] Last year you collected $51,252,827 duty on imported sugar. You need it. I want to help you get it next year. Some gentlemen say we exported sugar. Yes; we imported 2,250,000 tons of sugar from Cuba last year, the greatest amount ever imported in any single year, and we exported 538,000,000 pounds, or more than 250,000 tons, of refined sugar to England. On most of that sugar exported, that which had been imported and had paid a duty, there was a drawback, and I presume that our friend Lowry swore that all that was exported had paid a duty, no matter where it came from—free or dutiable.

My friends, one gentleman stated the other day that a very great profit was being made out of the by-products of the beet-sugar factories of this country. I have here a statement just issued, released by the Department of Commerce, Bureau of the Census, for immediate use, which shows the total receipts for by-products in 1914 from all the beet-sugar factories in the country to have been $2,478,000, or sixteen one-hundredths of 1 cent per pound on the amount of sugar produced. Gentlemen must not forget, also, that it costs money to produce a by-product. There is about $100,000 invested in a drying plant. The pulp must be dried. It must be bagged or barreled. Some put the residue sirup on the pulp and through a drying process, and it makes an extraordinary good food for cattle and sheep. I venture to say that perhaps five one-hundredths of a cent per pound would be a fair profit to be credited to the production of beet sugar from the by-products.

The managers of the beet-sugar factories of the whole country testified in 1911 that it costs $3.54 per hundred pounds to produce granulated sugar from beets, while in Louisiana the cost was shown to be $3.73 per hundred pounds to produce brown sugar. The factories of Louisiana and the South generally do not make granulated sugar. Beet-sugar factories do. The American Sugar Refining Co. refines practically all the brown sugar produced in the South. But if we will give adequate protection to the industry in the Southern States they will establish their own refineries on the plantation, and they will no longer be at the mercy of seaboard refineries. To destroy the domestic industry would curb competition and create a monopoly. To build up and aid the domestic industry will encourage a healthy competition and insure an adequate supply of sugar to the consumers in this country at all times at low prices. [Applause on the Republican side.]

If it shall be found that sugar is a necessity of life; that its domestic production in sufficient quantities to meet our requirements can only be secured by the maintenance of a protective tariff; that in time of war our present sources of supply might be cut off entirely, thus causing great suffering to our citizens (and possibly forcing the United States to conclude an unfavorable treaty of peace), then we must conclude that a tariff on sugar should not depend upon the temporary necessities of a depleted treasury, but upon a governmental policy which demands that "our industries and resources shall be available and ready for mobilization," in order that we may enjoy "national efficiency and security." Such a conception of the reason for the law makes the tariff on sugar not only an integral part of our settled plan of national finance but also an integral part of our settled plan for national defense.

Sugar is a recognized article of food among every civilized people on the globe. This fact alone would strongly indicate that it is a necessary article of food. On the basis of having the same purchasing power, the per capita consumption of sugar is a fair general index of the degree of civilization attained by a people. As a nation advances its per capita consumption of sugar increases. If with this advancing civilization there is also increased purchasing power, there will be the maximum increase in sugar consumption. The history of Japan during the past 50 years illustrates the truth of this observation. In Europe and America there is a steady increase not only in the total amount of sugar consumed but also in the annual per capita consumption. Owing to the outbreak of war in August, 1914, the last official European statistics we have are for the year 1913. These show 754,000 long tons increase over 1912 and a per capita consumption of 36.61 pounds, an increase of 3.54 pounds over 1912. The number of pounds per capita consumption of sugar in the leading European countries during the year 1913 is as follows:

Germany	49.26
Austria-Hungary	28.14
France	43.47
Russia	24.31
Belgium	39.20
Holland	49.90
Turkey	19.84
England	95.52

Italy and Greece, situated on the shores of the Mediterranean in a warmer climate, with an abundance of semitropical fruit, have a much smaller annual per capita consumption of sugar, the amount being 11 and 11½ pounds, respectively.

During the 30 years from 1884 to 1914 the consumption of sugar in the United States increased from 1,252,366 long tons to 3,760,827 long tons, a gain of 2,508,461 long tons, an average yearly increase of 6.66 per cent. During the same 30 years the annual per capita consumption increased from 51 pounds to 84.29 pounds, an average annual increase of 1.14 pounds.

Such figures speak volumes in support of the proposition that sugar is a necessary part of the food supply of civilized people in this day and age of the world.

Bread can be made from flour produced from wheat, rye, corn, potatoes, and rice. If one source of flour is cut off a nation might turn to any one or more of the others without endangering its national existence. Not so with sugar, which, commercially speaking, is made from sugar cane or sugar beets. There are no substitutes. Moreover, the raw material from which commercial sugar is made—cane and beets—can not be held in storage for any length of time, nor can it be transported any great distance to be manufactured into an edible food, sugar. The nearest approaches to commercial sugar as a human food are dried fruits and glucose; but neither one nor both of these can be substituted for commercial sugar in the food supply of a nation, even though that nation is engaged in a life and death struggle for its very existence.

What light does the present European war throw upon the question under discussion?

When that war broke out, France and Belgium were producing their own sugar; Germany, Austria-Hungary, and Russia were not only producing all they consumed, but also great quantities for export, the leading sugar-exporting country among the belligerents being Germany. England produced no sugar, except in some of her distant colonies, and depended upon Germany for from two-thirds to three-fourths of her supply.

German armies soon destroyed the beet fields of Belgium and forced that country to depend upon the charity of the world for its supply of foodstuffs, including sugar. Her armies also overran the northern beet fields of France, destroying two-thirds of the sugar supply of that country, thereby forcing France into the markets of the world to purchase at greatly enhanced prices this necessary food for her people. The beet fields of Austria-Hungary have been free from invasion, and that country continues to supply its people with sugar at reasonable prices, and still has considerable sugar to export to adjacent neutral countries.

Some of the beet fields of Russia have been captured by the enemy, but there remain to the Russians enough such fields so that these people have all the sugar they need and at prices but little advanced over those prevailing in time of peace. Germany, however, furnishes the best illustration of a country whose sugar industry was ready for mobilization that it might help the country attain "national efficiency and security." In the midst of its titanic struggle it harvested and manufactured average sugar crops during the falls of 1914 and 1915. During the year and a half of struggle its people have had all the sugar they needed, and there has been plenty of sugar for export wherever it has been possible to export it. The low-grade raw sugars have constituted an abundant and cheap food for cattle and horses, while from the final molasses alcohol has been distilled to be used as a fuel to drive its motor cars, its aeroplanes, and its Zeppelins. From October 1, 1915, to December 1, 1915, the fifteenth, sixteenth, and seventeenth months of the war, the manufacturer's price of refined sugar had only advanced to $4.93 per 100 pounds, which price includes not only the sugar but the package and also the consumption tax of $1.51 per 100 pounds. Moreover, the 400 sugar factories of Germany are so scattered over the Empire that the transportation cost of moving this sugar to the consuming markets is not over 10 cents per 100 pounds, making the manufacturer's delivered price of German refined sugar $5.03 per 100 pounds. There is no reason why Germany can not continue these sugar conditions indefinitely no matter how long the war may last.

Compare this with the manufacturer's average New York price of refined sugar for the same months, viz, $5.56 per 100 pounds, to which must be added an average freight rate of 25 cents per 100 pounds for transporting the sugar to the consuming markets, making the American delivered price $5.81 per 100 pounds. In other words, the people of the United States, living in peace and quiet within the boundaries of a strictly neutral country and paying 50 cents per 100 pounds less tariff than the consumption tax paid by the Germans, must nevertheless pay 78 cents per 100 pounds more for their refined sugar than do the Germans in the very midst of this war.

Though Germany continues to collect a consumption tax equivalent to an ad valorem tax of 41 per cent on the in-bond price of sugar, her people have been able to buy sugar during the entire period of the war at a less price than has prevailed during the same months in any other civilized country on the globe. Moreover, she has had much surplus sugar for cattle food, for the manufacture of alcohol, and for export. All this has been accomplished without sending any money out of the country or pledging the nation's credit for a single mark. This is certainly an example of a "mobilized industry" working for "national efficiency and security."

How about England? During the month of July, 1914, the in-bond New York price of raw sugar had ranged from $2.25 to $2.31 per 100 pounds. The f. o. b. Cuba price was from 10 cents to 15 cents per hundred pounds less than the New York price. After the supply of European beet sugar was cut off Cuban sugar was practically the only stock that could be purchased until the new cane crop could be harvested the following late fall and winter months. Two days after the declaration of war England began to buy Cuban raw sugar and such refined sugar as she could purchase in the United States. Gladly would she have taken every pound of sugar remaining in Cuba. Had the American refiners permitted this, the United States would have been without sugar until our domestic crop came on the market in October and November. Not having even 30 days' supply of raw sugar on hand, the American refiners were forced to go into the market in competition with the English Government. The result was that within 10 days from England's declaration of war—from August 3 to August 13—the in-bond price of raw sugar advanced from $2.28 per 100 pounds to $5.50 per 100 pounds, or $3.22 per 100 pounds, a jump of 140 per cent. England did not stop buying until she had purchased in 10 days 6 months' supply of sugar. She depended upon her great navy to guard the transportation of this food product to her shores. Before purchasing her supply of flour or meat, before arranging for her supply of ammunition or rifles or cannon, before even attempting to mobilize her army, she bought, without regard to price, six months' supply of sugar.

The first day of the war she mobilized her navy; the second day she began buying sugar. The only thing that took precedence over the purchase of this article of food was the fleet to guard her coast and protect the transportation of food supplies. She had no sugar industry to be mobilized. Within her borders there was nothing but a few seaboard refineries that were as useless as cannon without ammunition unless they could secure convoyed cargoes of raw sugar from a tropical land 3,000 miles across the sea.

Whatever doctors may say concerning the necessity of commercial sugar as a means of sustaining human life, the experience of England in August, 1914—indeed, through the entire war—proves the necessity of commercial sugar as a means of sustaining life. It is not too much to say that if her navy had not made it possible for England to procure a new and constant supply of sugar after her German supply had been cut off, she would have been forced to go without sugar.

For the remainder of this discussion I shall consider that I have established the truth of the proposition "in this day and age of the world sugar is a necessary article of food."

For years preceding the war England maintained a sugar tariff for revenue only, the rate being 40 cents per 100 pounds. Though her soil and climate are adapted to beet culture, this tariff did not encourage the establishment of the industry. When this revenue tariff was established she refined 85 per cent of her sugar. The tariff was not found sufficient to maintain even the refining industry. Refinery after refinery was closed. In Greenock alone 18 refineries were dismantled. To-day she has refining capacity for only 45 per cent of her peace consumption. She is therefore obliged to buy not only raw but refined sugar. Her annual consumption of sugar before the war was 2,000,000 long tons. Under existing war conditions she must maintain in England at least a three months' surplus, so that during the first 17 months of war she has been obliged to buy 20 months' supply of sugar.

If, as reported by Willett & Gray, her consumption during the war is only 80 per cent of her consumption in time of peace, she has purchased 2,666,660 long tons of sugar during the past 17 months. Supposing her refineries have been running at full capacity, these purchases have been about half raw sugar and half refined. Most of the sugar has been bought in Cuba and New York. Markets where the remainder of the stock has been purchased have been fully as high as these. The average f. o. b. Cuba price for raws from August 1, 1914, to December 31, 1915, is $3.46 per 100 pounds. The average in bond New York price for refined sugar during the same period has been $4.62 per 100 pounds. To these prices must be added brokerage, insurance, discount on English exchange, and ocean freights, a total of $1.13 per 100 pounds, making the price of this sugar delivered in England $4.59 for raws and $5.75 for refined per 100 pounds. These prices do not represent the cost to the ultimate consumer, but simply the first cost of the sugar landed on the wharves in England. On this basis, since the beginning of the war England has paid $308,825,894 for sugar, every dollar of which, except the ocean freight, was sent out of the country. These purchases have been made by the Government for the refiners and wholesalers. It must have required an enormous working capital, all of which was secured by pledging the nation's credit, thus adding another load to the unprecedented demands of the war upon England's resources. In return, the Government collected during the first part of the war 40 cents per hundred revenue tariff; later the tariff was increased to approximately 2 cents per pound; all of which is a tax on the people, as they have no domestic sugar industry.

Germany adopted a policy of fixing the price which her manufacturers could charge for sugar, viz, $4.93 per 100 pounds, and limiting the gross profit of the jobbers to 5 per cent. The retail price, while supervised by the Government, has not yet been fixed by imperial regulations. On the other hand, England early in the war fixed the retail price at 4½ pence, practically 9 cents per pound. Later she reduced this to 7 cents per pound. When the tariff was increased from 40 cents per 100 pounds to nearly 2 cents per pound the greater part of this increase was added to the retail price of sugar, which has fluctuated during the entire war between about 7 cents and 9 cents per pound.

Since the beginning of hostilities in August, 1914, the ultimate consumers in England have been paying for their sugar an average of at least 2½ cents per pound more than have the ultimate consumers in Germany. That is, the 2,266,661 long tons of sugar consumed in England between August 1, 1914, and December 31, 1915, have cost the English people $126,933,000 more than the same quantity of sugar would have cost the German consumers during the same period of war. Moreover, England could not have obtained this sugar at this or any other price had she not a fleet capable of driving from the seas every ship belonging to a country having one of the largest navies in the world. There is no reason for thinking that sugar conditions in England will improve during the continuance of the war; in fact, there is every reason to believe that conditions will become worse with this continual drain upon the nation's resources and increasing strain upon the national credit.

The experience of England and Germany during the present war demonstrates more conclusively that I can express the advantage of a mobilized domestic sugar industry as a powerful aid to "national efficiency and security" in time of war.

To refer again to the experience of the United States during the present war:

During the 10 days from August 3 to August 13, 1914, when the price of raw sugar advanced $3.22 per 100 pounds, the New York price of refined sugar advanced from $4.40 to $7.50 per 100 pounds, a jump of $3.10. It fluctuated between $7.50 and $6.50 per 100 pounds from August 13 to October 1, when the domestic beet crop came on the market. The New York price then dropped steadily, reaching $4.95 by the close of the year 1914. Owing to the demands of Europe for Cuban raws, the call for our domestic beet crop for home use was unprecedented, and it went into consumption very rapidly. By the early spring months of 1915 the supply was well-nigh exhausted. Eastern cane again advanced to $6 during the summer months.

The early supplies of beet sugar in the autumn of 1915 were distributed in every State in the Union, and pulled the price of cane down to $4.80 by the latter part of September. Then the supply of Cuban raws became again practically exhausted, and during the last two months of the year the price of eastern cane rose to $6.15. Beet sugar did not follow this advance, the actual selling price throughout the Central States not going above $5.45, though the beet-sugar quotation did advance to $5.65; in fact, during the entire period of the war whenever beet sugar has been on the market its delivered price has been from 20 cents to 50 cents per 100 pounds below the delivered price of cane, as before stated. Twice during the war the advent of the domestic beet crop pulled down the price of eastern refined sugar, the first time from $7 to $4.95, the second time from $6 to $4.80. This helped every consumer in the country, whether he bought beet or cane sugar. Of course, it helped the user of beet sugar more, because he purchased his beet sugar at 20 cents to 50 cents per 100 pounds below the cane prices. Notwithstanding the effect of our domestic beet sugar upon the American market, the average New York net cash price of cane sugar during the war—from August 1, 1914, to December 31, 1915—is $5.62, against $4.11 for the 12 months preceding the war; that is, though we are a strictly neutral country, the war has advanced the price of sugar to the American consumer $1.51 per 100 pounds. On the 5,327,834 long tons we have consumed during the first 17 months of the war this amounts to an increase of $180,186,245 in the cost of our sugar—all because we have not an adequate supply of domestic sugar. Is it not time to mobilize this industry?

In the calendar year 1914 the United States consumed 3,760,827 long tons of sugar. The sources of supply were as follows:

	Per cent.
Domestic beet	16.6
Louisiana and Texas cane	3.8
Hawaii	13.5
Philippines	3.2

Nearly all of the remainder came from Cuba. Continental United States thus produced 20.4 per cent of our supply, the insular possessions 24 per cent, leaving a balance of about 55 per cent to be imported from foreign countries. All our sugar except the domestic beet and a small portion of the Louisiana and Texas sugar, together less than 18 per cent of our consumption, was refined by the seaboard refineries. At the average rate of increase for the past 30 years, our annual consumption of sugar in 1917 will be 4,000,000 long tons. On the basis of our present distribution of supplies, only one-fifth, or 800,000 tons, of this would be produced in continental United States and about 1,000,000 tons in our insular possessions. Unfortunately the last Congress passed a law providing that our domestic sugar industry should be demobilized May 1, 1916. If that law goes into effect it is safe to state that after peace has been restored and sugar prices are again normal our total continental sugar crop will not exceed 300,000 tons, and our insular crop will be reduced one-half, or to 450,000 tons, together making 18¾ per cent of an annual consumption of 4,000,000 tons. We would then be obliged to depend on a foreign supply for over 80 per cent of our sugar and upon the seaboard refineries to refine all our sugar except the paltry amount produced from our domestic beet crop.

There are some people who believe that if the United States gets into a position where it really needs a supply of sugar that all we would have to do would be to annex Cuba, and thereby secure an ample supply of sugar for all our necessities. Do not be too sure that this is a good policy. Cuba is an independent Republic, with an area greater than the combined area of the seven States, Vermont, New Hampshire, Connecticut, Rhode Island, Delaware, Massachusetts, and New Jersey. It has a population greater than the combined population of the nine States, Arizona, Colorado, Delaware, Idaho, Montana, Nevada, New Mexico, Oregon, and Wyoming. It could be divided into five States, each having a greater area than Massachusetts and each a greater population than Oregon.

It is a Republic in which the negro race and the white race are on terms of equality. Negroes not only enjoy theoretical civil and political equality, but actual equality. Moreover, the social barriers between the two races have been thrown down even to the extent that the intermarriage of the races is a matter of such common occurrence that it excites no comment. Very frequently children born of the same parents differ in color from the blond fair type of the white race to the coal-black skin of the native African. Let not my Democratic friends of the South think for one moment that if Cuba were annexed to the United States the majority of its citizens would vote the same ticket that is supported by the electors of our own Southern States. You may say that such a view is pure sentiment founded upon race prejudice. Make no mistake. It is the same sentiment and the same race prejudice that, no matter what other question might arise, has preserved the solid South intact for a hundred years. Nor need my friends from the North be so sure that the annexation of Cuba would be a good plan. Have we not enough race problems in the South, in the Philippines, in Hawaii, in Porto Rico, that we need take unto ourselves the Gem of the Antilles, where the hereditary ideas concerning the amalgamation of the white and black races have been incorporated into the social and civil customs of that Republic? Nor is this all. There are many of us who have not forgotten the circumstances under which the sentiment of the United States was incorporated in the Platt amendment of 1898. We do not believe that our Government is ready to consider such a declaration of principles a "mere scrap of paper." The President of the United States, in his message delivered at the opening of the present Congress, declared that the various American Republics are no longer to be considered as wards, but are to be treated as partners in the consideration of all those questions which affect the integrity of the two Americas. To annex Cuba to the United States at the request of a few aliens of that Republic who have invested their money in the island is to trample under foot the strongest political and social sentiment in our own Southern States, to violate the sacred obligations of the United States, and to throw into our political arena the most difficult race problem that has confronted the Union since 1861. Nor in the end, in time of a great foreign war, would we attain the commercial results which alone would prompt the annexation of Cuba.

In time of great national stress we could not rely on securing our supply of sugar either from our present insular possessions or from Cuba. Of what avail would it have been to Germany at the present time, even though she has one of the largest navies in the world, if her supply of sugar were produced in her colonies? Of what avail would it have been to England at the present time to have been able to purchase abroad an unlimited amount of sugar had she not a navy large enough to drive from the seas every ship flying the enemy's flag, leaving the highways of her ocean commerce practically as secure as in time of peace. No matter how zealously we increase our Navy, we can not, within the next 10 years, build warships enough to insure our supply of sugar from Cuba and our insular possessions. Moreover, if we are involved in a great war, our fleet will have all it can do in protecting our enormous coast line without being called upon to convoy cargoes of sugar. In time of such a war neither Cuba nor our present insular possessions would be able to protect themselves against the enemy. Every regiment, every cannon, every shipload of ammunition, every battleship which we would send to defend our present insular possessions or Cuba would diminish by that same amount the forces which we otherwise would have for use in defending our continental domain. Nor do the difficulties stop here. Every pound of sugar which we secure from our insular possessions or from Cuba must be refined in our seaboard refineries before it can be used as human food. Where are these seaboard refineries located? At San Francisco, New Orleans, Baltimore, Philadelphia, New York, and Boston, the very cities which an enemy might first attempt to capture or destroy. Not only are these refineries located on the seaboard, but on the very water front, with their own wharves where ocean-going vessels can load and unload cargoes. A few well-directed shots from a fleet 10 miles out at sea would destroy them, and our citizens would be without refined sugar, even though the sources of supply for raw sugar might still remain open for a time. Seaboard refineries are a vulnerable part in a nation's armor, making "national efficiency and security" impossible. They are the heel of Achilles, and enable an enemy equipped with a powerful navy to destroy a necessary food supply of a nation dependent on such refineries.

Notwithstanding our great natural resources, if we are to depend for our sugar upon a supply of raws brought to our shores from our insular possessions and Cuba and refined in seaboard refineries, we are in a more precarious condition than England, because we can not expect ever to possess a Navy equal to that which has made England mistress of the seas. On the other hand, if our supply of refined sugar is made from beets grown in the United States area adapted to their culture, we are not subject to any of the dangers that would beset us if our supply of sugar were to come from Cuba and our insular possessions and be refined by seaboard refiners. Like Germany, our main beet area lies in the very heart of the continent, where it would be secure from invasion no matter what enemy might attack us. Moreover, that area is so distributed that were we to produce a very considerable amount of our supply of sugar from home-grown beets the number of necessary factories each producing refined sugar would be so scattered over the country that the expense of transporting this sugar to the consuming markets would be small compared with the expense of transporting raw sugar to the seaboard and refined sugar to the interior. In this respect again our position is comparable to that of Germany.

While admitting the advisability of producing our sugar from home-grown beets, some may wonder whether we have a sufficient area adapted to beet culture to produce all the sugar we need. On the authority of the United States Department of Agriculture I wish to say that we have enough land adapted to beet culture and secure from invasion to produce in one year as much sugar as the entire world has consumed since the year of our birth or the birth of our Savior. Germany produces annually two and a half million long tons of sugar on an actual planted area which is less than the area of three average Michigan counties. To neglect to develop to the extent of our necessities our natural resources for the production of beet sugar is greater folly than to leave unproductive those great desert regions of the West which are made to blossom as the rose by our national system of irrigation. If we fail to conserve our water supply for mechanical and irrigation purposes, we are simply postponing the development of our productive power, while if we fail to develop our natural resources for the production of beet sugar we are not only postponing our national productive power, but we are making vulnerable the defense of the Nation in a vital part, the production of a necessary food supply.

With a per capita consumption of 85 pounds, which calls for an annual supply of 4,000,000 tons sugar in 1917, what is the least amount that we should produce in continental United States to provide for reasonable national security? In time of war England is using 80 per cent of her peace consumption. We certainly ought not to plan for less than 60 per cent of our regular supply. This would give us a per capita consumption of 51 pounds—practically the same as Germany—and require in 1917 a domestic sugar crop of 2,400,000 tons. I do not believe a less amount is compatible with conservative ideas for national security. Even with this supply of sugar our people would be obliged to discontinue the use of many sweets and many other articles of diet now extensively used.

Still, by placing the country under martial law and dealing out sugar tickets, as they now deal out bread tickets in Germany, we would probably be able to get along without causing the sugar-consuming citizens to clamor too loudly for sugar at any price. A smaller annual supply than 50 pounds per capita to cover sugar used in the family and for manufacturing purposes would cause a continued protest that would certainly embarrass the Government and might endanger the very life of the Republic. On the basis of an annual continental production of 2,400,000 tons Louisiana and Texas would produce about 400,000 tons, most of which would be refined on the plantations, while the balance, or 2,000,000 tons, would be produced by the beet-sugar factories, all as refined sugar. This means that our present supply of continental sugar should be increased threefold. Any fiscal legislation relative to sugar which fails to recognize the truth of this position strikes at the very security of the Nation. To make the domestic sugar industry the football of party politics is to commit a crime against the integrity of the Republic.

The present war illustrates how the production of an adequate supply of munitions can be built up within a few months, or can be secured in the markets of the world if a belligerent country has the necessary credit and navy. In ante bellum days France believed that the war, when it came, would be short and sharp. Her supplies and munitions of war were therefore planned accordingly. She found to her dismay that her entire stock of ammunition was exhausted in repelling the drive on Paris. She could not follow up the advantages of the battle of the Marne for lack of adequate guns and ammunition.

The best she could do was to intrench and defend the Republic with the naked bayonet. Feverishly she withdrew her mechanics from the trenches, and, though her principal iron district had fallen into the hands of the enemy, she again started the fires in her munition factories and converted hundreds of other factories into ammunition plants. At the end of six months she was able once more to supply her troops with necessary munitions of war, and since that time the supply has been equal to the demand. During these six months her forces were compelled to act on the defensive and husband with greatest care every munition of war. She was, however, able to rehabilitate her munition industry in six months.

In July, 1914, England was even more poorly supplied with munitions of war than was France. While doing her utmost to build up her domestic production of munitions, her unprecedented financial resources enabled her to come to the United States and offer the manufacturers of this country most profitable financial inducements to transform their various factories into munition plants. Within from three months to a year these various American factories began to turn out in enormous quantities all kinds of munitions of war. To pay the expenses of such an undertaking compelled England to strain her national credit to the danger point. The task was, however, accomplished, and within a few months both England and Russia were being supplied by the United States and Japan with enough munitions of war, which, added to their own supply, gave these allies an adequate stock. That which it was possible for these various countries to accomplish in furnishing munitions of war within a few months would have been impossible if the demand had been to produce sugar rather than guns and ammunition. To get the first returns in producing sugar requires a full year. Even to secure a supply in 12 months it must be supposed there is on hand an abundant supply of seed from which to grow either cane or beets. Also that the land is prepared or is in a condition to be prepared for the planting of the seed. Also that there are plenty of factories already erected and equipped with machinery suitable to produce the required amount of sugar.

Such prerequisites are never at hand and ready to be used upon such an emergency. Time is the very essence of the problem. No matter how patriotic a citizenry might be, or how great the financial inducements that might be offered, or how great the natural resources of the country, it would be from three to five years before our people could respond to the necessities of such a call and the United States would be starved before its present supply of sugar could be increased, in time of war, sufficiently to satisfy the necessities of the people. It is very fortunate for us that when Congress passed the free-sugar bill it provided that the law should not take effect until May 1, 1916. To-day we have the experience of 17 active years in the production of domestic beet sugar, and the farm and factory equipment for an annual output of 700,000 tons. By proper fiscal legislation we can, within the next three to five years, increase this domestic output to the minimum amount required for national security. If, on the other hand, the law as it now stands on the statute books is allowed to go into effect, our entire domestic beet-sugar industry will be demobilized, and when thus destroyed it will be impossible for us to rehabilitate it in less than 10 years to the point where it will supply our minimum requirements for national security.

Some people criticize the protective sugar tariff on the ground that there has not been a sufficient development of the beet-sugar industry in the United States to justify such a tariff. Our domestic beet-sugar industry virtually dates from the passage of the Dingley Tariff Act in 1897, at which time there were but nine small beet-sugar factories in the United States. Our entire domestic crop at that time amounted to 287,578 tons cane sugar, and 40,399 tons beet sugar, or together, 327,917 tons, making 16.3 per cent of our consumption in the calendar year 1897. The year following the passage of the Dingley Tariff Act marks the Spanish-American War with its resultant acquisition of the Philippines and Porto Rico, together with the assumption of guardianship over the newly formed Republic of Cuba. It also brought about the annexation of Hawaii. All this acquired territory is located in the Tropics and adapted to sugar-cane culture. From 1876 to 1898 Hawaii enjoyed free trade with the United States, which relation was dependent upon treaty. By the act of annexation in 1898 the free-trade relationship was made permanent and the development of the sugar resources of those islands was greatly promoted. In 1897 Hawaii produced 232,213 tons of sugar. In 1914 she produced 565,000 tons of sugar.

As soon as the Spanish-American War was concluded the question of the commercial relationship with Cuba became prominent. Some wished free trade between that Republic and the United States. Others wished the maintenance of full tariff relations, while still others believed that a tariff concession should be granted, which concession should be somewhere from 20 per cent to 75 per cent. The matter was discussed for four years in Congress, receiving attention at every session. Finally a compromise was reached, whereby goods entering the United States from Cuba should pay but 80 per cent of the full tariff rate. This arrangement has been in effect from 1903 to the present.

Two different Congresses undercook the settlement of the tariff relations with Porto Rico, the first making a tariff concession, the second passing a law which provided for free trade.

The tariff relations between the United States and the Philippines was a subject for discussion in every Congress from 1903 to 1913. At first the full tariff was levied on goods shipped from those islands to the United States. Then a law was passed granting a concession of 25 per cent; then another law was passed granting free trade up to 300,000 tons of sugar; and, finally, in 1913 Congress provided for absolute free trade in the matter of sugar shipped from the Philippines to the United States.

In 1911 there was a general revision of the tariff, at which time there was a strong sentiment in favor of a substantial decrease in the rate of duty. The next year, in 1912, a Democratic House passed a free-sugar bill, which failed in the Senate. In 1913 there was another general revision of the tariff providing for an immediate cut of 25 per cent in the sugar duty, with the still further provision that there should be absolute free trade in sugar beginning May 1, 1916.

It will thus be seen that since 1897 there has been scarcely a session of Congress when some phase of the sugar tariff has not been attacked, every such attack tending to diminish the amount of protection afforded the domestic sugar industry. Finally these attacks culminated, in October, 1913, with the passage of a law providing that after May 1, 1916, the entire duty on sugar should be removed. Under such circumstances it is not at all strange that the development of the domestic sugar industry has been hampered from the start. It is passing strange that during these 17 years of conflict we have increased the domestic beet-sugar industry from an annual output of 40,399 tons to an annual average output of 646,257 tons. Nothing but the indomitable energy and perseverance of our people has enabled us to accomplish so much.

The domestic sugar industry can not be maintained, even in its present state of inadequate efficiency, without a protective tariff. It can not be developed to the point where it will provide national efficiency and security without a protective tariff that will induce twice as much capital to embark in this business as is now invested in the industry.

Soon after the present administration went into power the Department of Commerce instituted a most thorough investigation of the sugar industry of the United States. This investigation covered the beet-sugar industry and also the cane-sugar industry in Louisiana, Porto Rico, and Hawaii. It was most thorough, involving a minute examination of every book of account to discover the cost of production, the method and area of distribution, the profits of the company, and the business relations between the manufacturer and the farmers who grew beets and cane. So minute was the investigation that it sometimes required the work of three or four expert Government accountants for from four to six weeks to investigate the books of a single company. For some reason or other this investigation did not cover the refining sugar industry. It is very strange that this exhaustive investigation was conducted in such a manner as not to obtain any notice in the public press. It is equally remarkable that the results of this investigation have never been given to Congress to assist that body in framing fiscal legislation relative to sugar. I challenge the Department of Commerce to turn over to the Ways and Means Committee of the House of Representatives all the reports made by their investigators upon the domestic sugar industry of the United States. I do not wish the department's comments or conclusions concerning these reports, but the actual reports themselves. I am thoroughly convinced that such reports will establish the truth of my assertion that the domestic sugar industry of this country can not be maintained at its present state of efficiency in time of peace without a protective tariff, and my further assertion that the continental sugar industry can not be developed to the point of providing a minimum of national efficiency and security without a protective tariff that will induce new capital to embark in this industry to a far greater extent than we have at the present time.

The results of the free-sugar law passed October, 1913, effective May 1, 1916, are most marked. That law was placed on the statute books too late to affect the size of the crop harvested the fall of 1913. Its influence is shown on the crops harvested the falls of 1914 and 1915. Eleven beet-sugar factories that operated the fall of 1913 were closed the fall of 1914, and the output of sugar was 9,000 tons less than in 1913. By the spring of 1915 it became quite apparent that the war would probably continue another year, and five of the factories that were closed in 1914 were opened for the fall of 1915, making 65 factories in operation in 1915 as compared with 60 in 1914 and 71 in 1913. The factories that operated in 1915 made a special effort to secure acreage, and the yield of beet sugar for the crop of 1915 is somewhat larger than in 1914. Notwithstanding the high prices incident to the war, the certainty that a free-sugar law is on the statute books overbalances the uncertainty of the duration of the war, and 12 of our factories remained idle in 1915 because their stockholders would not risk bankruptcy resulting from peace and free trade. Under the recommendations of the President and the Secretary of the Treasury that the free-sugar law be repealed, all of the 77 beet-sugar factories in the United States, with the exception of 2, are planning to operate next season if they can secure a supply of beet seed. Not a single new beet-sugar factory has been erected in this country since the passage of the present tariff law, but already since the announcement of the Secretary of the Treasury contracts have been made to erect four new factories for the fall of 1916.

Our output of domestic cane sugar was 54,141 tons less in 1914 than in 1913 and 62,196 tons less in 1915 than in 1914. In other words, under the two years of threatened free trade our supply of domestic cane from Texas and Louisiana dropped from 267,337 tons to 151,000 tons, a loss of 43 per cent, and 121,000 tons in 1916.

Compare the above figures with those relating to Cuba. In 1913–14 Cuba harvested 2,597,732 tons of sugar. Mr. Himely, the greatest authority in Cuba, estimates the Cuban crop for 1915–16 to be 3,173,429 tons, an increase of 575,697 tons, or 22 per cent, in the two years that have elapsed since the passage of our free-sugar law. There were 3 new factories (centrals) erected in Cuba in 1914 and 11 new factories erected for the fall of 1915.

Mr. Himely also says:

> Land continues to be prepared, and plantings of cane are being made for the crop of 1916–17, a few more new centrals will also be working by that time, while appearances indicate that a considerable number of centrals in Matanzas and Santa Clara Provinces will then be the property of a wealthy syndicate headed by the ablest sugar men in this hemisphere, who will probably increase the output of these estates

All reports from that island show there is a feverish haste in developing new cane lands and erecting new factories. The values of some of the leading sugar stocks of Cuba have increased 500 per cent since the passage of our free-sugar law in 1913. A most interesting fact in connection with this recent development in Cuba is that many of the leading stockholders and officers interested in the seaboard refineries of the United States are prominent in the organization of new Cuban companies for the development of the resources of that island. An examination of the list of the directors of these two classes of corporations shows that they are fully acquainted with the advantages to be obtained by interlocking directorates. Never has Cuba and the Americans who have invested their money in Cuba seen such prosperity as has been brought to that island by our tariff law of 1913.

The largest Cuban sugar merchant protested personally to the President of the United States against the entire removal of the duties on Cuban cane sugar. He declared: "This would be a gift of $60,000,000 per annum to the island of Cuba. It would promote riotous speculation and industrial and social disorganization." Nevertheless, Congress did pass the free-sugar law, effective May 1, 1916, and the results have justified the prophecy made by this Cuban merchant. Aside from the actual developments already completed and previously set forth, options were obtained in October, 1915, upon 35 plantations upon a cash basis. J. & W. Seligman & Co., The Guaranty Trust Co., the house of Morgan, the sugar house of Rionda and their associates became interested in the promotion of a $50,000,000 syndicate. With no authorized public announcement $10,000,000 of cash was paid in early in 1916, and Mr. Rionda is now in Cuba selecting from his options those plantations which can be most advantageously united for commercial operation.

One can not but conclude that the free-sugar law of 1913 was to Cuban sugar interests a promise, and to the beet and cane interests of the United States a threat.

If the advisability or necessity of having a domestic sugar supply of considerable size within the borders of the United States as a means of securing national efficiency and security be admitted, then the necessity of a protective tariff on sugar can be shown in a very few words.

We can not have such a supply without having a domestic sugar industry to produce that supply. From the time the beet seed or cane seed is planted, throughout the growing of the crop, the transportation of the beets or cane to the factory, and the manufacture of this material into edible food, it is continuously a question of human labor. This is preeminently true throughout the agricultural part of the process. Notwithstanding Europe has been engaged in raising beet sugar for over a century, very few implements have been invented to supplant human labor in cultivating or harvesting a crop of beets. The beet-sugar world still finds it necessary to hoe the sugar into the beets and harvest the crop by hand. Notwithstanding the fact that sugar cane has been grown since the building of the pyramids, no one has yet invented a successful sugar-cane harvester. The stalks must still be stripped by hand and cut by hand.

Sugar, the world over, is human labor, and the cost of producing sugar depends primarily upon the cost of the labor entering into its production. Sugar cane is indigenous to the Tropics and semi-Tropics. Sugar beets are grown only in the Temperate Zone. Aside from the fact that an acre of good sugar cane will produce more sugar than an acre of good sugar beets, the labor that plants, cultivates, harvests, and manufactures that cane into sugar is paid less at every stage in the process than the corresponding labor that plants, cultivates, harvests, and manufactures the beet into sugar. This disparity in wages is greater than the disparity in efficiency. It is the centuries old conflict between the Tropics and the Temperate Zone.

The laborer of the Temperate Zone can not accept the wages of the laborer of the Tropics, for he will not descend to the scale of living in the Tropics. These facts have been recognized by every country in the world that has developed the beet-sugar industry. Every one of them has maintained a high protective tariff on sugar until such time as its production equaled its consumption, and after that a moderately high tariff, which effectually protected its labor from competition with the cheap labor of the Tropics. If such a policy has been found necessary in Europe, how much more necessary is it in the United States, where labor is paid the highest wage in the world. This fact is accentuated by the further fact that the greatest cane-sugar producing country lies much closer to us than to Europe, thus forcing upon us fiercer competition.

That this reasoning is founded upon fact and not theory is shown by comparing the in-bond price of Cuban raw sugar f. o. b. New York with the price the American manufacturer pays for the beets delivered at his factory. In July, 1914, the last month of peace and the height of the summer sugar season, the in-bond price of Cuban raw sugar f. o. b. New York ranged from $2.25 to $2.31 per 100 pounds.

The cost of sugar beets delivered at the factories throughout the United States ranges from $5.50 to $6.50 per short ton of 2,000 pounds. From such beets the average extraction ranges in different years from 240 to 250 pounds per ton of beets. Call it an average of 245 pounds. If we had access to the actual reports of the investigators appointed by the Department of Commerce, we would find that they substantiate these figures. It thus appears that the American manufacturer actually pays from $2.25 to $2.65 per 100 pounds for the extractable sugar in the beets before beginning the process of manufacture, or more than the selling price of Cuban sugar delivered duty free in New York. At 2¼ cents per pound the Cuban planter can make money.

About 10 years ago the Hollanders sent commissioners around the world to ascertain the cost of raising sugar. After thorough investigation the report was returned that the island of Cuba could produce sugar cheaper than any other section of the globe. It costs 2½ cents per pound to produce sugar from the beet in Germany, but Cuban plantations make a fair investment return upon selling sugar at 2 cents a pound. The $50,000,000 corporation now being organized in New York for the operation of Cuban plantations figure that—with sugar at its bottom price, or 2 cents per pound, the company should earn at least one and one-half times the dividend on the preferred.

In face of such indisputable facts it is folly to maintain that our domestic sugar industry can be developed without the aid of a protective tariff. Those who are responsible for free sugar, either unintentionally or knowingly played into the hands of the foreign sugar producer and the seaboard refiners. If they continue to perpetuate this error, upon them and upon them alone will devolve the responsibility for demoralizing our domestic sugar industry. Upon them and upon them alone will rest the responsibility for failure to develop one of the great natural resources of the country. Upon them and upon them alone will rest the responsibility for imperiling the life of the Republic should we become involved in a great war. Before it is too late let Europe, with its mountain-high debt, its devastated fields, its ruined commerce, its razed cities, its starving millions, teach us the value of an adequate food supply safe from the dangers of invading armies. Such a supply is an absolute necessity if we would enjoy "national efficiency and security."

Mr. KITCHIN. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. KENT].

Mr. KENT. Mr. Chairman, in all legislation we must have a philosophy back of us. We have to deal not in absolute quantities but in trends and tendencies. It has all along seemed to me that in this connection working toward free trade was working toward peace and working toward high protection meant commercial war, which is likely to lead to trouble. There is one thing about the protective doctrine that I have always stood for, and that is the encouragement of infant industries that can at some time or other become self-supporting in our country. If they can not become self-supporting they ought not to be protected under ordinary conditions. Looking the world over, it has always seemed to me that it has been proven that sugar can be raised best and cheapest in the Tropics. If under free sugar or lower tariffs on sugar the refiners profit at the expense of the consumer, that seems to be a question for the Department of Justice or the Department of Commerce. It seems to me that it is a cowardly way of raising revenue to raise it out of the pocket of the consumer. I would much rather see it raised more directly from those who have property over and above the common hunger than to have it taken out of the consumption of this necessary article, paid for in equality out of unequal pockets. But to my mind the retention of this tariff at this time is justified on entirely different grounds from those ordinarily held. I do not believe in it as a revenue measure and I do not believe in working toward permanent protection, but this is a war measure. The war has upset all our economic ideas. It becomes necessary for us to become more self-sustaining in our own continental boundaries. In the case of a food as important as sugar, of which we might be deprived in case of war by the cutting off of our commerce or if in avoiding war we turn in and live to ourselves, it behooves us to see to it that we provide a domestic supply as a war measure, or perhaps as a peace measure. [Applause.]

From my standpoint as a large woolgrower I object to having wool put on a parity with sugar. This country is raising all the wool it can raise now, and raising it more profitably without a tariff. It is strange, but when we had a tariff I never got more than 12 cents a pound for my Nevada wool, and I sold this year's clip for 19¾ cents by contract in advance of shearing.

Mr. CHARLES. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KENT. I will. I have only a short time.

Mr. CHARLES. Is it not a fact that the high price of wool is owing to the scarcity of wool all over the world?

Mr. KENT. It is. I was not saying that the high price was on account of the tariff being taken off, but I do say that the tariff never did me any good. The world's demand has now caught up with the supply, and we woolgrowers are getting the benefit of it. There is one way to increase the supply of wool in this country, and that is by protecting the range rather than by protecting the wool. We can not have any more wool in this country unless the range is conserved, fenced and improved, and allotted by lease, and I hope Congress will not be afraid to deal with that when the time comes.

It seems to me that the encouragement granted by a protective tariff, to the extent of 1 cent a pound on sugar, is at this time a necessary measure of national defense to the end of providing a domestic sugar supply.

Unjustifiable as a means of raising revenue, it finds its only sanction in the same false economy to which of necessity we yield when we appropriate for the Navy, for the Army, and for other warlike preparation. I am regretfully certain that we must answer a foolish world according to its folly. I shall cast a vote for this measure of protection, and shall vote for armament when given opportunity.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. DUPRÉ].

Mr. DUPRÉ. Mr. Chairman, the Democratic State central committee of Louisiana, whose membership was chosen in a primary on January 25, met at the city of New Orleans on the 7th of February and formulated a platform upon which the Democratic candidate for governor and other State officers are now appealing to the people for their suffrages. One of the planks of that platform bears upon this measure, which I shall read. I want to say that it was offered by the mayor of the city of Shreveport, Dr. S. A. Dickson, who hails from a section of our State where there is no cane grown and where there is not a single sugar factory. It shows the unanimous opinion of the Democratic Party of the State of Louisiana on the subject. The plank reads:

Be it resolved, That for the purpose of providing the revenues necessary for the honest and economical administration of the Government we indorse the recommendation of President Wilson and the Democratic Secretary of the Treasury to repeal that provision of the present tariff law which places sugar on the free list after May 1, 1916, and we respectfully request our Senators and Representatives in the United States Congress to use their united efforts for the early passage of a law carrying the recommendation of the President and the Secretary of the Treasury into effect.

A true copy.

A. W. NEWLIN,
Secretary Democratic State Central Committee of Louisiana.

NEW ORLEANS, LA., February 15, 1916.

By unanimous consent, the following Members were given leave to extend their remarks in the RECORD: Mr. MCLAUGHLIN, Mr. MANN, Mr. GOOD, Mr. VARE, Mr. JOHNSON of Washington, Mr. POWERS, and Mr. KINKAID.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. TIMBERLAKE].

Mr. TIMBERLAKE. Mr. Chairman, I have not the time nor the inclination to enter into a lengthy discussion of the tariff question as a whole nor even in that part of it affected by the pending resolution. This has been done by Members here who by reason of their long service in Congress, their careful study of the subject, fully qualify them to do. Yet, as a Representative of a district in the great State of Colorado, that contains nine beet-sugar factories, I feel that I would not be justified in silence when this subject is being considered.

Do you know, my friends, that this is "Baby week" all over this fair land of ours? The press tells us that 20,000 cities and communities are simultaneously celebrating. This contemplates enlightened care of infants in this country; "protection," if you please, to our infant industry.

So, Mr. Chairman, is it not most fitting that the Congress of the United States at the same time should be fostering and protecting one of its chief infant industries by refusing to remove, for the time at least, its last swaddling cloth of protection, without which this industry must necessarily languish and in the end die.

In my district, at least, the manufacture of beet sugar is an infant industry, having grown and developed to its gigantic proportions within the last 15 years.

Its beneficent effect is keenly felt by all our people. This includes, of course, those interested in its manufacture, but it also includes other classes of our citizenship. It includes the farmer who raises the beets; and I can speak for him, for I am an actual grower of sugar beets and know that the price which the factory was able to pay prior to the reduction of the tariff was a satisfactory price to the farmer and enabled him to secure better returns from his land, by far, than obtained prior to its coming. This is demonstrated by the fact that since the advent of the sugar beet land values have doubled and quadrupled.

And, again, as a Representative of a beet-growing district, I am gratified that the Chief Executive and the present legislative majority have seen fit to recommend this wise piece of legislation, and "with good will to all and malice toward none" I shall vote for the measure; and although it may seem paradoxical—the administration being Democratic—for once during this Congress, at least, I shall be found standing by my party, my principles, and my President.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FESS] one minute.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, I am in favor of the measure and shall vote for it, not simply to get the revenue so necessary today but rather to stimulate an industry that under proper legislation will reach the plane where we would not only be producing the sugar we need in this country, but we could ultimately become an exporter of sugar. I am also in favor of the bill because, under proper legislation, we will increase the productivity of the soil by the use of a root crop which makes one of the best soil fertilizers when rotated with other crops. I will vote to increase the production of sugar because it will invest American capital in the production of one of the greatest of food products, and will employ not only labor in the field but will insure to the farmer a ready market for the fruits of his toil. With the increase of beet growing and sugar production the price of sugar to the consumer is reduced.

Free sugar benefits no one save the importer, while a protective duty benefits the farmer who plants the beets, the manufacturer who manufactures the sugar, the consumer by a reduced price of his sugar, and the Government will be benefited by the revenue collected. I shall not hesitate to vote for this protection of sugar, even though it is brought in by the Democrats. It is not a question of who brings in this Republican measure. While I vote for Republican principles when they are brought here by Republicans, I will not vote against a Republican measure simply because it is brought in by the Democrats.

Mr. Chairman, I shall vote for the suspension of the Underwood bill on sugar. I will also vote for its suspension on wool, on lumber, on agricultural products, and upon other articles which come in competition with American products of American labor.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL].

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. FORDNEY. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GARLAND].

Mr. GARLAND. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. FORDNEY. I yield to the gentleman from New Hampshire [Mr. SULLOWAY].

Mr. SULLOWAY. Mr. Chairman, I am in favor of the bill, notwithstanding the Democrats are going to vote for it. [Laughter.] I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New Hampshire?

There was no objection.

Mr. FORDNEY. I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Washington [Mr. HUMPHREY].

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Mr. Chairman, I did have a speech prepared, which I intended to deliver at this time, but it is impossible for me within the limited time granted me to discuss the matter I had in mind. In the few minutes that I have I desire to refer to the particular argument that we have heard our Democratic friends make for so many years about the tariff. How many times have we heard them say: "The tariff is a tax; it is added to the price of the article; the consumer pays it." This is the first article in the Democratic creed. Until you have subscribed to that article of faith you can not be in good standing in the Democratic Party. That declaration has been written in every Democratic platform and has furnished the central idea of every Democratic speech that for the last 50 years has vexed the troubled air. It has been the foundation for the favorite morsel of Democratic orators that by a "robber tariff the rich have grown richer and the poor poorer."

How are the righteous degraded! The denouncers of special privilege, plutocracy, and tariff barons, the old Democratic Party comes before the American people to-day actually advocating a tariff, not upon a luxury but upon one of the greatest of all necessities, a necessity of the rich and poor alike. Oh, the tears that you have shed and the sobs that you have sobbed and the sympathy that you have spilled in the sad days of the past, when you were wanting to get into office, about the hordes of protection and plunder taxing the articles on the poor man's breakfast table! Surely sugar is one of the articles that you would place there. Have you forgotten that singsong tale of woe that every Democratic orator used to recite?

But now the ancient Democratic faith is forgotten. Every Democratic platform is forgotten. Every Democratic doctrine is forgotten, and you come in here advocating a tariff—a tax that is added to the price of the article and that the consumer pays—and that tariff is to be placed upon one of the great necessities of life.

Why this change? If Congress intends to enter into a contest of reversals with the Executive, the frequency and the rapidity of the performance will produce such a seasickness that the present Democratic stomach will be able to retain little of the ancient and honored Democratic faith. The whole country is already nauseated by the frequency of these performances.

But you answer that the country needs the money. It always does under a Democratic administration. [Applause on the Republican side.] No one but a Democrat is surprised at the condition of the National Treasury. Everyone else knew from the day it was enacted what the result under the Underwood law would be. But if you must have money, why not place your tax upon luxuries? That is what you have always preached. Did not your Baltimore platform declare that your pledges were made to be kept after election as well as to be used to get into office?

Why should the party that has always posed as a particular friend of the poor, the enemy of the rich, levy a tax upon sugar? Certainly sugar is a necessity. Sugar is life. Why should it be taxed? If you must levy a tax, why not levy it, as nearly as possible, according to the ability of those to pay it upon whom the burden is placed? You have said ten thousand times that the tariff on sugar was a robbery; that it was an unjust tax which oppressed the poor and permitted the rich to escape their just burden. But now you propose to make the poor man pay as much tax as the rich man. If what the Democratic Party has been preaching all these years be true, then, in fact, the poor man will pay more of this tax than the rich man, for he has, as a rule, a larger family to support. Under this law if during all these years you have stated the fact the janitor who cares for this building will pay as much of this tax as any one of us. Is that fair?

If your statements in the past have been true, the day laborer that gets $2 a day will pay as much of this tax as a bank president. Do you gentlemen on that side of the House believe this to be the truth? Did you ever believe it, except in campaign times, when the fatal hunger for office was gnawing at your vitals? If the Democratic doctrine be true, the man that amid the dust and smoke of mill or mine or factory, laboring 10 hours a day, supporting himself and his family by the sweat of his face, will pay more of this tax than will the useless parasite that spends his unearned millions and, feeble-mindedly puffing his doped cigarette, rides in his high-powered auto beside his childless wife with her perfumed and powdered Pomeranian pet. [Applause on the Republican side.]

If the tariff is a tax and the consumer pays it, as you have always preached, why should you be so unjust to the poor and so favor the rich? Why should the day laborer pay as much to support the Nation as the millionaire? There is no theory upon which you can justify a tariff upon sugar without repudiating all you have ever said about a tariff. You can not justify it upon the ground of necessity; for if you must have revenue and you have not the courage to levy a direct tax, then there are many other articles that would not so heavily burden the poor upon which a tariff can be placed.

Would it not be fairer and more equitable and more in accordance with what you have always taught to place a tax upon the income of the rich instead of placing a tax upon sugar, a universal necessity? Why not increase that tax? Why not place a tax upon the munitions of war? Millions are being made by the sale of these products to the warring nations of Europe. Why not let those who are becoming rich give some of it to support the Government rather than the working classes, that use sugar? Rather than unjustly tax the poor by placing a tax upon sugar, would it not be better to increase the tax upon beer and whisky and tobacco? These might be classed by some as luxuries; by some, perhaps, as an unmixed evil; by some, perhaps, as necessities; but surely none will contend that whisky or beer or tobacco are necessary to sustain the lives of little children. The use of these is not universal. If something must be taxed, why not tax them instead of sugar? Either the Democratic Party has renounced its ancient faith—that the tariff is a tax, that it is added to the price of the article, and that the consumer pays it—or it must confess that this legislation is a deliberate crime against the poor of their country.

Is there no politics in your action to-day? Has the result of the election in Louisiana alarmed you? As you look upon the ruined and prostrate sugar industry of the South, has it brought to you no conviction? Is it mere chance that you now add one more southern product to the protected list? If the tariff is a tax that the consumer pays and you are levying these duties solely for revenue, you can hardly hope to have the country believe that for this reason alone you are so altruistic as to place it principally upon southern products.

In view of the brave words spoken but a few short months ago, who would have expected to see the Democratic Party, led by a distinguished Democrat from North Carolina, fighting for a tariff upon sugar—a tariff that is paid principally by the middle classes and the poor, while upon the rich it practically imposes no burden.

The old Democratic Party that for years managed to live only because in solemn and dramatic tones it righteously railed at the rich and piously pleaded the cause of the poor; the Democratic Party here in Congress under pressure from the President that it fears but does not honor and dare not disobey, facing the dismal failure of the Underwood law, in their perplexity and panic in perpetual performance, continues to play "such fantastic tricks before high Heaven as make the angels weep." [Laughter and applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield now to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HAMILTON].

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. FOCHT].

Mr. FOCHT. Mr. Chairman, it was my intention to make a speech upon this question two years ago, but, like 100 other Republicans, I was not here. It was one time stated up in Reading by a gentleman that he was 25 years old. Upon being questioned as to the exact time he was born he confessed that he was 27, but he did not count the two years he had lived in Delaware.

Mr. Chairman, those two years I was absent from this House I do not count, but instead of inserting a speech in the RECORD to-day I am going to try and give my observations in the three minutes that have been granted to me.

The reason I was not here two years ago to deliver an address upon the question was because my Democratic opponent told the board of trade at Waynesboro and the people in the seventeenth district that if they had free sugar the price of that article would go down. As a matter of fact, as soon as he was elected the price commenced to go up and it has been mounting ever since, and there is no promise of lower prices, even though this law should not be repealed. It seems to me foolish to debate this question when we are all agreed upon it, unless campaign ammunition is to be made and a record vote is sought. If we in this country ever have intensive farming as it is carried on in France and Belgium, we will be able to sustain a population of not only 100,000,000, but of 300,000,000, and therefore I think it is absurd to send our money abroad when we can raise all the sugar we need here in America. [Applause on the Republican side.] In 1804 the greatest statesman the world, I believe, had seen, as well as the greatest warrior up to his time at least, Napoleon, when the British had put a blockade on sugar that had been coming from Java, this man of genius and oversight placed a bounty on the production of sugar in France, and from that time until now that country has been able to supply herself with this great necessity. We can do the same thing in this country. It was an absurdity, and it will be again repeated if we ever again take off the duty on sugar, when we have enough land to raise what we need, and protection will keep our money in the country for circulation at home. [Applause on the Republican side.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD. I have some statistics which I would like to insert.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. JOHNSON] may be permitted to extend his remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from North Carolina asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. JOHNSON] may be permitted to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, I yield now to the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. HILLIARD].

Mr. HILLIARD. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. RAGSDALE].

Mr. RAGSDALE. Mr. Chairman, in view of the situation that now confronts this Nation, it seems to me any party would be justified in reversing almost any position it had previously taken in order to put an adequate sum in the Treasury of the country to put our Army and Navy in the condition they ought to be in order to properly defend the country in the crisis that now presents itself. This is purely an effort to create not protection but revenue, and the Democratic Party from time immemorial has been in favor of a tariff for revenue. We are not, therefore, taking any new position upon this proposition as to our general position upon the tariff A situation to-day confronts us and makes it necessary in view of conditions that exist at home and abroad to raise additional revenue that we may spend larger sums for the Army and Navy than have ever been expended in time of peace. Dangers threaten our citizens and commerce on the high seas, and brigands have invaded our country and murdered innocent women and children. To-day with an inadequate force we are defending our border and sending our Army into Mexico. The President demands a larger Army and Navy, and this Congress will give them to him, making necessary an increase in our revenues.

I am so strongly in favor of raising a sufficient sum to increase, arm, and equip our defensive forces on land and sea in order that they shall not be found inadequate if war should be declared either by Mexico or some European or Asiatic country that I will not only vote to retain this source of revenue, but I will gladly vote for a bond issue to give us the necessary funds that they may give us that measure of defense which our wealth, importance, and the abnormal conditions surrounding us justify.

Recently the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. KEATING] went out of his way to make, to my mind, an inexcusable and unjustifiable attack upon the people of my State for the way in which it handles the question of child labor. I desire to read now from an article in the Evening Mail newspaper of New York of March 11, 1916, by Rheta Childe Dorr:

The fiction that the farm is an ideal place for children to grow up has been unmasked more than once, but it still manages to maintain a respectable position in the minds of the sentimental. A farm may indeed be an abode of happiness for children, but it can just as easily be the exact reverse.

Revelations by the national child-labor committee of the toiling children of the Colorado sugar-beet fields is a good illustration of this. Colorado is proud of the fact that she produced more sugar beets than any other State in the Union. There is nothing to be proud of in the fact that the little hands of 5,000 children from 7 to 13 years of age helped to produce this wealth.

Colorado has a good child-labor law, but, like other laws, it fails to protect children in their homes. Thus, according to the committee's report, the number of children in the sugar mills is negligible. The young toilers work in their fathers' fields. They work long hours, at back-breaking labor, from the early spring until the crops are harvested in the late fall.

The work begins with thinning the beets as their first growth begins. Children 7 and 8 do this, bending over until their backs must ache excruciatingly. All summer they hoe and weed, and in the autumn help with the harvest, the heaviest work of all. Some of the details given by the committee are almost beyond belief. A girl of 10 is reported to have handled from 10 to 12 tons of beets in a day.

Most of these farmers are foreigners. They are poor, and they see in their beet fields the first opportunity of their lives to buy comfort and security for their old age. Some, however, are American citizens, and a few are wealthy. One of these men told a school-teacher that he made $10,000 a year. His boy, he said, was worth $1,000 a season to him in the beet fields, whereas if the boy went to school he was nothing but an expense.

The remedy for this horrible exploitation of children on the farm is good rural schools and rigid application of a compulsory education law. Moreover, the enforcement of the law should not be left to local districts, because too often school trustees are found among the child drivers.

The State must assume this responsibility. The State is the one power before which the enslaver of childhood stands disarmed, because the State is the overparent of all children, and the public school is their city of refuge.

Mr. Chairman, coming from the State of South Carolina, and being somewhat conversant with labor conditions that obtain there, I give it as my opinion that nowhere within the boundaries of that State are labor conditions anywhere near so bad as those described in this article, written by a stranger and published in a northern newspaper. It seems to me that the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. KEATING], instead of standing in the way of his party in this effort to put money into the Treasury of the United States, whereby we can increase the Army and Navy to the position where they can defend our country and flag, instead of opposing legislation that the leaders, from the President down, think expedient and necessary, could well turn his attention to the question of these child-labor conditions in Colorado. I think he should endeavor to relieve the condition there instead of going into other States and violating our rights by what we believe to be an unconstitutional law. If he would do so, I believe that he would find more honor at home and that he would more worthily represent his people, and do more for the people of our country, and the people of Colorado especially, that would merit their support and approval.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from South Carolina has expired.

By unanimous consent leave was granted to Mr. RAGSDALE to extend his remarks in the RECORD.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Chairman, I believe I have seven minutes remaining, and I yield the balance of my time to the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wyoming is recognized for seven minutes.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, after what we have witnessed and what we shall witness to-day let no man say that the age of miracles has passed, for behold the protectionist, the tariff-for-revenue advocate, and the free trader all join in the support of an important measure affecting the tariff and the revenues of the country. We on this side do not particularly care what you on the Democratic side label this act of legislation, on what theory you base, or with what arguments you fortify your support of the measure. The tremendously important fact is that we are about to provide by a practically unanimous vote for a reasonable, and we hope a sufficient, protective tariff on sugar. Far be it from me to embarass you gentlemen on the Democratic side in the performance of what I believe to be a real patriotic duty, by rudely emphasizing the rapid and marvelous change that has come over the spirit of your dreams and the character of your acts. As a matter of fact, as lightning-change artists you are still several laps behind your administration. [Applause on the Republican side.] Furthermore, I would not refer to your former vehement and frequent assertion in platforms and on the stump that the act which you are now about to take would be as wicked as unnecessary, except to emphasize the truth of that old familiar and hopeful refrain:

And while the lamp holds out to burn
The vilest sinner may return.

[Applause on the Republican side.]

It may not be out of the way in passing to refer to the fact that there are still a few, just a few, of the pledges of your last national platform that you have not up to this time specifically repudiated, and as there is very little time remaining I feel it my duty to call attention to that fact. [Laughter on the Republican side.] I am prepared now, in your behalf, to denounce as false any claim that may be made hereafter that you gentlemen are Bourbons who learn nothing, for behold here is abundant proof that even the Democratic Party can recognize the fact of a yawning and empty Treasury, even though you do not seem to be as thoroughly alive as we hoped you would be to the blessing of a protective tariff. I am so kindly disposed toward your present attitude that I am rather inclined to furnish you arguments in support of this belated acceptance on your part of the protective idea, although we realize that the acceptance is under the spur of a very urgent necessity for revenue.

You gentlemen have insisted that it is all on account of the European war. Let me suggest to you that it would be very much to the point if you were to argue that the European war has cast a tremendously illuminating light upon the imperative necessity of making this country absolutely independent for the essential articles of food and use of foreign peoples and foreign lands.

"Let the Nation do its own work" has long been the watchword of the protective idea. "Let the Nation be self-sufficient and self-supporting" may well be the rallying cry of a new protective economic industrial preparedness.

Sugar, which we can produce in abundance and which we will produce in ever increasing quantities now that the policy of the Nation touching that product is fixed by our action to-day, is the first fruit of the new, truly national consciousness of the necessity of protective duties, as an essential feature of national preparedness. A duty on dyestuffs should swiftly follow this enactment. Then wool, for which the dyes are needed, and which is an article of prime necessity in war and peace, should be promptly placed on a firm protective basis, followed by a variety of the products of the industry and the labor of the land.

Some of these things should and we hope may be done at this session or in this Congress, and then next year, when we take control of things on this side of the center aisle, the entire program of protective-economic preparedness will be carried out.

Of course, we shall regret to defeat you now that you are showing an inclination to learn and are coming to a more rational frame of mind; but we must, for, good as this beginning of yours is, we realize that it is taken under the coercion of necessity, and therefore the American people will not care to trust you for the completion of the job, for the correction of your faults in tariff tinkering.

The performance of that glorious and patriotic work the American people will on November next place in the hands of the Republican Party, and right promptly and thoroughly will we perform the inspiring duty placed upon us. [Applause on the Republican side.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wyoming asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman [applause on the Democratic side], it would seem to be the dawn of a brighter and a happier day for this Republic when you find men like the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LONGWORTH], the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. FORDNEY], and the other gentlemen on that side of the House voting on a tariff question like the good Democrats on this side. I appreciate the emotion of happiness and joy which fills the bosom of my friend from Ohio [Mr. LONGWORTH], and which he expressed yesterday, in living to see the day when Democrats and Republicans vote alike on a tariff question. The gentleman has been associating with Republicans for the last 25 years and no wonder he rejoices in being in respectable, honorable company for one time in his life. [Applause on the Democratic side.] It will be one of the proudest recollections of his life hereafter to reflect that on this day he voted just like the Democrats, and I am sure that he will appeal to his constituents in the coming campaign to vote for him because he is almost as good as a Democrat and will point to his action of this day as evidence of it. [Laughter.]

The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. COOPER] said yesterday that he thought free sugar was a time-honored principle of my party and twitted us for its apparent change of attitude in presenting this bill. He wanted the Members of the House to believe that he had always been for a tariff on sugar. I want to remind him and the committee that about the first vote he ever cast in this House he cast for free sugar. [Applause on the Democratic side.] If the Democratic Party ever committed itself to free sugar, and it looks like in the Underwood bill it did, it was following the example—and it may have been a doubtful one—of the gentleman and his party.

I can recall, and I know some of you older Republicans can, when it was the claim of the Republican Party that it was the only free-sugar party that ever existed in this country. In its campaign textbook of 1892 the Republicans boasted that they had given the country free sugar; that the Democrats were against free sugar. I remember, too, that the Republican campaign textbook of 1896 denounced the Democratic Party under Cleveland for putting a tariff on sugar, and called the attention of the people of this country to the fact that they, when they were in power, had given the country free sugar and had wiped out all the tariff on sugar. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Why, I see sitting in front of me my distinguished——

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Will the gentleman permit an interruption?

Mr. KITCHIN. I certainly will.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. At the time of which the gentleman speaks there had been no movement in this country, as I understand, for the establishment of the beet-sugar industry, but the machinations of the Sugar Trust so incensed the people of the country that the Republican Party, in the defense of the rights of the people, began the movement for the establishment of the beet-sugar industry, and I have voted consistently with my colleagues as a Republican ever since.

Mr. KITCHIN. You have voted consistently ever since the sugar refineries of the North and the beet-sugar interests of the West told you to vote that way. [Applause on the Democratic side.] I see in front of me my distinguished friend from Illinois [Mr. CANNON], ex-Speaker of the House. I know that he does not forget the time when he stood on this floor and demanded that every man who loved the American people, that every man who had a heartbeat for the laboring man, for the farmer, for the housewife, every man who had a desire to relieve the consumers of this country, ought to vote for free sugar and against any tariff on sugar.

Mr. CANNON. Tell all the story. [Laughter.]

Mr. KITCHIN. I am going to tell all the story. The gentleman from Illinois was in favor of free sugar for about six years thereafter, until the same influences that made the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. COOPER] change his position and vote for a high tariff on sugar captured him. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. CANNON. That is not all the story. There was a 2-cent bounty to protect the American interests.

Mr. KITCHIN. I am going to finish the story. The gentleman from Illinois says the reason that he favored and demanded free sugar was that there was a provision, or proposed provision, to put a 2-cent bounty on sugar. But here is what he said in a speech on the floor of the House at the time:

> My principal anxiety is to place sugar on the free list and relieve the people of this great burden of taxation. I will take that burden off, even at the expense of paying a bounty of 2 cents a pound for all the sugar produced in this country.

But he continued:

> We are for free sugar, with or without a bounty.

[Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. CANNON. It is a long time since that happened. I was for the bounty, and the bounty went into the law, but I made so many speeches in the House that I can not recollect everything that I said. I will get a microscope and hunt up my friend's record upon various questions, as he is about to make a record.

Mr. KITCHIN. That was in 1890. In 1894 the Democrats did repeal the bounty, and did put a tariff on sugar for revenue purposes, and the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] and the late distinguished gentleman from New York, Mr. Payne, author of the Payne Act, and the late distinguished gentleman from Maine, Mr. Dingley, the author of the Dingley Act, denounced the Democrats for attempting to put a tariff on sugar.

He declared that the free-sugar agitation began when the Mills bill of 1888 was pending, and that the Republicans then "made the best fight they could to place upon the free list this universal necessity," but the Democrats would not let them have free sugar.

Mr. CANNON. Will the gentleman allow me?

Mr. KITCHIN. I certainly will.

Mr. CANNON. It seems to me, in his remarks, he has now brought to the attention of the House the strongest possible reason for his change of opinion.

Mr. KITCHIN. The Democratic Party, gentlemen, never laid it down as a principle that sugar, or coffee, or tea, or other food products should be put on the free list. The only principle that we ever laid down was that whenever the Treasury conditions and revenue necessities permitted, the Democratic Party would put food products on the free list, preferring to tax other products, either by internal revenue—especially on luxuries—or by import duties. When we passed the Underwood Act, in 1913, providing for free sugar after May 1, 1916, we were convinced that by May 1, 1916, we would have sufficient revenue to let sugar go to the free list, and we calculated aright. We could not foresee this European war. We estimated that with the lower tariff rates of the Underwood Act there certainly would be at least as large an amount of importations, as large annual increase of importations, as there had been under the higher Payne Tariff Act.

Now, then, if under the Underwood Act importations had increased annually to the same extent as under the Payne Act during its existence we would have had, by reason of the increase of importations alone, more than $40,000,000 in addition, so that we could have given up the $44,000,000 that we received in the last fiscal year from the tariff on sugar and permitted sugar to go to the free list as provided. That was our contention. That is what we said on the floor of the House, and that is exactly what would have been done and could have been done but for the reduction of customs receipts on account of the European war.

I have heard many of you denounce the Underwood Act during this and the last Congress, but I have not heard a single Republican defend or champion the Payne Act. [Applause on the Democratic side.] You repudiated your own tariff act in the very first Congress following its enactment—indeed, the last session of the same Congress. Mr. Taft, at the very first opportunity after that act went on the statute books, promised the people to revise it, and you in the campaign following promised the people in your campaign textbook that you would help him do it.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield again?

Mr. KITCHEN. Yes.

Mr. CANNON. If the gentleman will allow me a single sentence, the Payne-Aldrich Act I approved of then, and I have never apologized for it since; and I would to God it was on the statute books now. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. KITCHIN. Then you are repudiating the platform of the Republican Party in 1912, because it promised in that platform to change it, to revise it, and declared that the Payne-Aldrich Tariff Act was too high and ought to be cut down. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

I will say to the gentleman from Illinois, every single member of his party here except one, as I recall, repudiated the Payne-Aldrich Act when in the Sixty-second Congress, the Congress following its enactment, it voted for the Hill wool bill as a substitute for Schedule K of that act. There was but one lone Republican in the House who refused to vote for the Hill substitute, and thus repudiate the Payne-Aldrich Act, and that was the distinguished standpatter from Michigan [Mr. FORDNEY].

Mr. FORDNEY. I am proud of it. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes; he is proud of it, and it takes less to make him proud than any man I ever saw. [Laughter and applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. I voted against it, too.

Mr. KITCHIN. I will tell you, my friend from Massachusetts, I know you think you voted against it, but——

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. I voted against it, and so did Butler Ames, of Massachusetts.

Mr. KITCHIN. I know what you are talking about. You are talking about the cotton bill, the Hill substitute cotton bill. You voted against that. You live at Fall River, the big cotton-mill center. You did not vote against the wool bill, because I called attention to it at the time, and the gentleman from Michigan knows, too, that I am correct when I say that he was the only man on that side that had the courage or audacity to stand upon this floor as an indorser of the Payne Act.

Mr. FORDNEY. No; the gentleman is mistaken.

Mr. KITCHIN. Did our good friend, Hon. DICK AUSTIN, vote against it? [Laughter.]

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes. The gentleman is mistaken.

Mr. KITCHIN. I was sitting back there when the vote was taken, and I saw all these Republicans get up in a body and vote in favor of that substitute bill repudiating the Payne Act. I was glad to see it. [Laughter.] It made an impression on my mind. I knew that their President had repudiated the bill a few months after it was signed, but when I saw the whole crowd of standpatters getting up over there and repudiating it I knew I was right. [Laughter.] When the vote was taken on that side there stood up against it my friend, Brother FORDNEY, solitary and alone, like the boy who "stood on the burning deck, whence all but him had fled." [Laughter.] I never will forget that. But when the vote on the Hill cotton bill, another repudiation of the Payne Act, was taken, only three Republicans—the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. AUSTIN] and the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. FORDNEY] and the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GREENE]—stood up against it.

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. And also Butler Ames.

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes; I believe he did. Yes; I believe there were four Republicans who voted that way on the cotton schedule substitute. Another instance of your repudiation of the Payne Act is the Canadian reciprocity bill, which changed and reduced the tariff rate on several hundred articles, which your President, Mr. Taft, sent to Congress demanding passage—the same Congress which had theretofore enacted the Payne bill. Republicans of the Ways and Means Committee favorably reported it. My friend from Connecticut [Mr. HILL], a member of that committee then, as he is now, made as good a so-called free-trade Democratic speech on that bill as ever I heard; and not only was the gentleman from Connecticut in favor of the Canadian reciprocity but he wanted to go it one better, and in May, 1912, he introduced a bill in Congress to put "fresh beef, veal, mutton, lamb, pork, and meats of all kinds"—the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. SLOAN] will take notice—to put your cattle products, hog products, and sheep products, and "meats of all kinds" absolutely on the free list. He was for repudiating the Payne Act good and strong.

I do not feel so bad or humiliated in having you gentlemen vote with me on the pending proposition. [Laughter.]

I am used to a little Republican company on tariff votes. I am sort of proud of some of this company I kept at the time of the passage of the Payne-Aldrich Act. [Laughter.] The new Members do not know this, and probably some older ones have forgotten it, but I want to tell you that some good Republicans on that side of the House repudiated the Payne Act before it reached the statute books, and voted against it just as I did, and just as other Democrats on this side of the House did. Why, let me show you some of this distinguished company. There is that champion defender of Republican policies, the gentleman from Wisconsin, my friend Mr. LENROOT. He was then a great progressive Republican. He can defend and does defend Republican policies, whether Progressive or standpat policies, with as much skill and ability as any man in or out of the House. He is one of the strongest champions in the House or the country of the Republican Party and its principles. He and myself voted just alike on the Payne-Aldrich Act. Both of us voted against it. The distinguished gentleman of Iowa [Mr. WOODS], the present chairman of the National Republican Congressional Committee, and I voted exactly alike on the Payne-Aldrich Act. Both of my Republican friends voted against it, because they knew that the Payne-Aldrich Act was a deliberate violation of the plain pledge of the Republican platform and the expressed promise of the Republican Party in the campaign of 1908. [Applause on Democratic side.]

That is pretty good Republican company, but I have still better. I remember that day when we stood up and when the yeas and nays were called I was standing shoulder to shoulder and my voice rang out in accord with the distinguished gentleman from Illinois, the able minority leader, Hon. JAMES R. MANN. [Applause on the Democratic side.] Yes; Mr. MANN, Mr. LENROOT, Mr. WOODS, and myself voted together that day in condemnation of the Payne-Aldrich Act. Mr. MANN knew that this act was a deliberate violation of the plain pledge which the Republican Party, in its platform and on the stump, had made to the people, and in good conscience and good manhood and good faith to the people he had to record his vote just as I recorded mine—against the Payne-Aldrich Act. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. Chairman, as I catch a glimpse of the genial countenance of my good friend from Washington [Mr. HUMPHREY] I am tempted to observe that we have on this occasion another reason for happiness, when we realize that it is possible for the gentleman to make a speech on this floor, as he did to-day, and not indulge in his old habit of calamity howling. I have heard him make more calamity speeches—I will not count them now, because I have not the time, but I think since the Underwood Tariff Act went on the statute books he has made—well, I guess, at least 39 speeches on this floor, whining and crying about the lumber industry and the shingle industry in Washington being ruined and destroyed by the Underwood tariff law. He sobbingly told us how the flood of Canadian shingles and Canadian lumber was drowning out these industries. When the Underwood Act had been in operation a few months I heard him make one of his characteristic, tear-flowing, calamity speeches, and he got me almost to shedding tears picturing how in 1914 thousands of honest, able-bodied men who under the Payne Act always had work to do were going about the streets of Seattle, his home city, and other lumber towns of the State of Washington, with no money, with no work, begging charity. This was the first time since the election of 1910 I saw Republicans in the House cheer. They almost went on top of their desks applauding and cheering the gentleman's speech. There is nothing in the world that makes a Republican rejoice more than to hear the story of men going about the streets without money, without work, begging, and their wives and children at home freezing and starving. [Laughter.]

But the gentlemen over here on this side were humane enough to feel and look, as I did, sad and distressed. But I got to reflecting that there was no use in wasting tears until I found out whether the gentleman's horrible tale was fact or fiction. I had heard him make so many calamity tariff talks, which almost moved me to tears, and afterwards found that there was so little fact and so much fancy in them, I decided before giving myself up to grief to make some investigation. And what were the facts? Why, I found that the city of Seattle, the home city of the gentleman, in the year of our Lord 1914, under the Underwood Act, enjoyed the greatest degree of prosperity in its whole history. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

The story of Seattle, the gentleman's home city, during the year 1914, under the Underwood Act and Wilson's administration, is an unfolding romance of progress and prosperity. In the year 1914, when, according to the imagination of my friend, her good people were wandering about her streets, begging bread and charity, the building permits of Seattle increased, in spite of five months of the European war, more than 35 per cent over the Payne Act year of 1913 [applause on the Democratic side]—the greatest building expansion in its history. Her coastwise and over-sea trade was larger than ever before. Her postal receipts increased in 1914 over 1913, $48,702.34. [Applause on the Democratic side.] I do not ask you to take my statement or that of any Democrat. I shall produce the testimony of Republican protectionists. I am going to quote from the American Lumberman, published in Chicago, a high protectionist, as the organ of the lumber interests in the United States, and from the West Coast Lumberman, a high protectionist, published in the gentleman's home city, Seattle, the organ of the lumber interests of the State of Washington and the Pacific coast. [Applause on the Democratic side.] I read from a special from Seattle, of date January 2, 1915, in the American Lumberman:

Building permits in Seattle for 1914 reached the total value of $12,664,970, and increased the record of 1913 by $3,343,855.

If the increase of the year had been as large proportionately as the average increase for June and July, the two last months of the Underwood Act, immediately preceding the breaking out of the European war, the increase in 1914 over 1913 Payne Act year would have been over 75 per cent. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

The West Coast Lumberman, of Seattle, in the issue of July 15, 1914, gives the amount of building permits of Seattle for June, 1913, as $897,310, and for June, 1914, $1,163,165; and in its issue of August 15, 1914, states that the permits in July, 1913, amounted to $1,414,620, while for July, 1914, they reached the sum of $2,520,590. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Let me quote again from the Seattle "special" to the American Lumberman:

Despite the war and the disappearance from the seas of the German craft and many French and English vessels, this port enjoyed the greatest prosperity in its history from its coastwise and over-sea trade.

[Applause on the Democratic side.]

As further evidence of Seattle's great progress and prosperity in 1914, it says:

The postal receipts in Seattle increased in 1914, over 1913, $48,702.24.

Mr. POWERS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KITCHIN. Just for a question; yes.

Mr. POWERS. The people in Seattle who were out of a job were writing home for money, and that increased the postal receipts.

Mr. KITCHIN. I do not see how those hungry, wandering people, out of a job, could be building all those houses there and have time to write home for money. [Laughter and applause on the Democratic side.]

Permit me here to relate a little amusing incident in the calamity-howling career of my distinguished friend from Washington [Mr. HUMPHREY]. He was in Washington City here, and not in Washington State, and he just fancied the distressing, deplorable condition which he pictured. The gentleman wanted to start a propaganda of calamity howling from his State. He wrote numberless letters, with return envelopes or cards inclosed, to the lumbermen and shingle men in Washington asking for a story of the depression and stagnation and ruin of the lumber and shingle industries under Democratic administration and the Underwood Act. Well, he got a lot of replies—now, did not you? [Laughter.] I have read many of them, but there was one that struck me particularly. One gentleman replied on the return postal card:

HUMPHREY, get a hump on you. Go to work and stop "hollering" calamity in the city of Washington. The State of Washington is all right.

[Applause and laughter on the Democratic side.]

The gentleman from Washington did not know what was going on in the State of Washington and in his city of Seattle under the Wilson administration and the Underwood Act. He did not know of the wonderful progress going on there. He had not been there in two years. Both administrations, with their long sessions and extra sessions, had kept him and all of us here.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. The gentleman has used his imagination to such an extent I wonder if he will permit me in a sentence to state a fact?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes; to state a fact. Why, for a Republican to state a fact on the tariff—yes; of course I will yield. [Laughter.]

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. I began by stating it is a fact, because I knew the gentleman would not recognize it unless I did. I will say to the gentleman for his information in regard to the shingle business which he has just been talking about, that the statistics which have just recently come in show that British Columbia, notwithstanding the fact that she is engaged in a great war and doing her part of it, increased her sales of lumber and shingles to the United States last year over 83 per cent; or, in other words, during the last month of 1915 more shingles came into this country from British Columbia than came in during the whole of the last year of the Payne tariff.

Mr. KITCHIN. I want to ask this question: Did not the shingle association of your State in 1914 declare that one of the reasons which caused the importation of shingles into the United States from Canada was that Canadian mills made a better shingle, and is it not a fact that shingles in Canada sell for from 25 to 40 cents more per thousand than shingles made in your State?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. I know where the gentleman got his statement; it came from a report made by the representatives of the Department of Commerce sent out there to investigate.

Mr. KITCHIN. Oh, no; I got it out of the West Coast Lumberman, published in your city, the organ of the lumber interests in Washington and the Pacific Coast States. In its issue of June 1, 1914, it states that Canadian or British Columbian shingles are selling from 25 to 40 cents a thousand more than the Washington shingles. Why? Because they make a superior shingle. In the same issue in an article by a big shingle manufacturer it is admitted that the shingle of British Columbia is superior to the Washington shingle.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. The gentleman is mistaken; they do not make a better shingle, and I think the gentleman from North Carolina ought not to cast reflection on the American workingman, for there are none better than the American workingmen. I do not think he ought to make the assertion that they can not make as good shingles as the Chinaman who works making shingles in British Columbia. Now, will the gentleman permit me one more statement. The shingle business in the State of Washington is much better than it was a year ago, and much better than it was two years ago, but not nearly up to normal. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. FORDNEY], and others will corroborate what I say, that the wages today in the shingle mills in my State are only two-thirds of what they were when the Underwood law went upon the statute book.

Mr. KITCHIN. The organs of the lumber and shingle interests do not agree with the gentleman. There are more, and certainly larger, shingle mills in Washington to-day than at any other time under the Payne tariff act, and they are paying good wages.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. But one-third of them are not running.

Mr. KITCHIN. Oh, but the gentleman said in Washington the industry was much better now than it was a year ago, and much better than it was in 1914. Now, let us see how it was in 1914 according to the testimony of the West Coast Lumberman, the organ of the shingle and lumber industry in the gentleman's State, and published in his city; and the testimony of the American Lumberman, the organ of the lumber and shingle industry of the United States. He was here tearing his throat "hollering" calamity and did not know what was going on out there. [Laughter.]

From the West Coast Lumberman, published in Seattle, of July 1, 1914, I quote:

The coast shingle market has stiffened perceptibly. Mill prices have lifted.

A special from Everett, Wash., the biggest shingle-mill town, to the Lumberman:

Shingle situation improved.
It will not be long before Everett shingle production will reach a new high-water mark.

And this under the Underwood Act. [Laughter.]

Again—

The Jameson Mill Co.'s new shingle mill at Everett was turned over for the first time Tuesday, June 23—a 10-hour output of 800,000 shingles.

[Applause on the Democratic side.]

That is the second largest shingle mill in the United States, is it not?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. It is the largest.

Mr. KITCHIN. Under the Underwood Tariff Act there was built in the State of Washington the largest shingle mill in the United States!

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KITCHIN. Oh, let me get through with this good testimony.

Special from Ballard, Wash., same issue: McDowells Lumber Co. mill at Ballard greatly enlarging capacity of its shingle mill. It will have nearly one-half million output daily.

From its issue of July 15, 1914:

Every shingle mill at Ballard in full operation. The new shingle mill of Chester Snow Log & Shingle Co., at Littell, is running at full capacity and outlook bright.

And this, too, in July, 1914, after the Underwood Act had been in operation 9 or 10 months in the State of this distinguished calamity howler. [Laughter.]

And yet the gentleman from Washington has been begging and crying around here for two years to get Democrats and Republicans to help save the shingle mill industry from being ruined by the Underwood Act!

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KITCHIN. Let me get through; this is too good to stop now. [Laughter.]

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. I will give you something equally as good.

Mr. KITCHIN. I am going to yield to the gentleman in a minute. I read again:

New shingle mill just built at Bolch, 90,000 daily capacity. Mr. Hartman established a record in the construction of this mill, finishing it in 29½ days after starting.

The shingle industry was so good in Washington that a new record for building mills had been made—from start to finish in 29 days, working with a daily output of 90,000 shingles. They wanted to hurry up and get some of the good prosperity under the Underwood Act that was going on. [Laughter.]

This is not all. In the July 1, 1914, issue:

The new plant of the Wabash Lumber & Shingle Co., at Tono, Wash., is operating in full force. New shingle mill at Mays, Wash., of 90,000 daily capacity is being built. A new shingle mill to be built at Lebam, Wash. Increase of output daily 400,000 shingles.

Bellingham, Wash., special—July 11—to the American Lumberman of July 18, 1914: "Shingle mills are opening."

You see they had all been closed down for the Fourth of July holidays to celebrate the virtues and blessings of the Underwood Tariff Act. [Laughter.]

And further, from the West Coast Lumberman, of June 15, 1914:

Everett, Wash., special: C. & B. Shingle Co.'s new mill started operation to-day. Exclusively shingle production. Daily capacity, 400,000.

And—

The new mill of the Cobolis Lumber Co., at Carlisle, Wash., is now in active operation. Plans for the mill just built calls for capacity of 150,000 feet of lumber and 350,000 shingles per day.

And further—

The new mill of the Johnson & Dean Lumber Co., above Granite Falls, Wash., will start operation about July 1. Daily capacity, about 400,000 shingles.

Hoquiam special: The Panama & Eastern Lumber Co. will soon begin on its new saw and shingle mill.

But, gentlemen, such good [illegible]ts are not confined to the gentleman's State. It did not have a monopoly of the shingle industry growth. According to these organs of the lumber and shingle industry the same conditions prevailed in the other far West States.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Mr. Chairman, before the gentleman leaves my State I wish he would yield to me. I do not want to extend my jurisdiction.

Mr. KITCHIN. Very well.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. I do not know that this has a great deal to do with sugar, but the gentleman seems to want to pursue it. The gentleman referred to the shingle mill at Everett—the Jameson mill—which is the largest shingle mill in the world. It was established and opened just at the time the gentleman says it was, but there is another chapter to that, and I can tell that in about three sentences.

Mr. KITCHIN. Oh, the gentleman can extend that in the RECORD.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. No; I want to answer the gentleman. He mentioned Mr. Jameson.

Mr. KITCHIN. I have not the time to yield for a speech. Do not these organs of the shingle industry report the true condition of the industry?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. No; they do not, as conditions exist now; and the gentleman ought not to refuse to yield at this time.

Mr. KITCHIN. I have said that I was not testifying on my own responsibility. I am relying on the testimony of the organs of the shingle-mill industry.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Mr. Jameson is one of the largest shingle manufacturers in my State and a man of high standing, and I do not think the gentleman desires to misrepresent him.

Mr. KITCHIN. I do not desire to misrepresent him.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. I will give what I desire to say to the gentleman in about three sentences. After that report from the Department of Commerce came out, and after he started that mill, Mr. Jameson came here to the city of Washington, and he asked me and the other members of the delegation from that State if we would not go over with him to see the Secretary of Commerce. We went over, and he told the Secretary of Commerce that unless the tariff was restored on shingles he would eventually be compelled to close his mill. He said, "I have found out that I was mistaken; I am losing money every day." The distinguished Secretary of Commerce then made this statement, "There will be no revision of the tariff under this administration." It seems to me that somebody has changed his attitude or changed the attitude of the Democratic Party since then. [Laughter and applause on the Republican side.] That is the history of the Jameson matter.

Mr. KITCHIN. Of course, what I said of Mr. Jameson or his mill was not of my own knowledge, nor did I take it from the report to which the gentleman refers. I quoted from the West Coast Lumberman. His mill is and was making more shingles than any mill in the world, according to this organ, and he has not closed down his mill yet.

I believe I have given some evidence at least that the shingle business in Washington under the Wilson administration and the Underwood Act was not so bad as the gentleman from Washington pictured it to the House.

Now, let us see if the lumber industry in Washington was so depressed and ruined as the gentleman has so often told us. I shall call upon these same organs of the lumber interests to testify. I begin with the West Coast Lumberman, as I have before said, the special organ of the lumber industry in the State of Washington and the Pacific Coast States, published in Seattle—be it remembered—the gentleman's home city, and a high protectionist. From the June, July, and August, 1914, issues—editorials and specials from various lumber-mill towns and cities in Washington:

Spokane (June 15 issue):

Several large mills running full capacity and others would increase operations if they could get logs. More orders than they can fill.

Nothing the matter in Spokane under the Underwood Act and Wilson administration. We are piling up orders on them.

And again:

A pulp, paper, and lumber company organized with a capital of $4,000,000.

They are shuffling out the money for lumber mills under the Underwood Act.

And another special from Spokane (July 15, 1914, issue):

At the present time the situation is generally believed by lumber manufacturers to be the best in the last two years.

[Applause on Democratic side.]

Better under the Underwood Act and Wilson's administration than under the Payne Act and Taft's administration, says this special.

Morton special (July 15 issue):

Large new sawmill being built at Morton.

Everett special (July 1 issue):

So far as volume is concerned, Everett lumber manufacturers have no complaint to offer.

Love special (July 15 issue):

J. L. Rogers and W. P. Frost, of Spokane, are building new sawmill at Love, Wash.

Wallula special (July 1 issue):

Big sawmill to be built at Wallula.

Everett special (June 15, 1914, issue):

Both the lumber and shingle situation in Everett is decidedly stronger. * * *

It has been a long time since Everett lumber mills have been supplied with orders as they are now. In fact, one prominent manufacturer said to-day that he rarely has seen it so easy to get business as right now.

And all under Wilson's administration and the Underwood Act, which are keeping the Everett mills full of orders.

From the same issue of the West Coast Lumberman:

Snowqualmie Falls Lumber Co., of Seattle, will build a big new sawmill near Snowqualmie. The company recently incorporated with a capital of $3,000,000. * * *

The Goodyear Logging Co., of Seattle, recently incorporated with $200,000.

Plenty of money in Seattle under the Underwood Act for building lumber mills. I have not time to quote more from this journal, published in the gentleman's home city.

Let me now produce my other witness, the American Lumberman, the general organ of the lumber industry in the United States—a high protectionist—and see what it says of the lumber situation in the State of Washington under Wilson's administration and the Underwood Act prior to the European war.

Spokane special (July 18, 1914, issue):

Lumber business good, though this is the usual dull period.

Good under the Underwood Act, but dull at this period, of course, under the Payne Act.

Bellingham special (same issue):

Cargo shipping of lumber still brisk.

All the lumber mills at Bellingham, Blaine, and Anacortes are running full capacity, as are the interior mills.

Mount Vernon special:

New sawmill of the Stock Bros. Lumber Co. will be operating here in a short time.

Centralia special:

R. M. Shover is rebuilding his sawmill, which was burned—larger and more modern.

Mills are running full capacity.

Other Spokane specials, same issue:

Despite the fact that this is the time of the year when lumber buying is at a low ebb, considerable amount of stock has been moving from the mills of local territory.

And again, July 11, 1914, issue:

The increase in demand for lumber during the last few months has caused many inland empire mills to make extensions in their facilities.

I have two or three quotations from these two organs, to which I direct the special attention of the gentleman from Washington and of the House.

One is a special from Everett to the American Lumberman of August 1, 1914, from which I read:

A review of the employment situation in Everett shows that more men are employed in manufacturing industries than ever before in the history of the city.

One from Spokane to the West Coast Lumberman of June 15, 1914:

Lumber shipments by the Western Pine Manufacturing Association, as reported by Secretary A. W. Cook, are running higher than during the same period a year ago.

Now note:

Several mills in this section have recently added night shifts, and at the present time none of the larger mills is idle.

And a Seattle special, of date July 11, to American Lumberman of July 18, 1914:

Many of the mills closed only for a few days for July 4, and practically all will resume in a few days—

Though, as it further shows—

The usual shutdown is from six weeks to two months.

[Applause on the Democratic side.]

Under Wilson's administration and the Underwood Act new million-dollar mill plants were built, old mills enlarged their capacities, labor was employed. So great a prosperity did we send to the lumber industry in the State of Washington we put them to working at nights, and in the town of Seattle, the gentleman's home city, while under the Payne Act and Taft's administration the usual shutdown for July the 4th was from six weeks to two months, under the Underwood Act and Wilson's administration they were so busy that they only shut down from a few days to two weeks. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

No wonder that gentleman wrote back to my friend HUMPHREY, "HUMPHREY, get a hump on you and stop hollering calamity. The State of Washington is all right." [Laughter on the Democratic side.]

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KITCHIN. No; not now.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman declines to yield.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. I would like to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. KITCHIN. I will let the gentleman do it before I get through.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman declines to yield.

Mr. KITCHIN. I have just found out why some men are kept in Congress. This continuous calamity howling, such as my friend indulges in, gives their busy, prosperous constituents the jimjams, and so, to get them out of the way, they send them here to the House of Representatives to palm it off on us, where they think we are paid to listen to them. [Laughter on the Democratic side.]

I wish to say again to the gentleman from Washington and to the House that what I have said about the shingle mills and the lumber mills in the State of Washington is not my own testimony. I know nothing about the facts. I never went there. I am just stating the facts as reported in the high-protection organs of these industries, the American Lumberman and the West Coast Lumberman. The gentleman was not alone in his calamity agitation as to the industries of his State. Other gentlemen here and elsewhere have joined in in behalf of the industries in their States. Take, for instance, the textiles. They, or rather the protectionist politicians, have made the same complaint, raised the same cry of ruin and distress, as to these industries that the gentleman from Washington has made in regard to the lumber and shingle industries, and with just as little, or less, foundation of fact. What is true of the lumber and shingle industries in Washington and the far West I could show, if I had the time, is true of the cotton and woolen industries of the country during the 8 or 10 months of the operation of the Underwood Act preceding the European war. In fact, these were more prosperous than the lumber and shingle business. I see Brother HILL smiling over there; but it is the fact, just the same.

I hope some time to convince my friend from Connecticut [Mr. HILL] and my friend from Massachusetts [Mr. GREENE] of the truth of this statement—I have the evidence, and I trust I can get the opportunity later on in the House to produce it—that under the Underwood Act, which reduced the tariff rates in the woolen schedule more than in any other, the woolen industries of this country were employing more labor and running more machinery and turning out more products in June and July, the two months immediately preceding the European war, than any other June or July in the history of the woolen industry in this country. [Applause on the Democratic side.] I make this statement to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GREENE], who lives in Fall River, the great cotton-mill city, that, though the Underwood Act cut to the bone the rates of the cotton schedule, in June and July, the two months immediately preceding the European war, there were more labor employed, more machinery running, and more cotton spindles operating in the United States by over 500,000 than ever before in any June and July in the history of the cotton-mill industry of the United States. [Applause on the Democratic side.] I have not much time left, but I want to refer——

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. KITCHIN. If the gentleman will promise to take only one minute.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. I will promise only to take one minute, and the gentleman can look at the clock if he desires to do so.

Mr. KITCHIN. All right, go ahead.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Here is the one minute:

If Congress should attempt to change the tariff provisions relating to the sugar or any other item in the present tariff law, President Wilson would veto the measure in whatever form it might appear. I talked with the President to-day—

Representative OSCAR W. UNDERWOOD, June 10, 1914. What does the gentleman say as to that?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes; the President would have the right under the then conditions to veto such a bill, of course.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KITCHIN. The gentleman is from Washington, too? [Laughter on the Democratic side.]

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Yes.

Mr. KITCHIN. The gentleman ought to know, then, I am telling the truth.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I only desire to say that the lumber and shingle business in the district which I have the honor to represent has been down for the past two years——

Mr. KITCHIN. Is the gentleman from Bellingham?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I am from Hoquiam, the city in which the Panama-Eastern mill, spoken of by the gentleman, has been built, and I will take an oath business has been off over 40 per cent since the Underwood Tariff Act went into effect. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. KITCHIN. Then these protection organs of the lumber and shingle interests from which I have quoted controvert what the gentleman says. How does that happen?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Does the gentleman blame the newspapers and business men out there for trying to keep up a face and make the wheels go round? [Laughter on the Democratic side.] They are entitled to hold up their face if they can in the face of this law.

Mr. KITCHIN. The gentleman has a lumber industry?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Yes; a great distressed and suffering industry.

Mr. KITCHIN. All right. Why, the lumber industry can not be depressed on account of the Underwood Act, because before the European war began under this act 50,000,000 feet less lumber came in from Canada and other countries than during the last year the Payne Act or the first year of the Payne Act, and 100,000,000 less than in 1912 under the Payne Act. [Applause on the Democratic side.] And I venture to say to the distinguished gentleman that he did not pay much attention to the lumber industry, and that he has simply got this calamity howling from my distinguished friend from Seattle. Now, I do not believe——

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KITCHIN. I do not believe that the gentleman and my friend from Seattle got together and entered into a conspiracy to calamity howl, but I suppose the gentleman caught it from him. [Laughter.]

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I have paid just enough attention to be very sure that the remarks made by the gentleman on the lumber industry will be the best campaign argument for the Republican Party in the Northwest. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. KITCHIN. The gentleman from Washington knows my fondness and admiration of him. He is a gentleman of high character, integrity, patriotism, and ability; he is as genial and courteous and lovable as any man in this House. We all recognize this, but he has the poorest memory of any man I ever saw, and he does not know the facts, and can not tell fact from fancy. I am only impeaching the gentleman's knowledge of and intimacy with facts.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I am impeaching the gentleman's knowledge of the lumber and shingle industry in the State of Washington under the Underwood bill. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. KITCHIN. All right, let us see about that. The gentleman lives at Hoquiam, in the Aberdeen lumber section. Here is a Hoquiam special to the West Coast Lumberman of August 15, 1914:

Actual work about to begin on the new mill of the Panama Eastern Lumber Co. Daily capacity, 100,000 feet of lumber and 150,000 shingles.

Another special from Aberdeen and Hoquiam to the American Lumberman of August 1, 1914:

In lumber market decidedly improved. In June water shipments above normal. Lumbermen say that indications for July are for heavy shipments by water and more than an average shipment by rail.

And another to the West Coast Lumberman:

All of the mills report heavy business!

[Applause on the Democratic side.]

Before my time expires, this being my first good opportunity, I desire to refer to the speech of the distinguished gentleman from Michigan [Mr. FORDNEY] made in the House on January 12 in reply to a speech made by me on December the 16th, last. I willingly pay him the compliment by saying that it was as good an argument as I have heard from that side, and the best reply that could be made. It is the only speech I have heard in several years in the House that really made the Republicans feel good and proud. After the conclusion, he walked out amid applause and handshaking and embraces of his colleagues, because he had proved, as he and they thought, that the majority leader had attempted to deceive the House by manipulating and juggling figures in order to discredit the Payne Act, and to boost up, as he said, the Underwood Act.

I declared in the speech of December 16, in answer to the persistent charge by the Republicans here and elsewhere that the Underwood Act had proved a failure as a revenue producer, that the Underwood Act for the time that it had been in operation, from October, 1913, to August 1, 1914, the date of the breaking out of the European war, had produced over $10,000,000 more revenue than the Payne Act for the same months in any year of its existence; that from January 1, to August 1, 1914, the Underwood Act, with its customs receipts and income tax, produced in round numbers $18,000,000 more revenue than the Payne Act, with its customs receipts and corporation tax, for the same months the preceding or any other year during its enactment. I gave the figures in detail in corroboration of that declaration. The gentleman from Michigan did not dispute that statement, because he could not. I could have, with truth, declared, as I do now, that for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1914, nine months of which were under the Underwood Act, the amount of ordinary revenue receipts was over $10,000,000 more than in any fiscal year in the history of the Government; and that the amount of all receipts was $33,000,000 more than ever before. The gentleman can not dispute that statement. Here are the figures of record for the four years of the Payne Act, and the fiscal year 1914:

In 1910 total amount of ordinary revenue receipts was	$675, 511, 000
In 1911 total amount of ordinary revenue receipts was	701, 372, 000
In 1912 total amount of ordinary revenue receipts was	691, 778, 000
In 1913 total amount of ordinary revenue receipts was	724, 111, 000

But in 1914 the total amount was $734,673,000, an excess of $10,563,000 over the best year of the Payne Act, and an excess of $36,480,000 over the average annual amount of the four years of the Payne Act.

Here is the record of all receipts for the same years:

In 1910 the amount of all receipts was	$899, 640, 000
In 1911 the amount of all receipts was	962, 610, 000
In 1912 the amount of all receipts was	972, 170, 000
In 1913 the amount of all receipts was	992, 660, 000

But in 1914 the amount was $1,025,726,000, an excess of $33,000,000 over the best year of the Payne Act, and an excess of $68,956,000 over the average annual amount of the four years of the Payne Act. It should be remembered, too, that included in the amount for 1911 is $18,102,000 of canal-bond proceeds and in the amount for 1912 is $33,189,000 of such proceeds, but in the amount for 1914 there is not a dollar of receipts from canal bonds.

In answer to the charge often made here and elsewhere by our Republican friends that the Wilson administration and Underwood Act had drained the Treasury of its gold, I declared that the gold balances, exclusive of the $150,000,000 gold reserve redemption fund, was over $10,000,000 more on August 1, 1914, under Wilson's administration and the Underwood Act, than on August 1 of any year of the Taft term. I gave the figures of record in detail in corroboration of that declaration. The gentleman from Michigan did not and could not dispute that statement.

In answer to the oft-repeated charge of the Republicans here and elsewhere that the Wilson administration and Underwood Act had caused deficits and had largely reduced the general-balance fund in the Treasury, I further declared that, exclusive of the proceeds of canal bonds, on the 1st day of August, 1914, the date of the outbreak of the European war, under Wilson's administration and the Underwood Act, the general-fund balance in the Treasury was $15,000,000 more than on the 1st day of August in any year of the four years of Taft's administration. I gave the figures of record in detail in corroboration of that declaration. The gentleman from Michigan did not and could not dispute that statement. I said, as is shown by the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, that "on August 1, 1914, we had a larger general-fund balance in the Treasury by over $15,000,000 than you had on the 1st day of August in any year of the four years of Taft's administration," which was absolutely true. All these balances included the national-bank redemption fund.

But while giving the amounts for each "August 1 of the four years of Taft's administration" and for August 1, 1914, of the Wilson administration and Underwood Act, I also gave the amount for August 1, 1913, which, remember, was not of Taft's term, but of Wilson's term, and therefore unnecessary to sustain the truth of my statement and contention. The amount for August 1, 1914, I gave as $158,384,000 and for August 1, 1913, $131,454,000.

It turned out that in the amount for August 1, 1914, as it was in each of the four years of Taft's administration, the national-bank redemption fund then held by the Treasury was included or added, not by me but by an honest, efficient Republican official in the Treasury Department, while in the amount given for August 1, 1913, the redemption fund was not included, but deducted, not by me but by this official. In informing me of the general-fund balance for August 1, 1913, he doubtless overlooked the fact that in preparing for me the former statement of the balances for August 1 of the other five years he had included or added the redemption fund to the general balances, as had been the custom of all administrations since 1890, until the Wilson administration. The gentleman from Michigan seized upon this to hold up his hands in holy horror and declare that the "majority leader" had juggled figures, and thereby attempted to mislead the House and the country. He failed to tell the House that the national-bank redemption fund was included or added in the amount for each "of the four years of Taft's administration," as well as in the amount for the one year, August 1, 1914, under Wilson's administration and the Underwood Act, the years for which I was making comparison. He failed to tell the House that in each of these "four years of Taft's administration" the redemption fund which was added, thereby swelling the general-fund balance, was from $8,000,000 to $15,000,000 more than the redemption fund which was added to the August 1, 1914, general balance under the Wilson administration.

He failed also to remind the House that the amount given by me for August 1, 1913, against which he protested because the redemption fund was not included, was under Wilson's and not Taft's administration. He said that if I had deducted the redemption fund of $15,642,000, which was included in the August 1, 1914, general fund balance, it would have been $142,742,000 instead of $158,384,000, and there would not have been such a difference between the amounts on August 1, 1913, and August 1, 1914. This is true. What consolation is it to him to compare August 1, 1913, with August 1, 1914, when both were of the Wilson administration? It is true that the Payne Act was in force on August 1, 1913, and that the balance fund was many millions larger than in any year of the Payne Act while Taft was President. This is a compliment to the Wilson administration. It shows that his administration managed the affairs of the Government and enforced the laws, even the Republican tariff and corporation-tax act, so wisely, honestly, and efficiently that it ran up the general balance to the highest mark it had reached under the Payne Act.

But he said that I should have deducted from the August 1, 1914, amount the $12,535,000 proceeds of the sale of the two battleships to Greece, which was included or added by the Treasury statement, not by me, and further said that I should have deducted from the balances given for each of the five years the amount of the national bank redemption fund, as was done for August 1, 1913. Although by an act in 1890 the inclusion of the redemption fund is authorized—and it was included in the years mentioned, that is, up to August 1, 1913, not by me but by the Treasury officials—I agree with the gentleman that it should properly be deducted, as then the net balance of the general fund would be shown. Now, gentlemen, deducting the redemption fund, as in my opinion it ought to be, and the ship money, the fact is that instead of having on August 1, 1914, under Wilson's administration and Underwood Act $15,000,000 larger balance fund than on any August 1 of the four years of the Taft administration, exclusive of canal bonds proceeds, as I asserted in my former speech, we had a larger general-balance fund by over $24,000,000 than there was on any August 1 of the four years of Taft's administration. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Let me astound the gentleman and the House by giving the record figures:

Aug. 1, 1914:
Balance in general fund (Wilson administration and Underwood Act)	$158,384,000
Less ship proceeds	12,535,000
Total	145,849,000
Less national-bank redemption fund	15,642,000
Net balance	130,207,000
Aug. 1, 1912:
Balance (less bonds, $33,189,000)	128,655,000
Less national-bank redemption fund	23,051,000
Net balance	105,605,000
Aug. 1, 1911:
Balance (less bonds, $18,102,000)	134,952,000
Less national-bank redemption fund	31,358,000
Net balance	103,594,000
Aug. 1, 1910:
Balance	91,999,000
Less national-bank redemption fund	27,557,000
Net balance	64,442,000
Aug. 1, 1909:
Balance	107,520,000
Less national-bank redemption fund	26,806,000
Net balance	80,714,000
Excess of Aug. 1, 1914 (Wilson's administration and Underwood Act), over Aug. 1, 1912	24,602,000
Excess of Aug. 1, 1914 (Wilson's administration and Underwood Act), over Aug. 1, 1911	26,613,000
Excess of Aug. 1, 1914 (Wilson's administration and Underwood Act), over Aug. 1, 1910	65,765,000
Excess of Aug. 1, 1914 (Wilson's administration and Underwood Act), over Aug. 1, 1909	49,493,000

So the general balance fund was $24,602,000 larger on August 1; 1914, under Wilson's administration and the Underwood Act than on August 1 of any year of Taft's entire term. Remember there is no ship money and no redemption fund in this. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Now, if we take the amounts of the general balance fund on June 30, at the end of each fiscal year under Taft's administration, and compare them with the amount on June 30, 1914, under Wilson's administration and Underwood Act, with no ship money included—as this was paid in the July following—and with no redemption fund added, the general balance fund in the Treasury on June 30, 1914, was larger by over $37,000,000 than in any year of the Taft administration. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

I read the figures of record:

June 30, 1912:
Balance, less national-bank redemption fund	$141,552,000
Less canal bonds	33,189,000
Net balance	108,363,000
June 30, 1911:
Balance, less national-bank redemption fund	105,040,000
Less canal bonds	18,102,000
Net balance	86,938,000
June 30, 1910, net balance, less national-bank redemption fund	72,586,000
June 30, 1909, net balance, less canal bonds and national-bank redemption fund	65,203,000
But June 30, 1914, under Wilson administration and Underwood Act the net balance was	145,835,000
Excess of June 30, 1914 (Wilson administration and Underwood Act), over June 30, 1912	37,472,000
Excess of June 30, 1914 (Wilson administration and Underwood Act), over June 30, 1911	58,897,000
Excess of June 30, 1914 (Wilson administration and Underwood Act), over June 30, 1910	$73,249,000
Excess of June 30, 1914 (Wilson administration and Underwood Act), over June 30, 1909	80,632,000

An excess of $37,472,000 of Wilson's administration and Underwood Act, over the best year of the Taft administration, and no ship money and no redemption fund included! [Applause on the Democratic side.]

In further answer to the unfounded charge that the Wilson administration and the Underwood Act had caused deficits in the Treasury, I asserted that, excluding the Civil War period, the three largest fiscal year deficits of ordinary receipts and disbursements in the history of the Government occurred while Republican tariff acts were on the statute books. In 1894, under the McKinley Act, the deficit was $69,000,000; in 1899, under the Dingley Act, the deficit was $89,000,000; in 1909, again under the Dingley Act, and Taft President, the deficit was $58,000,000.

The gentleman from Michigan did not and could not dispute that statement.

I could with truth have declared, as I do now, that, exclusive of the Civil War period, the four largest deficits of all receipts and disbursements in the history of the Government occurred under Republican administrations and tariff acts.

In 1880 the deficit was	$141,485,000
In 1898 the deficit was	61,948,000
In 1904 the deficit was	66,634,000
In 1909 the deficit was	118,795,000

I remind the House that, while the deficit of 1909 was the second to the largest we have ever had, in the receipts of that year are included proceeds of canal bonds, amounting to $30,731,000, without which the deficit was $149,526,000.

Here are other deficits under Republican administrations and tariff acts:

In 1908 the deficit was $26,890,000, and in the receipts of that year are included $25,367,000 proceeds of canal bonds, without which the deficit was $52,257,000.

In 1910 the deficit was $19,480,000.

In 1912, exclusive of canal-bond receipts, the deficit was $6,214,000.

The total deficits—that is, the difference between all receipts and all disbursements—from 1908 to 1913, inclusive, under Republican administrations and tariff acts were $101,270,000, and without the canal-bonds proceeds were $208,660,000.

But at the end of the fiscal year June 30, 1914, prior to the outbreak of the European war, under Wilson's administration and the Underwood Act, there were both a surplus of ordinary receipts over ordinary disbursements, and a surplus of all receipts over all disbursements, without the aid of a dollar of canal bonds, though we expended out of our revenue receipts on the Panama Canal $34,826,941.

The gentleman from Michigan declared that, in giving the deficits or surplus on August 1 for each of the Taft four years and August 1, 1914, Wilson's administration, I attempted to mislead the House and the country into the belief that I was comparing a 12 months' period. He then quotes 15 or 20 lines of my speech. What he quoted would make that impression—so he quoted that. He omitted the two sentences immediately preceding, which made plain that I referred only to that part of the new fiscal year, from July 1 to the 1st day of August, 1914, inclusive. We all knew the preceding fiscal year ended June 30, 1914, and the new fiscal year began July 1.

The war in Europe broke out August 1, 1914, 10 months after the passage of the Underwood Act. I was comparing the surplus and deficits of ordinary receipts and disbursements of the fiscal year up to that date with those of the same date of each of the preceding years under Taft's administration and the Payne Act. I wanted the House and the country to know exactly how the books stood on that date. The gentleman charged that I had resorted to cunning and manipulation of figures as to these deficits, and asserted that for August 1, 1914, I had included $12,535,000, proceeds of the sale of the two battleships to Greece, in order to make the surplus for August 1, 1914.

This is exactly what I said, and the RECORD shows it:

> I at once remind the House and the country that August 1, 1914—the date of the outbreak of the European war—under Woodrow Wilson's administration and the Underwood Act, was the first August 1 in five years when the books of the Treasury Department showed an actual surplus of ordinary receipts over ordinary disbursements.

I then gave the figures in detail for each August 1st. I have before me now, as I had then, the books containing the Treasury statements showing on each August 1st of the years in comparison the deficits and surplus. What I stated then and the figures I gave are in exact accordance with the books and the statement of the department.

It gives the amount of customs receipts so much, income and corporation tax so much, internal revenue so much, and miscellaneous receipts so much, and below this the disbursements are given, then the balance is struck, showing the surplus and deficits from the beginning of the fiscal year up to and including that day. No mention, no intimation, in any way, is made in this statement by the department for August 1, 1914, of the proceeds of the battleships. I followed the language of the Treasury books and statements. The gentleman who keeps these books and makes out these Treasury statements is as honorable, capable, and efficient a man as there is in the Treasury Department, and, after such a description of him, you will be surprised to learn that he is a life-long Republican. [Laughter.] The proceeds of the battleships were, I understand, included in the "miscellaneous receipts" amount, though, as I have said, no mention of it was made in the Treasury statement, and they were properly so included. I never stopped to inquire what different items constituted the "miscellaneous receipts" for August 1, 1914. Nor did I inquire what different items constituted the "miscellaneous receipts" of the several years of the Taft administration which were under review. I have since ascertained that there were many unusual, extraordinary items. For instance, in the fiscal year 1911, there are about $10,000,000 of unusual, extraordinary items contained in the "miscellaneous receipts," all of which I gave credit without question. I gave the facts and figures exactly as the books showed them to be.

Mr. HILL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from North Carolina yield to the gentleman from Connecticut?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes.

Mr. HILL. If the gentleman will pardon me, I think it is a very natural mistake, and should not be criticized. My recollection is that it was during the month of July, 1914, that the receipts from the battleships came in.

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes. If any mistake was made, it was because of the way the books were kept by this good, honest Republican. However, the books and statements were kept properly. These proceeds should have gone into the miscellaneous receipts. I quoted exactly from the statement. But even if you deduct the battleship proceeds, we had on August 1, 1914, $2,954,000 less deficit than you had in 1909 under your Dingley Act and Taft's administration, and we had $4,473,000 less deficit than you had in 1911 under the Payne Act and Taft administration.

The gentleman in his speech failed to tell the House that in the August 1, 1914, statement there are included disbursements of $6,440,000 that ought to have been paid before the expiration of the fiscal year on June 30, but which were paid in July, and that sum of $6,440,000 was for appropriations authorized by a Republican administration and paid for by us in July instead of in June out of the taxes that we had raised under our tariff and income-tax act. So, then, we have the facts. If we deduct this indebtedness that we paid on account of a Republican administration, and which should have been paid in June, then for every August 1 in every single year of the Taft administration and Payne Act except one, even if we deduct the battleship proceeds, your deficit would be 100 per cent larger than the deficit of August 1, 1914, under the Wilson administration and Underwood Act.

Whenever we remind Republicans of the small balances and large deficits under their administrations and tariff acts, they at once put up the plea of Panama Canal expenditures. The gentleman said that during Taft's administration $107,000,000 over and above receipts for bonds was expended on the canal. He missed it by $11,000,000.

Mr. FORDNEY. Will the gentleman permit me?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes.

Mr. FORDNEY. In my figures were included any money expended to fortify the canal—all the money that was paid out for fortifying the canal, as well as constructing it.

Mr. KITCHIN. I included that too.

Mr. FORDNEY. That was all Panama Canal.

Mr. KITCHIN. Instead of $107,000,000 it was $96,752,000. Let us now, once for all, get the facts as to the canal expenditures. During the four fiscal years of Taft's administration and Payne Act, without the aid of canal-bond proceeds, there was expended $96,752,000, an average of $24,188,000 a year, while for the fiscal year 1914, under Wilson's administration and Underwood Act, we expended $34,826,000, and for the fiscal year 1915, $29,187,000, or an average of $32,000,000 a year, and not a dollar of canal bonds sold.

For the 10 years (1904 to 1913, inclusive) Republican administrations expended on the canal $318,219,000 and they received $138,600,000 of proceeds from the sale of canal bonds, leaving an expenditure of $179,619,000, without the aid of bonds. In other words, their average annual expenditures for the canal without the aid of bonds were $17,961,000, while the average annual expenditures under Wilson's administration for the two fiscal years without the aid of bonds were $32,000,000, practically $15,000,000 a year more than the Republicans expended, or nearly twice as much.

I give now the Panama Canal disbursements and receipts for canal bonds for each of the fiscal years from 1903 to 1915, both inclusive:

Year.	Disbursements.	Canal bond receipts.
1903	$9,985.00	None.
1904	50,164,500.00	None.
1905	3,918,819.00	None.
1906	19,379,373.00	None.
1907	27,198,618.00	$31,210,817.95
1908	38,093,929.04	25,367,768.67
1909	31,419,442.41	30,731,008.21
1910	33,911,673.37	None.
1911	37,063,515.33	18,102,170.04
1912	35,327,370.66	33,189,104.15
1913	41,741,258.03	None.

Before concluding I wish to refer to one or two other statements made by the gentleman from Michigan. He said that the loss of revenue and the consequent deficits were not caused by a decrease in importation on account of the war. "Why," he exclaims, "imports for the nine months ending November 30, 1915, exceeded imports for the corresponding nine months of 1913, when adequate revenue was being produced under an efficient Republican tariff law by $72,716,000."

He missed that by $9,000,000, the excess being $63,900,000 instead of $72,716,000. He compares, of course, the total imports, both dutiable and free list.

Why did he cull out of the whole year 1913 and 1915 only the nine months? Why did he not do the proper thing and compare the whole year 1915 with the whole year 1913? Because the nine months would give an excess of imports in 1915 over 1913, while the whole year would give an excess of imports in 1913 over 1915 of over $13,000,000. For the three months which he omitted the excess of imports in 1913 over 1915 was $77,000,000. If he had put these three months in they would have spoiled his argument of the "flood of importations" under the Underwood Act even during the war. Of course, the gentleman is too fair and candid to juggle figures. I am the figures juggler.

Why did not he tell you that while the free-list importations in 1915 increased, the importations of the dutiable articles, from which we get the revenue, largely decreased?

Why did he not tell you that of the increase of importations for that part of the year, the nine months, which he undertook to give, at least $50,000,000 consisted of articles that were on the free list in the Payne Act, for which he voted, and were retained on the free list by the Underwood Act? Why did he not tell you the important fact that of the total increase of free-list importations for the calendar year 1915 a little over $85,000,000 consisted of articles on the free list in the Payne Act, for which he voted, and which were retained without change on the free list by the Underwood Act? Such as coffee, tea, cocoa, hides, raw silk, crude rubber, etc. Why did he not tell you that practically all the other increase of imports consisted of crude materials and food products, all of which were for the benefit of our manufacturers, labor, and consumers, and none of which the Republican Party would dare exclude by tariff or otherwise? Why did he not also tell you that, while our free-list imports increased and our dutiable list decreased, our exports of 1915 increased over 1913 more than a billion dollars and the balance of trade in our favor was $1,772,309,000, practically three times larger than ever before.

The gentleman stated that our loss from customs on account of the war since August 1, 1914, the date of the outbreak of the war, averaged only $5,520,000 a month. This is a pretty good admission from him, but not enough to cover the whole truth. He said, too, that the emergency act produced $1,300,000 a month more, or $15,000,000 a year more than the loss of customs sustained on account of the war. He argued from this that if there had been no war and no emergency act, we would have failed to produce enough revenue to meet the expenses of the Government and there would, therefore, have been deficits in the Treasury, and so forth.

What are the facts? The Underwood Act was passed October 3, 1913. In it the Payne Act rates were retained on wool until December 1, 1913, on manufacturers of wool until January 1, 1914, and on sugar until March 1, 1914. Therefore, prior to the war the Underwood Act had only five months, from March 1 to August 1, 1914, inclusive, of full and free operation, unaffected by the Payne Act and unhampered by the war.

The average monthly customs receipts from the Underwood Act for these five months was $23,162,000. For a year at this rate the receipts would be $277,944,000; we collected for fiscal year 1915 from income tax $80,200,000; total, Underwood Act, $358,144,000. It is estimated by the department that this fiscal year we will collect $100,000,000 from the income tax.

The amount of customs receipts given is based on the assumption that no increase in importations would have occurred under the Underwood Act since August 1, 1914, though Republicans claim that there would have been a flood of increase and Democrats admit there would have been a substantial increase, and thereby an increase in customs receipts. For the same five months of the last year of the Payne Act, 1913, the average monthly customs receipts were $24,603,000. At this rate for a year the receipts would be $295,236,000. The corporation tax of the Payne Act collected was $35,006,000. Total, $330,242,000. According to this, the excess of the Underwood Act, with its income tax, over the Payne Act, with its corporation tax, is $27,902,000.

So we would have had, if no war had come, on the basis of what both acts were yielding before the war, $27,902,000 more than you would have had under your Payne Act with its corporation tax.

Whether there would have been a surplus or deficit, under your act you would have had $27,902,000 less.

Monthly average of customs receipts before the war for the five months was $23,162,000. Monthly average since the war from August 1, 1914, to end of fiscal year, June 30, 1915, was $16,981,000. Loss per month, $6,181,000. Total loss for the 11 months from August 1, 1914, to June 30, 1915, $67,991,000. Monthly average customs receipts from July 1, 1915, to January 31, 1916, 7 months, fiscal year 1916, was $16,087,000. Loss per month, $7,075,000. Total loss for the 7 months, fiscal year 1916, $49,525,000. Total customs receipts loss from August 1, 1914, to January 31, 1916, on account of war, $117,516,000. Total receipts from emergency act to January 31, 1916, $101,009,000. Excess loss in customs, $16,507,000.

Instead of a loss in customs on account of the war of $5,520,000 per month for the 18 months, as stated by the gentleman, it was $6,528,000 per month; and instead of the emergency act producing $1,300,000 revenue per month, or $15,000,000 per year, more than the loss of customs receipts, as he stated, it produced for the 18 months $16,507,000 less; that is, the emergency act lacked that much making good the loss of customs revenue during the war. This is upon the assumption, as said before, that, if no war, there would have been no increase in imports under the lower tariff act.

But there is another important factor in the loss of revenue not caused by the war, to which neither the gentleman from Michigan nor any other Republican has alluded. I refer to the loss of internal revenue from beer and whisky on account of the spread of prohibition. Since June 30, 1914, 10 States—West Virginia, Arizona, Alabama, Arkansas, Colorado, Oregon, Washington, Idaho, Iowa, South Carolina—have enacted State-wide prohibition laws. Virginia's State-wide prohibition law goes into effect November 1, 1916.

In the fiscal year 1915 the loss of revenue from whisky and beer, excluding the emergency act, was $23,390,000. From July 1, 1915, to January 31, 1916, of fiscal year 1916, loss was $12,988,000; total loss since June 30, 1914, $36,378,000. Will my friend from Michigan or any other Republican dare say that this loss would not have occurred under a Republican administration? Will any Republican dare assume that these States would not have "gone prohibition" if the administration had been Republican instead of Democratic? Will any Republican dare claim that there would have been more intemperance, more "drunks," and therefore more beer and whisky revenue under a Republican than under a Democratic administration?

In conclusion, one further word about the sugar tariff and the pending bill. With the free-sugar provisions, which were to go into effect May 1, 1916, repealed by the pending bill, the other provisions of the Underwood Act reduce the tariff on refined sugar which the consumer buys one-half of a cent a pound and on raw sugar one-third of a cent lower than the Dingley or Payne Act, and over 1 cent per pound lower than the act of 1883, and much lower than the Wilson-Gorman Act of 1894.

If our Republican friends are satisfied with the Underwood sugar tariff rate as it stands, with the free-sugar provisions repealed, then we Democrats have accomplished much in forcing or persuading them to a real, substantial revision of the tariff downward, at least with respect to sugar.

I trust we will have a practically unanimous vote for the pending bill. [Loud applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on this bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. AUSTIN] asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HOPWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I make the same request.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN] desire to use any more of his time?

Mr. KITCHIN. No, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the bill for amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the proviso of paragraph 177 of the act entitled "An act to reduce tariff duties and to provide revenue for the Government, and for other purposes," approved October 3, 1913 (Stat. L., vol. 38, pp. 114–202, inclusive), which proviso reads as follows: "Provided further, That on and after the 1st day of May, 1916, the articles hereinbefore enumerated in this paragraph shall be admitted free of duty," be, and the same is hereby, repealed.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. Chairman, I have an amendment which I desire to offer.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BAILEY] offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. BAILEY:

Page 1, line 3, after the word "that," insert the words "the operation of," and on page 2, line 3, strike out the word "repealed" and insert in lieu thereof the following: "suspended until on and after the 1st day of May, 1917."

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. Chairman, I listened with very great interest to the remarks that have just been made by the majority leader, every word of which with reference to the Underwood tariff I indorse; and I wondered that the leader of the majority would lay an impious hand upon a measure to which he brought such high and such just approval. As I understand it, this measure is intended to meet an emergency occasioned by the war conditions prevailing in the world. We all hope and most of us believe that these war conditions will have passed before the end of another year. I therefore propose that instead of repealing the Underwood tariff, as far as it relates to sugar, we merely suspend the operation of the free-sugar clause of that law until May, 1917.

I want to say, Mr. Chairman, that in 1912 I went before my people promising the very things that we fulfilled in the Underwood tariff. In 1914 I went before my people again, giving them an earnest of what we had done, the fulfillment of our promise, and I do not want to have to go back to my people and say that the thing we did has been repudiated. I believe the members of the Democratic Party on this side at heart are in unity with the proposal I have made. I have conversed with a great many Members. I do not know what action they are going to take, but I believe that if they were to act favorably upon the amendment I propose, the people of this country would give their approval.

I believe, Mr. Chairman, that with the continuance of this revenue we would meet the emergency. Perhaps by the end of the year we should find normal conditions restored, when the Underwood tariff would produce what it produced before—ample revenue to take care of all of the ordinary expenses of the Government. I do hope and I earnestly urge the Democrats of this House to stand loyally by the work they have done. Do not let us permit the Republicans to go out to the country and say we have made a confession of error, for I do not believe we have made an error. I believe the Underwood tariff has vindicated itself as far as circumstances have allowed. I want to stand by the Underwood tariff law, and I want the Democratic Party to stand by it too, and I believe the country will stand by it if given an opportunity.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Chairman, I hope the amendment will not prevail. The passage of this bill will give encouragement and stimulation to a great industry, and the passage of this amendment would be a great cloud that would hamper that industry, because it would leave it absolutely in doubt as to the future. [Applause on the Republican side.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BAILEY].

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. MANN) there were 18 ayes and 193 noes.

So the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk, proceeding with the reading of the bill, read as follows:

SEC. 2. That the proviso of paragraph 178 of the aforesaid act, which proviso reads as follows: "Provided, That on and after the 1st day of May, 1916, the articles hereinbefore enumerated in this paragraph shall be admitted free of duty," be, and the same is hereby, repealed.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise and report the bill to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. FITZGERALD, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 11471) to amend an act entitled "An act to reduce tariff duties and to provide revenue for the Government, and for other purposes," approved October 3, 1913, and had directed him to report the same back without amendment, with the recommendation that the bill do pass.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, I demand the previous question on the bill to its final passage.

The previous question was ordered.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and was read the third time.

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. Speaker, I desire to submit a motion to recommit.

The SPEAKER. Is there any gentleman of the minority who desires to offer a motion to recommit?

Mr. MANN. No, sir.

The SPEAKER. Is the gentleman from Georgia opposed to the bill?

Mr. HOWARD. I am.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the motion to recommit.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. HOWARD moves to recommit H. R. 11471 to the Committee on Ways and Means, with instructions to report the same back to the House forthwith, with the following amendment:

Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert the following:

"That on and after May 1, 1916, a duty of 35 per cent ad valorem be levied upon all importations of raw silk."

Mr. KITCHIN. To that, Mr. Speaker, I make a point of order.

The SPEAKER. The point of order is sustained.

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. Speaker, I desire to offer the following motion to recommit.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia offers another motion to recommit, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. HOWARD moves to recommit H. R. 11471 to the Committee on Ways and Means, with instructions to report the same back to the House forthwith, with the following amendment:

Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert the following:

"That on and after May 1, 1916, an excise tax of one-half of 1 cent a pound be levied on all sugars imported into or produced in the United States."

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion to recommit.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. HOWARD) there were 7 ayes and 221 noes.

So the motion to recommit was lost.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the passage of the bill.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Speaker, on that I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 345, nays 13, answered "present" 5, not voting 70, as follows:

YEAS—345.

Mr. DALE of New York with Mr. KIESS of Pennsylvania.
Mr. MAHER with Mr. HAMILTON of New York.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I voted "aye." I have a pair with the gentleman from Kentucky, Mr. SHERLEY, and I wish to change my vote and answer "present."

The name of Mr. MONDELL was called, and he answered "Present."

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Speaker, I voted "aye." I am paired with Mr. EDWARDS, of Georgia, and I desire to withdraw my vote and answer "present."

The name of Mr. JOHNSON of Washington was called, and he answered "Present."

Mr. LANGLEY. Mr. Speaker, I have a general pair, as announced by the Clerk, with the gentleman from Kentucky, Mr. BARKLEY. I voted "aye." He told me before leaving the city to-day that if he were present he would also vote "aye" on this bill. I therefore feel warranted in letting my vote stand as "aye."

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

On motion of Mr. KITCHIN, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. FORDNEY. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. SCHALL] be permitted to extend his remarks on the bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. SCHALL] be permitted to extend his remarks on the bill just passed. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all gentlemen who spoke on the bill to-day and yesterday be given the privilege of extending and revising their remarks in the RECORD.

Mr. LANGLEY. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman will permit a suggestion, why not make it apply to every Member who desires to extend his remarks?

Mr. KITCHIN. Well, I make that request.

The SPEAKER. What was the request?

Mr. KITCHIN. I ask unanimous consent that any Member shall have the privilege of extending his remarks for five legislative days in the RECORD on the bill that passed this afternoon.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina asks unanimous consent that all Members who desire to do so may have the privilege of extending their remarks in the RECORD for five legislative days on the bill just passed. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. LANGLEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by inserting an editorial from the World-News, of Roanoke, Va., dated March 15, 1916, which pays a very deserved compliment to my friend and colleague, the distinguished gentleman from Virginia, Mr. SLEMP.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks by printing an editorial from the Roanoke News. Is there objection?

Mr. BARNHART. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker—I object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana objects.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. GLASS. Mr. Speaker, owing to illness I have not been able to avail myself of the privilege of the extension of remarks on the McLemore resolution, and I now ask unanimous consent that I may do so.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Virginia asks unanimous consent for the privilege of extending his remarks on the McLemore resolution, illness having prevented him from taking advantage of the leave originally given. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. MOSS of West Virginia. Mr. Speaker, I rise to request the same privilege of extending my remarks on the McLemore resolution.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from West Virginia asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks on the McLemore resolution. Is there objection?

Mr. POU. Mr. Speaker, I make the same request.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina makes the same request. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. EAGLE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by inserting a copy of a letter which I wrote to the Washington Post in reply to some observations it made concerning me.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. EAGLE] asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD by printing a letter which he wrote to the Washington Post in answer to some remarks made about him. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

ARMY REORGANIZATION BILL.

Mr. GARRETT. Mr. Speaker, I present the following privileged resolution from the Committee on Rules.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 170 (H. Rept. 367).

Resolved, That immediately upon the adoption of this resolution the House shall resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of H. R. 12766; that the first reading of the bill shall be dispensed with; that there shall be not exceeding 24 hours' general debate, the time to be controlled one-half by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HAY] and one-half by the gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN]; that all debate shall be confined to the subject matter of the bill; that while the bill is under consideration the House shall meet at 11 o'clock a. m., and during general debate on this bill the House shall each day take a recess at 5 o'clock p. m. until 8 o'clock p. m., and adjourn not later than 11 o'clock p. m.; that the bill shall be in order on all legislative days except Wednesdays. At the expiration of general debate the bill shall be considered under the five-minute rule, and the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union shall perfect and report the bill to the House, whereupon the previous question shall be considered as ordered upon the bill and all amendments thereto to final passage without intervening motions, except one motion to recommit.

Also the following committee amendment was read:

Page 1, line 6, strike out the word "twenty-four" and insert the word "ten."

Mr. GARRETT. Mr. Speaker, I will first ask unanimous consent that the committee amendment may be considered as agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent that the committee amendment, changing 24 hours to 10 hours for general debate, be agreed to. Is there objection?

Mr. LONDON. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. GARRETT. I desire to consider the matter as a whole, and that it might be in shape to consider as a whole at this time is why I made the request. If the gentleman from Illinois objects——

Mr. MANN. If the gentleman wants to put it that way, I do object. I am perfectly willing to vote for the amendment.

Mr. GARRETT. Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] if we can agree upon time for general debate. I will ask for a vote upon it at the conclusion of the debate.

Mr. MANN. I understood there was to be no debate.

Mr. BENNET. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] is not on the floor at present, and I seem to be the ranking minority member. I do not desire to have an discussion of the rule.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman from Wisconsin conferred with me, and we both said we could see no occasion for debate on the rule at all.

Mr. HAY. I suggest that the Speaker put the question on the adoption of the amendment.

Mr. MANN. I would like to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. GARRETT. Certainly.

Mr. MANN. Whether it is likely there will be any effort, if he knows, to have a night session this evening?

Mr. GARRETT. Mr. Speaker, under the terms of the rule there would be a night session to-night. After the rule has been adopted the matter will be within the control, naturally, of the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HAY], and I understand that he has a request to make.

Mr. HAY. I will state to the gentleman from Illinois that I expect to ask that the session to-night be dispensed with after the rule is passed. It is after 5 o'clock now, and I hardly think the rule would apply to-day anyway.

Mr. MANN. I would like to say to the gentleman from Virginia that I would like very much to hear most of this debate. I think if there is any one subject of great importance upon which most of the Members of the House are not informed thoroughly, it is upon this subject. I am glad that general debate on the rule has been cut out. I hope no occasion will exist for a night session either night, so that Members may have an opportunity to hear the discussion, which, I take it, will be upon the bill.

Mr. HAY. The rule so provides.

Mr. MANN. I know the rule so provides, but I mean really upon the bill and the provisions in it.

Mr. HAY. So far as the members of the Committee on Military Affairs are concerned, they will confine their remarks strictly to the bill. Of course I do not know what other gentlemen may do who may have time given them.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARRETT. I yield.

Mr. STAFFORD. Was it not contemplated to have night sessions so that there could be 24 hours' general debate, and does not the curtailing of the debate to 10 hours virtually obviate the necessity for having night sessions?

Mr. GARRETT. No. That matter was considered when the amendment was adopted by the committee and it was still desired to have night sessions. The committee considered it desirable.

Mr. Speaker, I move the adoption of the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The question was taken, and the resolution was agreed to.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the part of the rule requiring a session to-night may be dispensed with.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Virginia asks unanimous consent that the provision about having a night session on this bill to-night may be dispensed with. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. LONDON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that I have half an hour in which to discuss the military bill.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Speaker, I object.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. LANGLEY. Mr. Speaker, I am assured that if I renew my request that the editorial from the Roanoke World-News regarding Mr. SLEMP be inserted in the RECORD there will not be any objection, and I therefore renew the request.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. LANGLEY] asks unanimous consent to publish an editorial in the RECORD from the Roanoke World-News. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The editorial is as follows:

[From the World-News of Roanoke, Va., Mar. 15, 1916.]

SLEMP.

Valiant efforts are made every year to dislodge Mr. BASCOM SLEMP from his place in Congress. These efforts thus far have proved a failure; and if we are not mistaken, they are destined to prove equally a failure in time to come. Mr. SLEMP seems a fixture.

From one viewpoint this state of affairs may appear to be undesirable; from other viewpoints it appears to be highly satisfactory.

A Democrat of the old type—that is, a Democrat whose intellect is shackled by a machine organization and whose ambition is to serve party first and country last—regards with horror and profound grief Mr. SLEMP's ability to hold his own.

A Democrat of the new type, who has an eye to the decency of things, and above all to the best welfare of his State and country, finds in Mr. SLEMP'S continued tenure of office many reasons for gratifying reflection.

Some old-line adherents of Democracy may hold up their hands in abject amazement at a statement like this, but the statement is based on earnest consideration of conditions and on a sincere endeavor to look at the political situation in Virginia in a broad way.

Mr. SLEMP, as a Republican Representative from the ninth district, is of inestimable value to all Virginia, and we are of the opinion that success of any effort to unseat him would be unfortunate. We think we can prove our case.

Mr. SLEMP means 11 Democrats and 1 Republican in Congress from Virginia. People who would not accord to the Republican Party 1 Representative out of 12 from this State are pretty good imitations, humanly speaking, of a certain well-known breed of the animal kingdom.

Mr. SLEMP in Congress proves that there is one spot in Virginia and in the South where men vote according to conviction and not according to prejudice or the dictates of political demagogues.

Mr. SLEMP in Congress is a tribute to the independence and manhood of the people of the ninth district. It is in marked contrast to the political meekness, humility, and cowardice of the rest of the State.

Mr. SLEMP in Congress is notice to the world that the germ of independence and aggressive citizenship in Virginia is yet alive and that if Democracy does not free itself from the officeholders' trust to which it is so servilely obedient, freedom will come from some other source.

Finally, Mr. SLEMP in Congress is an encouragement to young men in this State that promotion in public office is possible without abandonment of principle and without bending to the yoke of an age-incrusted combination.

A few more SLEMPS from south of the Potomac and real leaders of national affairs will have far less discouragement in their efforts to guide our Nation wisely. Character and ability would count vastly more than shrewdness and seniority. Change of Representatives would be much more frequent, and iron-bound tenure of office would be impossible. Men in Congress would think vastly more of building character and record in public life than of building fences at home.

Mr. SLEMP is a refreshing sign, refreshing to those of us who are nonoffice-holding Democrats as well as to Republicans. He is a sign that all servitude ultimately must have an end and that political courage is not a lost art in old Virginia.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 27 minutes p. m.) the House, under its previous order, adjourned until to-morrow, Friday, March 17, 1916, at 11 o'clock a. m.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

SENATE.

FRIDAY, March 17, 1916.

The Chaplain, Rev. Forrest J. Prettyman, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, Thou art the Creator and Judge of the universal faith. Thou art the Holy One of ancient Israel. To us Thou art our Father in heaven. The thoughts that arise in our minds as we lift them to Thee we seek to express in prayer and supplication before Thee. We pray that Thou wilt perfect in us Thy work. Minister to us through Thy truth that we may be holier and freer and more closely akin to Thyself.

Still we are bound under the thraldom of this world, held with many chains. O God, set us free. Let the light of Thy truth shine away all the darkness of error within us, and let Thy holy Spirit guide us in the discharge of every duty. May we cling not so much to the clod below us as to a God above us, and may we claim by life and by the achievement of character our kindship with Thee. For Christ's sake. Amen.

NAMING A PRESIDING OFFICER.

The Secretary (James M. Baker) read the following communication:

UNITED STATES SENATE, PRESIDENT PRO TEMPORE,
Washington, D. C., March 17, 1916.

To the Senate:

Being temporarily absent from the Senate, I appoint Hon. LEE S. OVERMAN, a Senator from the State of North Carolina, to perform the duties of the Chair during my absence.

JAMES P. CLARKE,
President pro tempore.

Mr. OVERMAN thereupon took the chair as Presiding Officer and directed the Secretary to read the Journal of the proceedings of the preceding day.

The Secretary proceeded to read the Journal of yesterday's proceedings, when, on request of Mr. JAMES, and by unanimous consent, the further reading was dispensed with and the Journal was approved.

LINCOLN'S MEXICAN POLICY.

Mr. JAMES. Mr. President, I present an editorial from the New York World of to-day showing how the policy of Woodrow Wilson in Mexico compares with Abraham Lincoln's Mexican policy. I ask that it be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the matter referred to was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

LINCOLN'S MEXICAN POLICY.

"For a few years past the condition of Mexico has been so unsettled as to raise the question on both sides of the Atlantic whether the time has not come when some foreign power ought, in the general interest of society, to intervene, to establish a protectorate or some other form of government in that country and guarantee its continuance there.

"You will not fail to assure the Government of Mexico that the President neither has, nor can ever have, any sympathy with such designs in whatever quarter they may arise or whatever character they may take on. * * *

"The President never for a moment doubts that the republican system is to pass safely through all ordeals and prove a permanent success in our own country, and so to be recommended to adoption by all other nations.

"But he thinks also that the system everywhere has to make its way painfully through difficulties and embarrassments which result from the action of antagonistical elements which are a legacy of former times and very different institutions.

"The President is hopeful of the ultimate triumph of this system over all obstacles as well in regard to Mexico as in regard to every other American State; but he feels that those States are nevertheless justly entitled to a greater forbearance and more generous sympathies from the Government and people of the United States than they are likely to receive in any other quarter. * * *

"The President trusts that your mission, manifesting these sentiments, will reassure the Government of Mexico of his best disposition to favor their commerce and their internal improvements.

"I find the archives here full of complaints against the Mexican Government for violation of contracts and spoliation and cruelties practiced against American citizens. It is not the President's intention to send forward such claims at the present moment. He willingly defers the performance of a duty, which at any time would seem ungracious until the incoming administration in Mexico shall have had time, if possible, to cement its authority."

These are not the words of Woodrow Wilson defining the attitude of the United States toward the Carranza government in Mexico. They are the words of Abraham Lincoln defining the attitude of the United States toward the Juarez government.

President Wilson's Mexican policy is President Lincoln's Mexican policy.

When the Lincoln administration came into power Mexico had been in a turmoil for years. The Juarez government had come into power, but was unable to enforce order over the country. Not only had American property been destroyed, but American lives had been lost and a member of the American legation had been murdered.

The memorandum printed above was part of President Lincoln's instructions to the American minister to Mexico, and it defined the principle that President Wilson has followed in dealing with our unfortunate neighbor to the south.

Mexico is still making its way "painfully through difficulties and embarrassments"; but the administration at Washington to-day is still guided by the principles laid down by the Lincoln administration 55 years ago, and no government at Washington has a moral or a political right to be guided by any other principle.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. JAMES. I present a letter from the Jemima Johnson Chapter of the Daughters of the American Revolution, of Paris, Ky., in the nature of a petition asking for national-defense legislation. I ask that it be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

PARIS, KY., March 15, 1916.

Hon. OLLIE JAMES.

DEAR SIR: As a patriotic organization interested in the welfare and preservation of our native land, the Jemima Johnson Chapter of the Daughters of the American Revolution asks you, as the Senator from their district, to indorse all bills in the Senate relating to preparedness and protection of the United States.

Sincerely, yours,

NANCY V. GRIFFITH,
Secretary of Daughters of the American Revolution.

Mr. ASHURST. I have a telegram in the nature of a memorial protesting against the passage of Senate bill 3904, giving Indians the right to nominate their superintendents. I ask that it be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the telegram was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

FARIBAULT, MINN., March 16, 1916.

Senator HENRY ASHURST,
The Senate, Washington, D. C.:

Senate bill 3904, introduced by Senator JOHNSON of South Dakota, for right of Indians to nominate their superintendents has received favorable consideration. By such law the very worst elements will seek to control Indian tribes. We ask your aid against the measure.

SHERMAN COOLIDGE,
President Society of American Indians.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. WORKS (for Mr. JOHNSON of Maine), from the Committee on Fisheries, to which was referred the bill (S. 4586) to protect and conserve the halibut fisheries of the Pacific Ocean, to establish closed seasons in halibut fishing in certain waters thereof, and to restrict the landing of halibut in the United States of America and the Territory of Alaska during the closed seasons established, reported it with an amendment and submitted a report (No. 264) thereon.

Mr. NEWLANDS, from the Committee on Interstate Commerce, to which was referred the bill (S. 1289) for preventing the manufacture, sale, or transportation of adulterated, mislabeled, or misbranded linseed oil, turpentine, or paint, asked to be discharged from its further consideration, and that it be referred to the Committee on Manufactures, which was agreed to.

NATIONAL DEFENSE.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. From the Committee on Military Affairs I report back favorably with amendments the bill (S. 4840) for making further and more effectual provision for the national defense, and for other purposes.

In this connection I will state that I have not quite completed the report to accompany the bill and I shall file it a little later, possibly to-day or possibly to-morrow morning. It is a detailed report showing estimates and so forth, the usual report showing the conditions and explaining the provisions of the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, further time will be granted to file the report.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Will the Senator permit me to ask him a question? He reported the bill?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. The bill is reported, but as to the report which usually accompanies such a bill I am asking for a little more time within which to complete it.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I understand that. I was going to ask the Senator if any order had been made for the printing of an additional or unusual number of copies of the bill. The reason why I ask is that there are many people I am sure in my State, and I think in the States of other Senators, who will be very glad to have a copy of the bill that they may read it and may make suggestions and comments on it. I think there ought to be more than the usual number printed, so that it may be distributed.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. No more than the usual number has been ordered printed, but I will ask the Senator to make a request that whatever number he thinks may be necessary shall be printed.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Of course, I can not tell what the demand will be. I do not even know how many under the usual procedure would be printed.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I think it is a thousand copies.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I should like to send out several hundred copies that I know about, but principally to members of the National Guard of my State. I could not say what number would satisfy the demands upon the whole Senate.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I am informed by a member of the Committee on Printing that without an order of the Senate we can request and have more printed, so that as the demand increases we will have the number printed to supply the demand.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. How many more?

Mr. SMOOT. Up to $200.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. How many copies would that be.

Mr. SMOOT. That will print 100,000 copies.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Let the Public Printer be instructed or requested to print the additional number.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. There ought to be 10,000 additional copies at least.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Probably 10,000 extra copies will be enough. I will ask for the order now.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to printing 10,000 extra copies of the bill reported by the Senator from Oregon for the use of the Senate document room? The Chair hears none.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I should like to ask the Senator from Oregon, the chairman of the committee, whether it is his intention to bring up the bill for early consideration.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I was going to make the request that the bill might be taken up to-morrow when the Senate convenes.

Mr. SMOOT. Will the Senator have his report printed at that time?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I will have the report in at that time.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I do not think that request should be disposed of now.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It can be done only by unanimous consent.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I was asking for unanimous consent. If the Senator objects——

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. The bill will require a great deal of debate and should receive a great deal of study. I wish to see this bill and the House bill, and I think other Senators will wish to read them. I think the Senate bill is a decided improvement, so far as I know, on the House bill; but there are changes that I very much favor in the present bill, and I do not think the bill should be rushed through.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. There is no desire to rush through this or any other measure affecting the public.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Oregon yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I yield.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I do not in any sense wish to be understood as being with those who are opposed to enlarging the Army and strengthening the Army. All those features of the bill, so far as I understand them, I approve. I may wish to go even further than the bill goes on that line, but I especially wish to see very careful provision made for the private soldier, provision for his preparation while with the colors to become more capable as a citizen when he returns to civil life.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Will the Senator from Oregon permit me to make a suggestion to him; that is, that he give notice that he will call the bill up for consideration at some early day next week?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. In view of the situation that has developed here, let me say again that I have no desire to rush the bill through, but I want to have early consideration of the bill at the hands of the Senate. I shall therefore have the report in this evening or to-morrow, and I give notice now that on Monday I shall request unanimous consent to have the bill taken up for consideration.

Mr. JAMES. And disposed of as quickly as possible.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I ask leave to submit the views of the minority to accompany the bill which the Senator from Oregon has just reported, the Army reorganization bill; and in view of the fact that it is short, I ask consent that those views be published in the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. WARREN. Does the Senator want to have his minority report in before the majority is made?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I think that is immaterial. It will be printed and the majority report will be printed. I ask to have it accompany the bill.

Mr. WARREN. I think it is rather out of the ordinary to print the negative side of a question before the affirmative side has been presented. If both could be printed at the same time in the RECORD and in the same pamphlet as the committee report, it would conduce to the convenience of Senators and others.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. It is not entirely the negative side. It is only the minority views on certain phases of the bill.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I was going to ask the Senator from Oregon if he does not think it would be wise to print the report he is soon to make in the RECORD to-morrow?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I shall request to have that done. I was going to make a further request that the printing of the minority report be withheld until the majority report can be printed along with it. I think that would be more in order.

Mr. WARREN. In the same RECORD, so that persons can get it in one RECORD. I think that request ought to be permitted.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I have no objection to that. They may go together.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I understand that both will be in the RECORD to-morrow morning.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The order is to print both reports in the RECORD.

The report submitted this day by Mr. CHAMBERLAIN, from the Committee on Military Affairs, together with the views of the minority, submitted by Mr. HITCHCOCK, follow:

[Senate Report 263, part 1, 64th Cong., 1st sess.]

PREPAREDNESS FOR NATIONAL DEFENSE.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN, from the Committee on Military Affairs, submitted the following report (to accompany S. 4840).

The Committee on Military Affairs, to which was referred the bill (S. 4840) for making further and more effectual provision for the national defense, and for other purposes, have carefully considered the same and report it back to the Senate with amendments, and recommend that the bill do pass as amended.

The bill deals with five subjects. Sections 1 to 38, inclusive, pertain to the Regular forces; sections 39 to 41, inclusive, to the Officers' Reserve Corps; sections 42 to 55, inclusive, to the Reserve Officers' Training Corps; section 56 to the Volunteer force authorized; sections 57 to 119, inclusive, to the National Guard, and section 120 contains the usual clause repealing former laws inconsistent with the proposed one.

The committee has been guided in the preparation of its bill by the advice of practically all the most prominent officers of the Regular Army and the National Guard, in addition to that of eminent civilians who have interested themselves in the subject of preparedness. In addition to this the committee had before it and considered the tentative drafts of the so-called Hay, Chamberlain, and War Department bills, selecting therefrom whatever was thought best and most applicable to the Nation's needs, and the bill as now reported is believed to represent, as far as practicable, the consensus of opinion of the best available judges on military matters.

The bill provides for an adequate Regular Army in the true sense. It will not be found large enough to arouse the fear of militarism in any reasonable mind, nor will its cost be exorbitant, but it is large enough to meet the needs of the Nation in first-line troops and form the nucleus for the national forces.

The bill increases the Regular Army by the addition of the following units:

34½ regiments of Infantry.
10 regiments of Cavalry.
15 regiments of Field Artillery.
5 regiments of Engineers.
93 companies of Coast Artillery.
2 battalions of Mounted Engineers.
7 aero squadrons.

And the necessary increases of other auxiliary troops and staff departments.

These new organizations will increase the authorized Regular Army in time of peace about 74,789 enlisted men. The authorized strength of the Regular Army under ordinary circumstances will be about 174,789 men, or less than 2 men per thousand for our population, and can in emergency be raised to about 236,000 by the addition of men trained in its own ranks and then passed to the Regular Army reserve.

These numbers need some explanation as do all statements regarding the strength of the Army, for otherwise no accurate comparison can be made. The present authorized strength as limited by law is 100,000 enlisted men of the line, including Philippine Scouts, but to this must be added 6,000 Quartermaster Corps enlisted men, 4,012 enlisted men of the Hospital Corps, and 4,000 unassigned recruits, which, under existing laws, are not to be counted as part of the strength of the Army, making a total force authorized of 114,012 enlisted men. The present actual strength is 89,324 so-called "line, including the Philippine Scouts," plus 4,900 enlisted men of the Quartermaster Corps, 4,436 enlisted men of the Hospital Corps, and 4,000 authorized unassigned recruits, a total actual strength of 103,660. This number is limited by appropriations for the support of the Army and is fixed by the President.

The proposed force will include 174,789 enlisted men "line of the Army and Philippine Scouts" plus 6,409 enlisted men of the Quartermaster Corps, plus 7,290 enlisted men of the Hospital Corps, plus 6,098 unassigned recruits, an actual total of 194,586, or an actual increase in the authorized strength of 74,789 enlisted men of the "line and Philippine Scouts," 409 Quartermaster Corps men, 3,278 Hospital Corps men, and 2,098 unassigned recruits, a total actual increase of 80,574 enlisted men.

The total commissioned strength at present is 5,045. The proposed bill increases this number to 10,726. This number seems out of proportion to the proposed increase in the enlisted force, but in this number are 124 veterinarians not heretofore counted as officers, 822 officers for detached service with the National Guard and at educational institutions, etc., and a largely increased number of officers (88) for aviation service. The proportional increase in reality is not as large as the increase in enlisted men because of the increased size of the company units.

The proposed Regular Army will consist of 7 Infantry divisions and 2 Cavalry divisions, in addition to the Porto Rico Regiment of Infantry, the Philippine Scouts, and 1 regiment for Alaska, and the various small detachments for special purposes throughout the Army.

Table I, appended hereto, shows in detail the present and proposed minimum strength of each arm, corps, and department.

Table II shows the present and proposed maximum strength of each arm, corps, and department.

Tables III to IX, inclusive, show the present and proposed organization of the units, whose organization is prescribed in the bill.

The details of the organization of the separate arms is essentially a technical subject, and the committee has followed approximately the recommendations of the General Staff, but in order to keep the cost within practicable limits, has provided that, except in case of emergency, the organization shall be kept at about two-thirds of their full strength. This is the practice commonly followed in all countries. It is believed that the proposed organization will meet the needs of the service and the approval of all reasonable persons in each of the arms concerned.

The principal changes in the Infantry, Cavalry, and Field Artillery consist in the addition of a headquarters and a supply company to each such regiment, the addition of a machine-gun company to each Infantry and Cavalry regiment, and an increase of the minimum strength of the Infantry companies.

The object of the headquarters company is to furnish an organization in which will be collected, under the command of the adjutant, all the personnel necessary to perform the regimental duties of administration, and is made to include the band, the regimental orderlies, headquarters clerks, etc. It will have charge of the records and of the preparation of all reports and returns required of the regiment.

For purposes of administration and for properly caring for the pay and supply of the regiment and of all papers, funds, and property pertaining thereto, it is proposed to combine all the regimental personnel charged with these functions into a supply company, under the command of the quartermaster. It will include the drivers of vehicles, the clerks and noncommissioned personnel necessary for paying and supplying the regiment. It seemed to be the general opinion that the personnel of this company should belong to the regiments and not to any staff corps, and therefore the former plan has been adopted.

No detailed argument is required to show the necessity for a separate organization to operate and care for the machine guns of a regiment. The instruction of the personnel charged with this weapon is so essentially different from that of the other companies of the regiment that such companies should be permanent and self-contained, as are the other companies of the regiment. The proposed company will be armed with six machine guns, with one extra gun in case of breakage.

The necessity for these new organizations has been felt for a long time and has been met, heretofore, by organizing provisional companies out of the personnel otherwise provided for in existing regiments. This has resulted in two evils, the first of which was the depletion of companies by the personnel so detailed, and the second was that the provisional organizations could neither be properly organized nor given the proper numbers without seriously interfering with the efficiency of the rest of the regiment.

The minimum strength of the Infantry companies is increased from 65 to 100 men. This is an exceedingly important provision. A company of only 65 men, out of which the sick, the furloughed men, and other inevitable absentees must come, leaves only about 40 or 50 men for duty, a number totally inadequate for purposes of instruction either of officers or enlisted men. The proposed strength of 100 men will provide a company double the size of the old one and will far more than double the efficiency of the company units. A company of 50 men can not be raised to 150 men in case of war without seriously impairing the company's efficiency, but a company of 100 men can be increased by 50 men, some of whom will be from the reserve, and the company will still be an efficient organization.

The regimental organization for the Field Artillery has been retained. It has been suggested that this arm should be organized into a corps composed of battery units only. Field artillery is used in war, in battalion, regimental, and brigade units and not as batteries, and therefore that arm should be organized in time of peace in practically the same form in which it will be used in time of war.

The proposed regiments of Artillery are of two classes, two-battalion regiments and three-battalion regiments. The reason for the difference in organization exists either in the method in which it is proposed to use them or is inherent in the amount of the particular arm that can be handled by a single battalion commander. The field artillery, commonly known as light artillery, consists of guns and howitzers, the personnel and equipment of which can easily be handled in groups of three batteries each by a single battalion commander. The horse artillery and the heavy artillery consist of guns and howitzers, of which two batteries make up as large a command as is suitable for a single battalion commander. It is therefore proposed to organize the Field Artillery of Infantry divisions into regiments of two battalions of three batteries each, and to organize the horse and heavy artillery into regiments of three battalions of two batteries each.

Under existing law the engineer troops are organized into battalions of four companies each. In the proposed organization the engineer troops for an infantry division are organized into a regiment of two battalions of three companies each, and provision is made for two mounted battalions for use with cavalry divisions. The number of men proposed for an engineer regiment is such as to give approximately 6 per cent of the total number of Infantry of the divisions to which it is attached. This increase brings the number of troops of this arm up to about the average percentage found in foreign armies.

The regimental organization will give greater flexibility for the same number of men than would be possible in the smaller number of companies of greater size. The regimental commander will perform the duties formerly assigned to the chief engineer of the division, and will also command the engineer troops, a combination of duties which will greatly promote efficiency in that arm.

The mounted battalions of engineers proposed for cavalry divisions performed practically the same functions for the cavalry arm that the engineer regiment does for the infantry division, the percentage of mounted engineers to cavalry being about 3½ per cent. The organization of the engineer troops provided for in the bill will greatly increase the efficiency of that arm.

The bill under consideration differs from the existing laws regarding the organization of the Coast Artillery Corps by doing away with the company organization. This change is recommended because in reality, a company of fixed size is an anomaly in a corps whose duties pertain to batteries requiring manning details of a certain size, and not companies in the usual sense of the word. Under the proposed law the officers and enlisted men can be made up into companies to suit the batteries that they will man, and the efficiency of the arm will be considerably increased. The bill provides the full personnel for the batteries in the foreign garrisons and for all mine companies, at home and abroad, and in the United States it provides the highly technical men for all the batteries, the skilled men for half of the guns and full crews of the unskilled personnel for one-quarter of the guns. The reserves created will furnish the necessary personnel to man half of the guns, and the National Guard will furnish the remainder of the personnel of the other half of the guns.

The commissioned personnel of the Medical Corps will furnish approximately one surgeon to each 200 men in the field forces. This is an adequate provision for both the medical and sanitary duties in the Army and compares very favorably with the numbers of that corps in foreign armies.

The Signal Corps is increased sufficiently to provide the necessary telephone, telegraph, and wireless companies and the aero squadrons and staff officers necessary for the proposed increase in the rest of the Army, and the aviation section has been more than doubled to provide for that important branch of the service.

The Ordnance Department is increased by a sufficient number of officers to provide for the increased staff duties of that department and for the designing and experimental work involved in the production of new arms and armament shown to be necessary by the present European war.

The Corps of Engineers is increased by the necessary officers for the proposed increase in engineer troops and by additional 51 officers necessary for duty with the National Guard, at educational institutions, and for other similar detached duties not heretofore provided for.

The Quartermaster Corps, the Inspector General's Department, The Adjutant General's Department, and the Judge Advocate General's Department have each been increased sufficiently to provide for the increased staff duties required of each department incident to the increase in the Army.

The General Staff Corps has been increased sufficiently to perform its proper functions. Heretofore it has been very inadequate in numbers and has never been able to undertake the solutions of many of the problems devolving upon the general staff in foreign armies. Germany has a general staff of 309 general staff officers, with 228 other officers attached for general staff work. France has a general staff of 612 general staff officers, with 263 other officers attached for duty. Austria-Hungary has a general staff of 508 general staff officers, with 421 other officers attached for duty. Great Britain has a general staff of 171 general staff officers. In view of these numbers the increase in our General Staff to 88 must be considered as very moderate indeed.

The so-called detached officers' list is increased from 200 to 1,022. This will provide officers for duty with the National Guard, at educational institutions, as military attachés, and other detached duty authorized by existing law without depleting the commissioned personnel of the companies, troops, batteries, and higher units and thereby crippling the efficiency of the Army to a deplorable extent.

The status of dental surgeons and veterinarians is materially improved in this bill. The dental surgeons and veterinarians are commissioned as dental surgeons and veterinarians, respectively, but, inasmuch as they are never called upon to command troops, they are not given rank, but only the pay and allowances of the grade in which commissioned. The number of chaplains has been increased to meet the increased strength of the Army.

Provision is made for citizens of the United States who have served as officers of Philippine Scouts who, after having served faithfully therein, are permitted to retire with the highest pay and allowances of a retired enlisted man of the Regular Army.

The present plan of recruiting the staff departments by details of officers from the line of the Army is retained in the bill, and the plan is extended to include the Judge Advocate General's Department. Many proposed provisions which would make staff duty more attractive than duty with troops were not favorably considered, on the hypothesis that service with troops is the prime duty of a soldier and that staff service should be incidental and supplementary thereto.

The enlisted period has been retained as heretofore, but provision has been made to encourage men to enlist by making it possible for a bright, intelligent man to qualify in his duties and pass to the reserve in a shorter time than possible heretofore. Young men are also to be encouraged to enlist by giving men who have served honorably and faithfully further preference in regard to appointments under the civil service of the Government.

A new class of reservists is created, to consist of men who, by the nature of their civil occupation or profession, are peculiarly fitted for the special technical work of the Quartermaster, Engineer, or Signal Corps, or the Ordnance or Medical Departments of the Army. The number of this class of men that would be needed in time of war is far in excess of the numbers that will ever be maintained in the Regular Army. This class of men do not require drilling and training in field exercises as do infantrymen or cavalrymen, but they must be technically skilled in their own particular occupation, whether it be that of chauffeur, automobile engineer, railroad man, bridge builder, surveyor, gas-engine man, telegraph or telephone engineer, wireless operator, machine-shop expert, powder expert, doctor, nurse, or pharmacist. The daily occupation of these men in civil life is the best training they could have for the functions that they would perform in time of war, and therefore all that is required of them is that they should enlist in some reserve, so that the Government may be sure of their services when it needs them. It is not expected that these men will be called out in time of peace for any drill or training, but it is expected that they will be arranged in organizations and that officers of the officers' reserve corps will be assigned to such organizations, thereby creating units which will be immediately available for active service upon the very shortest notice.

The members of the Regular Army reserve will be paid a small sum of $2 a month to keep them in touch with the War Department, but the large bonus contemplated in existing law will be done away with and more assurance of service in time of need and more economy will result under the proposed law.

One of the greatest causes of delay in training a force of citizen soldiers is usually the lack of training that exists in its commissioned personnel. The officers must learn their functions at the same time that they are endeavoring to teach the enlisted men the part that they have to play. It is proposed to create an officers' reserve corps, consisting of men who have been partially educated and trained along military lines for use in such an emergency. They will have few or no functions to perform in time of peace, but the idea is to have them examined mentally, morally, and physically in time of peace to determine their fitness for command in time of war. This will allow the examinations to be carefully conducted when there is no emergency and will insure a far better personnel than could possibly be raised in the confusion incident to a state of war. It is proposed to commission these men in time of peace as reserve officers in the various arms, corps, or departments, and their commission renders them liable for service when called upon by the President; but his authority so to call them is limited to the time of actual or threatened war, except for short periods of training and for other purposes when authorized by Congress, and with the consent of the reserve officers concerned, as, for instance, the use of certain of them as Medical Reserve officers are now authorized to be used. This reserve of officers is intended to supply wastage amongst the forces in active operation, to officer the depot battalions and companies which train the recruits, and to officer new organizations of volunteers raised in time of war. Of all the proposed provisions for preparedness, there are few of more importance than this one, and none from which the Government will receive so great a return for the small expenditure involved.

To furnish the personnel for the Officers' Reserve Corps it is proposed to utilize the educational institutions of the country which have adopted or will adopt approved courses of study, including a certain amount of military instruction. The students who enter into this plan will form the Reserve Officers' Training Corps, and the provisions for this corps have the approval of the representatives of the educational institutions concerned and of the War Department. These provisions for an Officers' Reserve Corps and the Reserve Officers' Training Corps do what no previous legislation has ever done—i. e., they give the members of those organizations certain rights and responsibilities and make them a real and valuable assets to our military strength and in a true sense will mobilize, in time of peace, our national assets in trained military and professional men for time of danger.

Section 56 proposes to create a volunteer force in which citizens can be enrolled who for any reason can not join the National Guard or the Regular Army. This is to be purely a Federal force, not to be used except in case of actual or threatened hostilities. The plan to maintain such a force in time of peace being an entirely new idea, it was deemed best to give the greatest possible latitude to the President regarding the rules and regulations under which these volunteers should be raised, limited, however, by certain fundamental restrictions which, in addition to those imposed by a voluntary enlistment and public sentiment, will prevent any abuse of such a force.

Under the limitations imposed these volunteers will form a valuable asset to our national-defense plans, and will replace and provide for the public-spirited citizens who heretofore have manifested their willingness to serve the Nation by participation in the so-called student camps and business men's camps of the past few years.

The volunteer force so created will have a maximum strength of about 261,000 officers and enlisted men.

The patriotism and enthusiasm that has animated the members of the Organized Militia during the many years of our national indifference on the subject of preparedness has received its just recognition in the bill as submitted and the National Guard, as it is now called, will be found to be amply provided for. The bill increases the scope of usefulness of the National Guard and binds the 48 small disconnected detachments, that now exist, into one great national force as far as constitutional limitations will permit. Pay is provided for the members of the National Guard who give a great deal of time to that work, and largely increased appropriations for the National Guard are anticipated in the provisions of the bill. Under the new plans the future of the National Guard looks brighter and better than ever before in our history. Existing defects regarding the appointment of officers and the sytem of training have, to a large degree, been remedied. No constitutional right of the States is invaded but certain rules are laid dow, upon compliance with which is based participation in the Federal appropriations for the support of the National Guard; and in addition thereto certain heretofore unused powers of the Federal Government under the Constitution have been assumed.

An increased number of Regular Army officers for instructing the National Guard is provided for. A uniform law governing enlistments in the guard and uniform methods of administering discipline through National Guard courts-martial are laid down in the bill.

The National Guard authorized under the proposed act will be about 280,000 officers and enlisted men in the active guard.

A National Guard Reserve is created to which men who have served can be furloughed, so that their services will not be lost when they leave the active organizations of the guard. The annual period of training is somewhat increased, but is still well within the limits of time that any man can give to his country without injuring his personal interests, especially in consideration of the pay involved. The period is still too short to produce trained soldiers, but it will enable them to acquire the rudiments of military training and will be a great improvement upon existing conditions.

Tables X to XII show the estimated cost of each of these forces provided for in the bill until and after its provisions are in full operation.

Table XIII shows the combined cost of all parts of the proposed military forces.

Table XIV shows the comparative cost of necessary new construction to house the proposed Regular Army if in permanent structures and if in cantonment type of structures. The latter form is advocated for a considerable part of the force in the United States and can be used for some time, without injury to the service, in our outlying garrisons.

The committee does not expect that the bill will fulfill the hopes of every individual interested in the subject of national preparedness, and especially not those of enthusiasts who have become particularly interested along some special line, but the committee has had to heed the appeals and weigh the recommendations from all sources and to judge of the relative importance of the national needs along many different branches and finally to evolve a measure broad enough to cover all phases of the subject. This the committee has endeavored to do with entire impartiality, and the results of long consultation and deep deliberation have finally been embodied into the Senate bill now submitted for your consideration.

NOTES.

The basis of this estimate has been to utilize first all existing accommodations both in the United States and overseas, each arm considered separately. A per capita cost is arrived at for officers, noncommissioned officers, enlisted men, and animals, and the excess brought about by the increase proposed in the bill over the accommodations that now exist was multiplied by this per capita.

There is a wide margin of difference between temporary construction and permanent construction, as indicated by the table. Whether or not this represents economy it would be difficult to say. The total amount required for all five increments under temporary construction will be $8,497,995; while the amount required for permanent construction will be $67,838,470. In the temporary construction, plans for which now exist, it is contemplated to furnish water and sewers as needed, and the buildings to be of such character as can be made comfortable in cold climates, and to last for probably 10 years. The permanent construction is the same as is now being used in providing accommodations for troops.

It has been assumed that the existing military reservations will be used, and that no sites will be necessary other than those. For that reason no amount has been included for additional sites.

The distribution of the units contemplated by the proposed bill will not materially affect the cost of sheltering them; that is, it costs approximately the same to provide quarters in one part of the United States as in another, and about the same to provide quarters in our over-sea posts as in the United States. That being true, the same per capita has been used for all localities, so that in actually constructing accommodations the place where they are constructed will not materially matter; i. e., if it is desired to place the first increment, say, on the Pacific coast, the whole amount could be used for that purpose; or if it were decided to scatter the first increment into several of the proposed localities for these troops, that also would be immaterial as far as the actual cost of the construction would be affected.

[S. Rept. 263, pt. 2, 64th Cong., 1st sess.]

PREPAREDNESS FOR NATIONAL DEFENSE.

Mr. HITCHCOCK, from the Committee on Military Affairs, submitted the following views of a minority (to accompany S. 4840):

The undersigned member of the Committee on Military Affairs takes leave to report these views in partial dissent from the favorable report on Senate bill 4840, known as the Army reorganization bill.

I do not feel justified in joining my colleagues in recommending that the standing Army be increased 78 per cent, even though that increase be distributed over five years. In my opinion the increase is about twice as much as it should be. It would give us an army in times of peace amounting to 178,000 men when the various organizations are enlisted to 65 per cent of their full strength; and it would give us an army of 250,000 men when the organizations are enlisted to their full strength.

I question also whether the General Staff should be increased from 35 officers to 88 officers. Such an increase seems to me unnecessarily large. Indeed, I can not approve the increase in the number of commissioned officers which this bill provides for—from 5,000 officers, as at present, to 10,700 officers as provided in this bill. The increase seems to me excessive, notwithstanding the fact that many of these officers will be used in drilling and training student bodies in schools, members of the National Guard, and members of the reserve.

I am particularly opposed also to the provision in this bill which permits the unlimited reenlistment of soldiers with increased pay at each reenlistment. I think in times of peace a man should not be required nor permitted to serve more than two years in the Regular Army, but should be compelled to retire to civil life, there to remain upon the reserve for several years subject in case of war to his country's call. If permitted to reenlist repeatedly, he becomes a professional soldier or hireling and occupies a place which should be held by a young man who needs the training to make him a good soldier. Two years is enough to make a man a good soldier, and upon the expiration of that period each man should be required to retire to make place for another man to be trained and drilled and educated and then retired to civil life in the reserve army, where he will be available in case of need.

Another objection I have to the present and proposed plan of reenlistment at advanced pay is that it costs the country several million dollars in increased rates of pay. In my opinion, the Army should be made to as large an extent as possible a training school from which men shall be graduated into civil life, where they may be retained for several years as members of the reserve under the nominal pay of $2 a month provided in the bill. The shorter the period of enlistment, the larger will be the reserve and the more men we will have in this country trained and ready for service. The longer the period of army service, the smaller will be the reserve and the fewer men we will have to call upon in time of need. That is our trouble now.

With these specific reservations and exceptions and some others of less importance, I am glad to concur with my colleagues in reporting this bill, which I believe to be in its general scope an admirable measure for modernizing the Army, for providing a Reserve and a Volunteer Army, for federalizing the State militia, and for encouraging patriotic organizations in cooperation with the Regular Army.

GILBERT M. HITCHCOCK.

INCREASE IN NUMBER OF CADETS AT WEST POINT.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. From the Committee on Military Affairs I report back favorably without amendment the bill (S. 4876) to provide for an increase in the number of cadets at the United States Military Academy, and I submit a report (No. 265) thereon. I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Oregon asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill. Is there objection?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Let the bill be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read the bill.

The Secretary read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Corps of Cadets at the United States Military Academy shall hereafter consist of 2 from each congressional district, 2 from each Territory, 4 from the District of Columbia, 2 from natives of Porto Rico, 4 from each State at large, and 60 from the United States at large. They shall be appointed by the President and shall, with the exception of the 60 appointed from the United States at large, be actual residents of the congressional or Territorial district or of the District of Columbia, or of the island of Porto Rico, or of the States, respectively, from which they purport to be appointed: Provided, That so much of the act of Congress approved March 4, 1915 (38 Stat. L., 1128), as provides for the admission of a successor to any cadet who shall have finished three years of his course at the academy be, and the same is hereby, repealed.

SEC. 2. That the President is hereby authorized to appoint cadets to the United States Military Academy from among enlisted men of the Regular Army between the ages of 19 and 22 years who have served as enlisted men not less than one year, to be selected under such regulations as the President may prescribe, at the rate of one for each regiment of the mobile army and equivalent units of organizations of other arms, and the Corps of Cadets is hereby increased to the number necessary to provide for maintaining hereafter one representative of each organization as herein prescribed.

SEC. 3. That, under such regulations as the President shall prescribe, the increase in the number of cadets provided for by this act shall be divided into four annual increments, which shall be as nearly equal as practicable and be equitably distributed among the sources from which appointments are authorized.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Will the chairman of the committee explain to the Senate the changes the bill makes?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. It practically doubles the number of cadets in the academy and is substantially the same bill that is pending in the House of Representatives, with this addition: There is no recognition of the enlisted man in the bill as it is pending in the House, and our committee thought that there ought to be some encouragement given to the enlisted men of the Army, the young men who go in as boys practically, should they desire to be educated for the military service.

Mr. GALLINGER. May I ask the Senator——

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I yield.

Mr. GALLINGER. Are the facilities at the academy sufficient to take proper care of twice the number of the cadets who are there now?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. There will be, by putting three young men in a room and messing them in two shifts instead of one. I will say that the bill provides for making these appointments by increments covering a period of four years, so that there will be only about 106 added each year. Therefore there will be plenty of time to make additional improvements if they become necessary.

Mr. GALLINGER. Then we would have to make an appropriation for that purpose, of course?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. That would have to be done.

Mr. GALLINGER. It seems to me that putting three young men in a room is a rather insanitary procedure.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I will say that when I was at college I was glad to be one of three in a room, and we had an old-fashioned stove to heat the room, without any modern sanitary arrangements, and we got along pretty well.

Mr. GALLINGER. That was a long time ago.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. It was a good many years ago, I am sorry to say.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Oregon yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I yield.

Mr. JONES. As I heard the bill read, it provides that this increase shall be appointed directly by the President.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. That is the way cadets are appointed now. The President appoints on the recommendation of Senators and Representatives, with the exception of 60, whom he appoints directly from the United States at large, usually the sons of officers of the Army.

Mr. JONES. So the bill does not change the present status?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. It does not change the method of appointment. Practically the only change in the bill is that it recognizes enlistments; and if the present reorganization scheme goes through, it would provide for 64 young men out of the enlisted strength of the Army. There would be under the reorganization scheme 31 Infantry regiments, 15 Cavalry regiments, 6 Field Artillery regiments, 1 of Engineers, and 11 units of other organizations equivalent to a regiment, so that it would make 64 young men to be appointed from the enlisted strength of the Army.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Mr. President, did I understand the Senator from Oregon to say that the appointment of these 60 young men from the Army was to give them an opportunity for an education after they have enlisted in the Army?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. After they have enlisted in the Army; and it gives them the chance to be educated for the purpose if they are found to be physically fit and mentally qualified to pass the examination.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. How are they to be selected?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. They are to be selected by the President after such examinations and under such rules as may be prescribed, and recommended, of course, by the officers of the regiment.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Oregon yield to the Senator from Kansas?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I yield.

Mr. CURTIS. I should like to know how promotions are made in the existing organization, whether there is to be a single list or whether promotions are to be made from each branch so as to give the officers the advantage of the service they have had, as it should be?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I did not hear what the Senator from Kansas said.

Mr. CURTIS. I desire to know what provision is made in reference to promotions of the officers who are now in the service—whether or not they are to be appointed from a single list?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. That has nothing to do with this bill.

Mr. CURTIS. I beg pardon.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. This only has reference to the Military Academy.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Oregon yield to the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. SIMMONS. I desire to ask the Senator from Oregon if there is any change in the age limit with respect to the enlisted men who may be appointed?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. There is no change in the ages.

Mr. SIMMONS. They must be of the same age as required of other cadets?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Yes.

Mr. LIPPITT. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Oregon yield to the Senator from Rhode Island?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I yield.

Mr. LIPPITT. I should like to ask the Senator if there is any provision made in this bill for the filling of quotas of the States that are not filled by the States? I have found that it has frequently happened in the past that the full membership at West Point and Annapolis was not obtained on account of the fact that there were certain apportionments to each State, and if the States did not fill their apportionments the result was that there were not the required number of students at those institutions. Is it not possible to make some arrangement in this bill so that in case of vacancies of that sort from States in which appointments were not made such appointments could be made by the President or by some other authority?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. It might be done, Mr. President; but the committee did not deem it wise to make any change in that respect, because it would interfere with the privileges of Senators and Representatives in Congress if it were sought to do that; but under the law as it is now if a vacancy exists at the Military Academy the Senator or Representative concerned can make a recommendation for appointment.

Mr. LIPPITT. But it has happened frequently in the past that there have been no applicants from certain States or from certain congressional districts, and that the Representative or the Senator has not been able to make any appointment, except from his own State. In a case where there is no applicant from a State there is no way of making an appointment and the vacancy occurs.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. That is true; but there has been no change made in this bill with respect to that.

Mr. LIPPITT. I wondered if it would be possible, or considered wise, that some such thing should be done to broaden this power of appointment so that there should not be vacancies. Why should not such power be given to the President in case a Senator or Representative does not choose to exercise his power of appointment?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I question the propriety of making the change, Mr. President, particularly in view of this increase, because I am sure it would arouse great opposition on the part of the different States.

Mr. GALLINGER. Will the Senator permit me to interrupt him?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Oregon yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I yield.

Mr. GALLINGER. Judging from the letters I am receiving, it seems to me that a very considerable proportion of our young men want to go to the Military Academy at the present time, and I think there will be no difficulty in getting cadets.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I do not think there will be any difficulty on that score.

Mr. JAMES. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Oregon yield to the Senator from Kentucky?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I yield.

Mr. JAMES. As I understood the bill as read at the desk, it provides that the appointees of the Representatives shall be residents of their congressional districts. Is that correct?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Yes.

Mr. JAMES. It very frequently occurs that the Representative has no one in his district who desires the appointment or that there are none who are competent to stand the examination.

Why would it not be well in such a case to let the Representative appoint from any district in the State?

Mr. WARREN. I think that is the law now as to Senator's appointments, anyway. I will ask the chairman of the committee if it is not?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I think the Senator from Wyoming is correct.

Mr. WARREN. I think the law now is that such appointments may be made from the State.

Mr. JAMES. I think the Senator from Wyoming is mistaken about that.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Oregon yield to the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I yield.

Mr. SIMMONS. I should like to inquire of the Senator from Oregon whether, in his opinion, it would be wise to raise the age limit above 21 years of the enlisted men to be appointed by the President? I think that is the maximum age limit at present.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I hardly think it would be advisable, Mr. President. As a matter of fact, there are thousands of young men in the country who want to adopt the military service as a profession, and there is no better way to give them an opportunity than through a short enlistment in the United States Army. It will then very soon develop whether or not they are capable of meeting the requirements, and it gives them an opportunity to be appointed. If we should raise the age limit they might not enlist until they were really too old to be properly educated.

Mr. SMITH of Maryland. May I ask the Senator from Oregon is not the age limit for enlistment in the Army 22 years?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Oregon has yielded to the Senator from North Carolina.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, what is the present age limit?

Mr. SMOOT. It is 22 years.

Mr. SIMMONS. I made the suggestion which I did because it has occurred to me that, as a rule, young men do not enlist in the Army until they are somewhere near their majority, say from 18 to 21, and I think they should have a little broader latitude with reference to age than that which is provided under the present law in relation to the appointment of cadets. It would give an opportunity to more enlisted men; it would not confine the list from which appointments might be made to such narrow limits.

I hope the Senator from Oregon may see his way clear to raise that age limit to not less than 23 years of age. I am not disposed, of course, to make any controversy about it, or to offer any amendments if it does not meet the approval of the Senator from Oregon.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, the committee discussed the whole situation at considerable length, and this bill represents the best judgment of the committee after full consideration of the matter.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I understood the Senator from Oregon to say that the present age limit was 21 years.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. It is 22 years.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Oregon yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Yes.

Mr. SMOOT. I repeat that I understood the Senator from Oregon to state that the age limit for appointment to West Point was 21 years. Is he not mistaken? Is it not 22?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. It is 22.

Mr. CURTIS. I quote this from the Naval Regulations:

14. All candidates are required to be citizens of the United States and must, at the time of their examination for admission, be between the ages of 16 and 20 years. A candidate is eligible for examination on the day he becomes 16 and is ineligible on the day he becomes 20 years of age.

This is to the Naval Academy.

Mr. JAMES. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Oregon yield to the Senator from Kentucky?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. JAMES. A moment ago a Senator—perhaps it was the Senator from North Caroline [Mr. SIMMONS]—stated that it was not a requirement of the law that the appointee of a Representative should be a resident of his district.

Mr. SIMMONS. I said that it was a requirement of the law.

Mr. JAMES. Then I misunderstood the Senator. Several Senators have said that they thought a Representative could make such appointments from any part of the State; but that is not true. Under this bill the provision is:

That the Corps of Cadets at the United States Military Academy shall hereafter consist of 2 from each congressional district, 2 from each Territory, 4 from the District of Columbia, 2 from natives of Porto Rico, 4 from each State at large, and 60 from the United States at large. They shall be appointed by the President and shall, with the exception of the 60 appointed from the United States at large, be actual residents of the congressional or Territorial district, or of the District of Columbia.

I think that ought to be amended so that if a Representative has no one in his own congressional district who desires the appointment, or who comes up to the standard of the physical or intellectual test, he may be permitted to appoint anyone from the State from which he comes as a Member of Congress. I hope the Senator will have the bill amended to that effect.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Oregon yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I yield.

Mr. McCUMBER. I want to ask the chairman of the committee if he does not think that a bill as to which no two Senators seem to agree, and concerning which 11 of them seem to be wanting to speak at the same time, is not of such importance that it ought really to go over, so that we may consider it under some other than the five-minute rule?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I do not see very much disagreement among Senators about it. I think it is pretty generally conceded that it ought to pass.

Mr. McCUMBER. But it appears that hardly any one Senator agrees with any other.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Oregon yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I yield.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President, I am surprised to hear that there is any State which has not had the number of applicants for appointment to West Point and the Naval Academy to which it is entitled. I am embarrassed because of the number of applications which I have from California, and I should be gratified if the suggestion made by the Senator from Kentucky could be followed out, because I should be very glad to give the Representatives from my State the opportunity to share with me in making the appointments which are applied for. I myself think the proposed amendment would be a very excellent one.

Mr. LIPPITT. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Oregon yield to the Senator from Rhode Island?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I yield.

Mr. LIPPITT. Mr. President, the suggestion which has just been made by the Senator from Kentucky and concurred in by the Senator from California is exactly what I had in my mind. I know or I think I do, that the quota of cadets both at West Point and at Annapolis has never been full, due to the rule which compels cadets and midshipmen to come from certain districts and certain States. I know that from the State of Rhode Island, being on the Atlantic coast, there are a good many applicants, particularly for Annapolis, and several times applicants have come to me and said that the quota of some Representative or Senator was not full, and wanted to know if I could not arrange to have an appointment made by a Representative or Senator who was in that situation. I have been obliged in each case to tell them that it was impossible, because cadets or midshipmen could only be appointed from the district or from the State in which they lived. If we are to have military and naval academies we ought to keep them full. All of the facilities are there, and it seems to me a very unwise and unnecessary provision to hamper appointments so that when in one section of the country there are boys anxious to go and none in another, no arrangement can be made for their appointment. I think it is a very good time to consider that situation; and I hope the chairman of the committee will make some alteration in the regulations so that that difficulty may be overcome.

Mr. JAMES. Mr. President, I suggest to the Senator that I think that the desired object can be accomplished by providing that cadets and midshipmen shall be residents of the States from which they are appointed. If a Representative has no one in his district who desires the appointment and there is an applicant in an adjoining district in his State who desires the place, I think he ought to have the opportunity of appointing him. If the law is not amended, that can not be done. We have had experience in Kentucky right along this line. I recall the case of a young man who took the examination as alternate and who thought the principal had failed on account of underweight. The War Department telegraphed the alternate to come on, and he came here. Then the Secretary of War waived the deficiency in weight in the principal, the deficiency amounting only to a few pounds, and the alternate was left high and dry. He thought he had the appointment, but he was compelled to go back to Kentucky without it. I took up the matter with the President. He was anxious to aid and there was a Representative from Kentucky who had an appointment and who desired to give it to this young man, but the situation was such under the law that the only way the appointment could be made was to get the President to appoint the young man.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, with reference to the suggestion of the Senator from Kentucky as to the Representative being required to appoint from his own congressional district, I do not think this bill contemplates that at all. A Representative could recommend the appointment of a cadet from some other congressional district than his own. I do not think he is limited to his own district.

Mr. JAMES. I beg the Senator's pardon. I think he is mistaken as to that.

Mr. LIPPITT. The law is very definite in that respect, Mr. President.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Senators will please address the Chair.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Oregon yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Just one moment before we pass from that. In reference to the suggestion of the Senator from Rhode Island, I wish to say there is a good deal of force in it. Quite often there is a vacancy in some State and a worthy young man from an adjoining State wants an appointment, but he can not get it in his State because its quota is filled. I think very properly he might be appointed from some other State, and I think that amendment could very easily be made by striking out, in lines 10 and 11, the words "congressional or," so that it would read:

They shall be appointed by the President and shall, with the exception of the 60 appointed from the United States at large, be actual residents of the Territorial district, or of the District of Columbia, or of the island of Porto Rico, or of the States, respectively.

That would enable a Senator from one State to appoint a man in another State, but he would have to be a resident of the State from which he was appointed.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Oregon yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Yes.

Mr. GALLINGER. I simply want to suggest to the Senator that I am positive that the blanks which are sent to Representatives in Congress to be filled require them to recommend for appointment a young man who actually resides in the congressional district from which he is appointed.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I should think that would be a regulation rather than a law.

Mr. GALLINGER. That may be. I do not know precisely what the law is on that point, but I know that is the form in which the blanks are sent out.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. This is the law as it stands now:

The Corps of Cadets at the United States Military Academy shall hereafter consist of two from each congressional district.

That is all there is to it.

Mr. LIPPITT. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator if he does not think it would be a good idea to let this bill go over until to-morrow, so that he may look it over and suggest the proper language to effectuate the desired change? I do not think there is any opposition to the bill, but I do think this detail is of value and might just as well be properly provided for.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I am quite familiar with the bill, I will say to the Senator, and I think the striking out of the words I have suggested will accomplish what the Senator wants to accomplish.

Mr. LIPPITT. If that is the case, very well.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I move, Mr. President, that the words "congressional district or," in lines 10 and 11, be stricken from the bill.

Mr. LIPPITT. Should not the words "actual residents" be also stricken out?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the adoption of the amendment proposed by the Senator from Oregon.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Oregon yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I do.

Mr. JONES. Would the amendment permit a Member of Congress to appoint a cadet from any State of the Union?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I think it would; yes.

Mr. JONES. I do not think that ought to be done.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Oregon yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I suggest to the Senator from Oregon that his amendment would not accomplish entirely what he desires. The language of the bill is—

That the Corps of Cadets at the United States Military Academy shall hereafter consist of two from each congressional district—

And so forth.

That language would still require the cadets to be appointed from the respective congressional districts, even if the Senator's amendment were adopted. I suggest that his amendment should be broadened somewhat and that the bill should be reframed by striking out, after the words "consist of," in line 4, the words "two from each congressional district" and inserting, after the words "at large," in line 7, the words "and two additional for each congressional district within the State," so that the bill would then read:

That the Corps of Cadets at the United State Military Academy shall hereafter consist of 2 from each Territory, 4 from the District of Columbia, 2 from natives of Porto Rico, 4 from each State at large and 2 additional for each congressional district within the State, and 60 from the United States at large.

Then, with the Senator's amendment added, I think he will accomplish what it seems to be the desire to accomplish.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I inquire if the House has passed a bill on this same subject and sent it to the Senate?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I understand that there is a bill pending there similar to this, but it does not recognize the enlisted force.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. It has not yet reached the Senate?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. No, sir.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I understood the Senator to say it had reached the Senate.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. If I said that, it was an inadvertence. I did not mean that.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will state the amendment proposed by the Senator from Oregon.

Mr. HUGHES. Mr. President, I wish to call the attention of the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs to a difference that exists in the manner of appointing cadets to the Military Academy and midshipmen to the Naval Academy. In listening to the debate it occurred to me that there was quite a considerable difference in the law governing appointments to the Military and Naval Academies. I have the language of the law before me. It is short, and I think it could be read with profit by everybody who is interested in this matter. It reads as follows:

SEC. 1513. There shall be allowed at said academy 1 cadet midshipman for every Member or Delegate of the House of Representatives, 1 for the District of Columbia, and 10 appointed annually at large.

That is all the language of the law, so far as the appointment of midshipmen is concerned; and I know it has been the practice for Senators to appoint midshipmen from any part of the country, from any congressional district. There are a great many States where it is impossible to get an applicant for an appointment as midshipman. I understand that a Senator from a New England State would hardly be able to realize that, but there are a great many interior States where there is absolutely no demand for places as midshipmen, and no application is received for the appointment. There may be a great many more applicants for cadetships than there are places, but that is the situation so far as the midshipmen are concerned, and I think we can safely follow the model of the midshipmen's act. The statute is satisfactory to everybody concerned, and under its terms you can do what I believe ought to be done. If a Senator from one State finds that he is not able for one reason or another to furnish a satisfactory boy to the academy, there is no reason on earth why he should not go into another State.

Mr. THOMAS. But can that be done?

Mr. HUGHES. It can be done under the terms of the law.

Mr. THOMAS. I understood that it could not be done.

Mr. LIPPITT. Mr. President, do I understand from the Senator from New Jersey that he understands that the law now enables a Senator or a Representative to go outside of his own State or district?

Mr. HUGHES. Undoubtedly. There is not any question about that.

Mr. LIPPITT. That has not been the custom, and I have been told over and over again that it could not be done.

Mr. HUGHES. That is not only the law but it is the practice. I know myself of instances where it has been done. I will read the act, so that the Senator can see that there is not any reason why it should not be done, as far as that is concerned.

Mr. LIPPITT. I listened to what the Senator said, and the language of the act as he read it seems to me to carry out his view; but that has not been the practice, and I have been told over and over again that it could not be done.

Mr. HUGHES. I know, as a matter of practice, that it has been done. I know in one case where it was done not long ago. There are a great many instances where Senators have no applicants for admission to the Naval Academy.

Mr. LIPPITT. Is it not a fact that the form that is supplied to Senators by the department specifies that the appointees shall be residents of the State or district?

Mr. HUGHES. I will say to the Senator that I am not as familiar with that matter as my secretary is. He is the chief of that department with me.

Mr. LIPPITT. I am quite sure that it does.

Mr. HUGHES. But he has advised me on one or two occasions that there is a distinct and a vast difference between the law governing the appointment of midshipmen and that governing the appointment of cadets, and that is the reason why I read that quotation, so as to have it before the Senate.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New Jersey yield to the Senator from Kansas?

Mr. HUGHES. I do.

Mr. CURTIS. I should like to read the regulation on that subject:

13. Candidates allowed for congressional districts, for Territories, and for the District of Columbia must be actual residents of the districts or Territories, respectively, from which they are nominated.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Is that the regulation, or the law?

Mr. CURTIS. It is the regulation.

Mr. THOMAS. My information is that one of my predecessors made a recommendation of an applicant living outside of his State, and he was required to certify that the candidate he named was a resident of the State; and being unable to do so, the recommendation was rejected. My information generally is that such is the uniform practice, either under the statute or under the regulations of the department, or both, with regard to appointments to the Naval Academy.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is upon the amendment offered by the Senator from Oregon.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, after consideration I believe I will withdraw that amendment, if the Senate does not object. I think possibly it might make an inconsistency with the balance of the bill.

Mr. LIPPITT. Mr. President, does not the Senator think that it would be well to let this bill go over until to-morrow, so that we could draw up an amendment that would cover this matter?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. My experience in this body has been that if the bill goes over until to-morrow we will have the same trouble about getting it into shape and putting it through that we will have now.

Mr. LIPPITT. Mr. President, I think that if the bill meets the views of Senators it will go through. Certainly here are a number of Senators who have agreed that this particular custom or law ought to be changed in this respect, and this is the time to do it.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Then I suggest to the Senator that he propose an amendment and let the Senate vote on it.

Mr. LIPPITT. I will ask that the bill go over until to-morrow, Mr. President, and I will prepare an amendment.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I hope the Senator will not ask that the bill go over until to-morrow. The matter has been the subject of discussion time and again, and it seems to me its consideration could be completed now. If the Senator wants to submit his suggestions in conference, they can be taken up then.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry. Has not the Senate already given its unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair thinks not.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I understood so.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary informs the Chair that the Chair so announced, and therefore it has so consented.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Then the bill is before the Senate now?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Yes.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, is it not true that under the rule, where a bill is taken up by unanimous consent, if objection is made at any time before the consideration is completed it goes over?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair asked repeatedly if there was any objection to the present consideration of the bill, and the Secretary informs the Chair that the Chair announced that the bill was before the Senate for present consideration.

Mr. JONES. Yes; but——

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. An objection at any time would carry it over, would it not?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Chair hear objection?

Mr. JONES. What is the request?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Chair hear objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. JONES. I ask that the bill go over.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry. Does the Chair rule that a bill that is taken up for consideration by unanimous consent loses its place on a single objection?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The rule declares that the objection may be interposed at any time during the morning hour.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Then, Mr. President, I move that the Senate take up the bill for consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Notwithstanding the objection?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Yes, sir.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Oregon.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I do not think that motion can be made until 2 o'clock or until the close of the morning business.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator raise that point of order?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Yes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The point of order is sustained.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Bills were introduced, read the first time and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. SHEPPARD:

A bill (S. 5097) for the relief of the heirs of Dr. James Gower, deceased; and

A bill (S. 5098) for the relief of A. H. Rebentish; to the Committee on Claims.

By Mr. HARDING:

A bill (S. 5099) granting an increase of pension to Charles F. De Long (with accompanying papers);

A bill (S. 5100) granting an increase of pension to Nettie Mower (with accompanying papers);

A bill (S. 5101) granting an increase of pension to Franklin T. Alderman (with accompanying papers); and

A bill (S. 5102) granting an increase of pension to William Harrington (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. CHILTON:

A bill (S. 5103) authorizing and directing the Secretary of War to lease to Charleston-Dunbar Traction Co. a certain strip or parcel of land owned by the United States Government on the Great Kanawha River in West Virginia; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. GALLINGER:

A bill (S. 5105) to amend section 5197 of the Revised Statutes of the United States; to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

By Mr. BECKHAM:

A bill (S. 5106) granting an increase of pension to Fannie Wyckliffe Throckmorton; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. SHERMAN:

A bill (S. 5107) granting an increase of pension to Alexander Lemora; and

A bill (S. 5108) granting a pension to India Reisner; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. McLEAN:

A bill (S. 5109) for the relief of Edward Shannon; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. MYERS:

A bill (S. 5110) granting an increase of pension to Alonzo P. Hart; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. JONES:

A bill (S. 5111) to reinstate Wilmot A. Danielson as an additional officer in the Coast Artillery Corps, United States Army; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

A bill (S. 5112) granting an increase of pension to John A. Vanderhoff; and

A bill (S. 5113) granting an increase of pension to Orin Tucker (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. LA FOLLETTE:

A bill (S. 5114) granting an increase of pension to Alfred A. Bonney; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. CHAMBERLAIN:

A bill (S. 5115) appropriately designating, fixing the status of, and granting an increase of pay to certain clerks employed with the Army at headquarters of departments, divisions, brigades, districts, Army-service schools, service boards, and posts commanded by general officers, and heretofore known as headquarters clerks; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. CHILTON:

A bill (S. 5116) granting an increase of pension to Ludim Rose; and

A bill (S. 5117) granting an increase of pension to Perry M. Mick; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. CHAMBERLAIN:

A bill (S. 5118) granting an increase of pension to John Hornback (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. ASHURST:

A bill (S. 5119) authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to cancel the allotment of Irene Lydia Simmons, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

NATIONAL DEFENSE.

Mr. THOMAS submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (S. 4840) making further and more effectual provision for the national defense, and for other purposes, which was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

Mr. TILLMAN submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (S. 4840) making further and more effectual provision for the national defense, and for other purposes, which was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

DUTY ON SUGAR.

Mr. HARDWICK. I submit an amendment in the nature of a substitute intended to be proposed by me to the bill (H. R. 11471) to provide for the retention of the duty on sugar, which I ask may be printed and referred to the Committee on Finance.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be printed and referred to the Committee on Finance.

ANNA R. NIXON.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 135) which was read, and, with the accompanying paper, referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate be, and he hereby is, authorized and directed to pay, from the contingent fund of the Senate, to Anna R. Nixon, widow of Richard B. Nixon, late financial clerk of the Senate, a sum equal to one year's salary at the rate he was receiving by law at the time of his demise, said sum to be considered as in lieu of funeral expenses and all other allowances.

MANUFACTURE OF ARMOR.

Mr. SWANSON. I desire to give notice that on next Tuesday, March 21, after the conclusion of the remarks of the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. OLIVER], I shall address the Senate on Senate bill 1417, known as the armor-plant bill.

DAUGHTERS OF THE AMERICAN REVOLUTION.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. On behalf of the Committee on Patents, I report back favorably without amendment, Senate bill 4889 to permanently renew patent numbered 21053, and I ask for its immediate consideration. The bill will not provoke any discussion at all, and it is a very urgent matter for the ladies who desire its passage.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. GALLINGER. Let the bill be read.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I ask that the bill be read, Mr. President.

Mr. GALLINGER. Is the bill reported from a committee?

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Yes; it is unanimously reported from the Committee on Patents.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read the bill as requested.

The Secretary read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That a certain design patent issued by the United States Patent Office, of date September 22, 1891, being patent No. 21053, is hereby permanently renewed and extended, with all the rights and privileges pertaining to the same, as of the original patent, being generally known as the badge of the Daughters of the American Revolution, title thereto being hereby vested in the board of management of the National Society of the Daughters of the American Revolution and their successors in office.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I do not rise to object to the consideration of the bill, but I do wish to say that there has been but one patent extended, so far as I am aware, since the passage of the patent law. If this were for any other purpose than an organization such as is named in the bill, I certainly should object to the extension of a patent.

Mr. President, I remember well that Senator Platt, of Connecticut, was for years chairman of the Committee on Patents, and when I was appointed chairman of that committee he came to me and said: "Senator SMOOT, there is one thing that I regret in my official action as chairman of the Committee on Patents, and that is that there was an extension of one patent while I was chairman of that committee. By all means, as long as you are the chairman of that committee, never allow a patent to be extended."

As I said, however, this is for an entirely different object. It is not to be used in trade; it is not to be used by any person in commerce; and therefore I think the bill ought to pass as reported.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, and read the third time.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, does this bill come from the Committee on Patents?

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. It comes from the Committee on Patents.

Mr. JAMES. Mr. President, I will state that the committee was polled by the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH]. I will ask that Senator whether he polled the Senator from Connecticut, who is a member of the committee. I did not poll the committee myself.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I simply inquired because I am a member of the committee, and I have no recollection of the bill having been ordered to be reported.

Mr. JAMES. I will state to the Senator that the bill never was considered by the committee.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I think it was my fault. I have marked on the card that the bill was submitted to Senators JAMES, SMITH of South Carolina, GORE, KENYON, and COLT.

Mr. JAMES. The Senator has left out the most important member of the committee.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Yes; I did.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I do not feel at all sensitive about it. I was simply curious to know the situation.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I shall have to correct my statement, then, because I thought the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. COLT] was the last member of the committee.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I know nothing of the merits of the bill, and hence I would not like to object.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the passage of the bill.

The bill was passed.

INCREASE OF NUMBER OF CADETS AT WEST POINT.

Mr. JAMES. Mr. President, I understand Senate bill 4876, in regard to the cadets, was laid aside. Before we leave that subject, however, I will state that I have just had a talk with the Secretary of War, who consulted with the Judge Advocate General, and telephoned me that a Congressman in one district could not appoint to the Military Academy a cadet who was a resident of another district, because the cadet himself had to sign a certificate that he was an actual resident of the district of the Congressman from whom he received the appointment.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I do not think there is any question about what the rule has been, but I say that is not the law.

Mr. JAMES. He read the law to me. If the Senator will permit me a moment, here is what the law says:

That the Corps of Cadets shall consist of 1 from each congressional district, 1 from each Territory, 1 from the District of Columbia, 2 from each State at large, and 30 from the United States at large. They shall be appointed by the President and shall, with the exception of the 30 cadets appointed from the United States at large, be actual residents of the congressional or Territorial districts, or of the District of Columbia, or of the States, respectively, from which they purport to be appointed.

Now, "the States, respectively," refers to the appointment by Senators; but where a Congressman appoints, the appointee must be an actual bona fide resident of his own congressional district.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. The point I make is that the cadet must be a resident of the congressional district from which he is appointed, and he must say so; but the statute does not say that a Congressman can not appoint a cadet from any other congressional district than his own.

Mr. JAMES. I know; but, if the Senator will permit me, I have had experience with this for 10 years, and the form that they send out requires the Congressman to state that the young man is an actual resident of the congressional district from which he is appointed, and then the Congressman signs it as a Member of Congress from such and such a district and such and such a State.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I say to the Senator that that confirms what I say; that the department has adopted a rule that it had not any authority to adopt.

Mr. JAMES. Whether it is a rule or whether it is the law, which I believe it to be without doubt, it is there, and you can not get away from it. If the law is not satisfactory, it can be amended.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. If we should change the word "from" to "for," so that it would read "for each congressional district" instead of "from each congressional district," it would cover the matter.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Mr. President, a point of order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. This discussion is all out of order.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, I rise to a point of order. If the Chair will indulge me just a minute, I shall have to read the rule in order to make the point of order.

I do not think this bill could be properly laid over upon a single objection. The Senate had given unanimous consent for the consideration of this bill, and it was before the Senate. Rule VIII, which provides that the objection may be entered at any stage of the proceedings, applies only when the Senate is upon the calendar for the consideration of unobjected bills under that rule.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, I should like to ask my friend from Connecticut a question.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Certainly.

Mr. STONE. Whether the rule is as the Senator states or otherwise, the Chair has made a ruling and other business has intervened. Is it not too late now to raise that question, so as to bring that bill before the Senate, when it has already gone over?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I agree that it is an accomplished fact, and I have no particular interest in this bill. My point is not to bring it before the Senate again at this time, but simply to call attention to the fact that I do not think the ruling of the Chair, upon further consideration by the Chair, would be sustained; and I did not want it regarded as a precedent that after the Senate has given unanimous consent for the present consideration of a measure and the Senate is in the midst of it a single Member can then rise and undo the unanimous consent that has been given.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair based his ruling upon the language of the rule, which states that at any stage of the proceedings in the consideration of the bill the objection may be interposed.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. But the Chair's attention was distracted when I made the point. Rule VIII provides:

> At the conclusion of the morning business for each day, unless upon motion the Senate shall at any time otherwise order, the Senate will proceed to the consideration of the Calendar of Bills and Resolutions and continue such consideration until 2 o'clock; and bills and resolutions that are not objected to shall be taken up in their order, and each Senator shall be entitled to speak once, and for five minutes only, upon any question; and the objection may be interposed at any stage of the proceedings.

This was not a case of proceeding with the calendar under Rule VIII. The Senator from Oregon [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN] reported a bill from the committee and asked unanimous consent for its present consideration, which was given by the Senate. After he had obtained unanimous consent and the Senate had debated the matter for half or three-quarters of an hour a Senator rose and said that he objected to its further consideration. The Chair ruled that that took the matter right away from the Senate. The Chair had in mind, I think, the language of Rule VIII, which did not apply to the case.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator does not call for a ruling now?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I do not ask for a ruling. I simply wanted to get those remarks in the RECORD.

SOVEREIGNTY OF MEXICO.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I submit a concurrent resolution and ask unanimous consent for its present consideration.

I believe when the resolution is read the Senate will not only be willing to proceed to its present consideration but will agree unanimously that it should be passed without debate. If it provokes debate, I will withdraw it or let it go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The concurrent resolution will be read.

The Secretary read the concurrent resolution (S. Con. Res. 17), as follows:

> Whereas it is understood that the President has ordered or is about to order the armed forces of the United States to cross the international boundary line between this country and Mexico for the pursuit and punishment of the band of outlaws who committed outrages on American soil at Columbus, N. Mex.; and
> Whereas the President has obtained the consent of the de facto government of Mexico for this punitive expedition; and
> Whereas the President has given assurance to the de facto government that the use of this armed force shall be for the sole purpose of apprehending and punishing said lawless band, and that the military operations now in contemplation will be scrupulously confined to the object already announced, and that in no circumstance will they be suffered to trench in any degree upon the sovereignty of Mexico or develop into intervention of any kind: Therefore be it
> Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That the use of the armed forces of the United States for the sole purpose of apprehending and punishing the lawless band of armed men who entered the United States from Mexico on the 9th day of March, 1916, committed outrages on American soil, and fled into Mexico, is hereby approved; and that the Congress also extends its assurance to the de facto government of Mexico and to the Mexican people that the pursuit of said lawless band of armed men across the international boundary line into Mexico is for the single purpose of arresting and punishing the fugitive band of outlaws; that the Congress in approving the use of the armed forces of the United States for the purposes announced joins with the President in declaring that such military expedition shall not be permitted to encroach in any degree upon the sovereignty of Mexico or to interfere in any manner with the domestic affairs of the Mexican people.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, I wish merely to say that I hope the resolution will be agreed to without debate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution? The Chair hears none. The question is on the adoption of the concurrent resolution.

The concurrent resolution was unanimously agreed to.

CLARA M. CURRAN.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 136), which was read and referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate:

> Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate be, and he hereby is, authorized and directed to pay from the miscellaneous items of the contingent fund of the Senate to Clara M. Curran, widow of John W. Curran, late a laborer of the United States Senate, a sum equal to six months' salary at the rate he was receiving by law at the time of his death, said sum to be considered as including funeral expenses and all other allowances.

INCREASE IN NUMBER OF CADETS AT WEST POINT.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I now ask unanimous consent to take up the bill (S. 4876) to provide for an increase in the number of cadets at the United States Military Academy.

Mr. JONES. I understand the Senator from Oregon has asked unanimous consent to take up the bill. I wish to say that I am in favor of the increase provided for in the bill, but there seems to be so much divergence of opinion as to what the law is now and the method of appointment and what should be done that I think the bill should go over until to-morrow. So I object.

Mr. ASHURST. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the Indian appropriation bill.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I have the floor, I think.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Oregon has the floor.

Mr. ASHURST. Very well; I withdraw my motion for the present.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I move that Senate bill 4876 be taken up for consideration.

Mr. JONES. I make the point of order that that can not be done, as it is the report of a committee made to-day, and under the rule it must lie over until to-morrow if there is objection.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. It is reported to-day.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. Will the Senator from Oregon yield to me for one second?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I presume if the Senator from Washington insists on his objection it is well taken, as the report was filed this morning.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be placed on the calendar.

ST. PATRICK'S DAY.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. Mr. President, the thought occurs to me, as it must to all of us, that to-day is the 17th day of March—St. Patrick's Day. Naturally, as liberty-loving Americans, our hearts turn to Ireland and the struggle of her sons for home rule. A warm-hearted and impulsive race, its bones have bleached on every field of battle for liberty's cause, and they are to be commended.

As an evidence of how our immortal George Washington's heart beat for Ireland's cause and her people, I ask leave to send to the Secretary's desk and to have read three short letters written by George Washington to the Irish people.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

GEORGE WASHINGTON ON THE CONDITION OF IRELAND.

MOUNT VERNON, July 20, 1788.

To Sir EDWARD NEWENHAM.

DEAR SIR: * * * If Ireland were 500 miles farther distant from Britain, the case with respect to the former would be speedily and materially changed for the better.

I have the honor to be, etc., GEORGE WASHINGTON.

GEORGE WASHINGTON'S LETTER TO IRISHMEN.

MOUNT VERNON, January 20, 1784.

To the YANKEE CLUB,
Stewartstown, County Tyrone, Ireland.

GENTLEMEN: It is with unfeigned satisfaction that I accept your congratulation on the late happy and glorious revolution. * * *

If in the course of our successful contest any good consequences have resulted to the oppressed Kingdom of Ireland, it will afford a new source of felicitation to all who respect the interests of humanity. * * *

I have the honor to be, with due consideration,

GEORGE WASHINGTON.

CHAMPIONS OF LIBERTY!

Patriots of Ireland!—Champions of liberty in all lands—be strong in hope! Your cause is identical with mine. You are calumniated in your day; I was misrepresented by the loyalists of my day. I triumphed. Had I failed, the scaffold would be my doom. But now my enemies pay me honor. Had I failed, I would have deserved the same honor. I stood true to my cause even when victory had fled. In that I merited success. You must act likewise.

WASHINGTON.

MANUFACTURE OF ARMOR.

Mr. LIPPITT. Mr. President, I should like to give notice that, with the permission of the Senate, on Monday, at the close of the morning business, I shall address the Senate in regard to the armor-plant bill.

REPORT OF COMMISSION ON INDUSTRIAL RELATIONS.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The calendar is in order.

Mr. MYERS. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Order of Business 134.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request? The Chair hears none. The Secretary will read the title of the bill.

The SECRETARY. Order of Business 134, Senate joint resolution 98, to print as a public document the final report and testimony submitted to Congress by the United States Commission on Industrial Relations.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I gave notice that immediately after the close of the morning business to-day I would submit some remarks on certain phases of the preparedness proposition.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. President.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Connecticut will state it.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. What matter is now before the Senate?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Senate joint resolution 98.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I understood the Senator from Montana to make a motion to proceed to the consideration of some bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Order of Business 134.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, I rise to make an inquiry. There was no objection made to taking up Order of Business No. 134. I will ask the Senator from North Dakota whether, if there be no objection to it, he will not yield the floor long enough to put it to a vote and have it carried. Then he can go ahead with his remarks.

Mr. McCUMBER. I assumed that the matter was before the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair did not hear any objection.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. This is not the water-power bill?

Mr. MYERS. I ask the Senator to yield long enough for a vote to be taken on it without debate.

Mr. McCUMBER. If this is the water-power bill——

Mr. MYERS. Oh, no; it is a joint resolution to print the report of the Industrial Commission.

Mr. McCUMBER. Certainly, I will yield for that purpose if there is to be no debate.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Is it to print the report which will cost $10,000, or does the Senator wish to have the testimony also included which will cost $90,000?

Mr. SMOOT. I will say to the Senator that as the Committee on Printing submitted the report the printing will cost ninety-odd thousand dollars.

Mr. MYERS. It is to print whatever the Committee on Printing recommend.

Mr. SMOOT. It provides for the printing of 100,000 copies of the so-called Industrial Commission report, and it also provides for the printing of 10,000 copies of the full testimony, and that will cost something like $90,000.

Mr. MYERS. An objection, if made, is too late. The joint resolution has already been taken up by the Senate for consideration, and it is before the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair asked if there was any objection, and there was none.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Undoubtedly it was not taken up by a vote but by unanimous consent.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. By unanimous consent.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Unquestionably, under the rule it can be taken up in that way, subject to objection.

Mr. MYERS. I made a motion and there was no objection; therefore it was carried by unanimous consent.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understood the Senator from Montana to ask for unanimous consent.

Mr. MYERS. No, sir; I made a motion, and there was no objection to my motion, and that means that everybody was for it, and it was unanimously carried.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair did not understand that a motion was made, but thought unanimous consent was asked,

Mr. MYERS. Surely the Reporter heard me make a motion. I claim that the joint resolution is now before the Senate, and it is too late to object. The question is on its adoption.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. No motion was put to the Senate.

Mr. MYERS. There was no objection made, and I understood the Chair to say it was unanimously agreed to, or words to that effect. I claim that it is now before the Senate.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. What happened was this: The Senator made a motion to proceed to this matter, and the Chair said, "Is there objection?" and then, "Without objection, it is so ordered."

Mr. MYERS. It was so ordered by the Senate, and it is now before the Senate, and I ask for a vote on it. The Senator from North Dakota [Mr. McCUMBER] kindly yielded for a few minutes. I appreciate his courtesy. I think we ought to vote on the joint resolution right away and not detain him any longer from delivering his speech.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I think this is a matter of some importance, and I suggest that the notes of the Reporter be read, so that we will know exactly what is the status of the question.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, I ask that the same thing be done.

Mr. SIMMONS. If it was a motion that was made to proceed to the consideration and it was carried, that would settle it.

Mr. MYERS. It is evidently before the Senate. I ask that the notes be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Reporter will read as requested.

The Reporter read as follows:

Mr. MYERS. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Order of Business No. 134.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request? The Chair hears none. The Secretary will read the title of the bill.

Mr. MYERS. The joint resolution is evidently before the Senate.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I shall not object to the consideration of the measure or to its passage. I think, however, that the money might well be devoted to some more useful purpose. In saying that I reflect neither upon the report nor upon its importance nor upon the demand for its publication, but I recall that in 1901, I believe it was, a similar industrial commission was appointed for a similar purpose. It took a vast amount of testimony which was printed in 20 or 30 volumes at very considerable cost. I do not think one man out of a hundred now recalls that there ever was such a commission, while the report either fills the shelves of the libraries throughout the country or it has been discarded in the scrap heap. I think that will be the result of the publication of this document.

Mr. MYERS. I have hundreds of applications for copies of this report.

Mr. THOMAS. So have I. I am not going to oppose it. I merely make the statement.

Mr. MYERS. Question!

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I ask for the reading of the report of the committee so that we may see just what it is.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read the report of the committee.

Mr. McCUMBER. I should like to ask the Senator from Montana if the report is a lengthy one?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I will yield to the Senator from North Dakota if he desires to address the Senate.

Mr. McCUMBER. I wish to say both to the Senator from Georgia and the Senator from Montana, that if there is a purpose to delay the vote upon the particular joint resolution the Senator desires to have a vote on there would be nothing gained by my waiting until that measure is disposed of. The regular business comes up at 2 o'clock.

Mr. MYERS. Oh, no; but the question has been called for and no one appears to want to speak. Will the Senator let us have a vote now?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I desire to make some remarks on the joint resolution after the report has been read. I do not object to printing the report at a cost of about $10,000. I object to printing the evidence at a cost of about $90,000.

Mr. MYERS. The report of the committee in very short. I ask the Senator from North Dakota to let the report be read, and if there is going to be a long debate I will not insist upon the consideration of the joint resolution further to-day.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read the report.

The Secretary proceeded to read report No. 143, submitted by Mr. FLETCHER, from the Committee on Printing, February 14, 1916, and was interrupted by Mr. MYERS. I make a point of order that this joint resolution is before the Senate now by unanimous consent, and it can not be debated more than five minutes by any one Senator. I refer to Rule VIII.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, let the reading of the report be proceeded with.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will proceed with the reading of the report.

The Secretary resumed the reading of the report and was interrupted by

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. McCUMBER] desires to address the Senate, and I think I shall ask that the further reading of the report be suspended.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I inquire what is the request?

Mr. MYERS. I ask if the joint resolution may not come to a vote now without further debate?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. No.

Mr. MYERS. Then I make the point that it can only be debated five minutes by each Senator.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The point is not well taken.

Mr. MYERS. I wish to submit my authority, Mr. President.

Mr. PRESIDING OFFICER. We are not now proceeding under Rule VIII.

Mr. GALLINGER. The last clause of Rule VIII settles the question.

Mr. MYERS. I desire to give my authority, which is Rule VIII.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will call the attention of the Senator to the last three lines of the first paragraph of Rule VIII, which read:

> But if the Senate shall proceed with the consideration of any matter notwithstanding an objection, the foregoing provision touching debate shall not apply.

Mr. MYERS. Yes, Mr. President, but the RECORD shows that a motion was made to bring this matter up, and it was agreed to by unanimous consent without any objection whatever.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The fact is we have not reached the calendar under Rule VIII. The Chair had not announced that the calendar under Rule VIII was in order. The Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] arose when the Chair announced that concurrent and other resolutions were in order and presented a concurrent resolution. The Chair then recognized the Senator from Montana. The Senate had not reached the consideration of the calendar under Rule VIII, but was really operating under Rule VII, which relates to morning business.

Mr. MYERS. Then I made a motion to take up the joint resolution; the Chair asked if there was objection; and the Chair announced that there was no objection made. Therefore the joint resolution is put in the category of being taken up by unanimous consent——

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Oh, no.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The point of order is not well taken.

Mr. MYERS. And no Senator can speak more than five minutes upon it.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Not at all. The Chair having heard no objection, regarded the motion to consider the resolution as having been agreed to; that is all. The motion having been agreed to, the subject is open to unlimited debate.

Mr. GALLINGER. It did not abrogate the rule at all.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will proceed with the reading of the report. All of this discussion is out of order.

The Secretary resumed the reading of the report and was interrupted by Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, do I understand that my point of order was overruled?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The point of order was made when the Secretary was reading the report. The Chair overruled the point of order. It was not made at the proper time, because the report was being read.

Mr. MYERS. Because it was made at that time?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Yes.

Mr. MYERS. Not on the merits of my point?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That was one reason. The Secretary will resume the reading of the report.

The Secretary resumed and concluded the reading of the report, which in full is as follows:

The Committee on Printing, to which was referred various resolutions and petitions for the printing of the report and testimony submitted to Congress by the Commission on Industrial Relations, in compliance with the act approved August 23, 1912, having had the same under consideration, reports back a joint resolution (S. J. Res. 98) providing for the printing of said report and testimony, and recommends that said resolution do pass.

The resolution provides for the printing of 100,000 copies of the "Final Report of the Commission on Industrial Relations" in one volume, as agreed to by the House of Representatives in the adoption of the House concurrent resolution No. 9. In addition thereto, the resolution provides for the printing of 10,000 copies of the complete testimony taken by the commission at its various hearings, together with all the exhibits submitted with such testimony except the exhibits which are in printed form. It is intended that the printed exhibits shall be referred to in the testimony by title, author, and publisher, so that they may be properly identified and thus made available to any person who desires to obtain such printed exhibits from libraries or publishers that have copies of the same on hand.

The Public Printer has estimated that the cost of the printing proposed by the resolution will be as follows:

100,000 copies final report	$9,729.88
10,000 copies complete testimony (7 volumes of 1,008 pages each)	54,978.84
10,000 copies of exhibits, except those heretofore printed (3 volumes of 1,008 pages each)	27,979.53
Total cost	92,688.25

The Public Printer also estimated that the cost of printing all the exhibits, including the exhibits heretofore printed, would be $74,612.08 for 10,000 sets, consisting of 8 volumes of 1,008 pages each. Excluding the exhibits heretofore printed, leaves only three volumes of exhibits to be printed, at a cost, as stated above, of $27,979.53, or a saving of $46,632.55 by excluding exhibits that already are in printed form and thus available to the public.

The estimated cost of printing the 27 reports of special investigators submitted by the commission is $28,449.18 for 10,000 sets of 3 volumes of 1,008 pages each. If the investigators' reports and the printed exhibits were included in the resolution to print, the total estimated cost would be $167,769.98, or $75,081.73 in excess of the expenditure proposed by the resolution for the printing of the report of the commission. The committee does not consider this additional expenditure advisable in view of the recommendations submitted by members of the Commission on Industrial Relations and others interested in its report that the exhibits heretofore printed and the reports of the special investigators need not be ordered printed by Congress.

The condition of the allotment for printing and binding for Congress for present fiscal year as reported by the Public Printer is, unencumbered balance available for Congress, February 12, 1916, $693,678.26.

The report of the Commission on Industrial Relations was laid before the House of Representatives by the Speaker on December 17, 1915. On January 12, 1916, the House agreed to a concurrent resolution (H. Con. Res. 9) for the printing of 100,000 copies of the final report of the commission. This resolution was referred to the Senate Committee on Printing the same day, since which time the matter has been given most careful consideration by the committee.

The report of the Commission on Industrial Relations as submitted to Congress was accompanied by a great mass of papers, books, and records collected by the commission, all of which were packed into several large wooden boxes and transmitted to Congress when the term of the commission expired by limitation of law on August 23, 1915. In laying the final report before the House the Speaker said concerning the material submitted to Congress by the commission:

"Information came to the Speaker as to the bulk of this report and the evidence, and inquiry was made as to what to do with it, and somebody suggested that it be brought here. There was not room enough in the well of the House for it, and the Chair ordered it not to be brought in. It is out in the lobby, and if anybody wants to inspect it, he can go out there and see it."

It has required considerable time to sort over and arrange this mass of material and the hundreds of exhibits, both in printed form and in manuscript, submitted by the commission so as to obtain the estimate required by law as to the cost of printing the same.

It also has been difficult for the committee to determine what portions of the vast bulk of matter submitted by the commission were desired to be printed by Congress as a part of the commission's report. Certain recommendations as to printing were made in the final report, which were modified subsequently in either oral or written statements submitted by officers of the commission. The committee therefore decided to hold a hearing in regard to printing the report, at which time there were present Mr. John B. Lennon, a former member of the Commission on Industrial Relations; Mr. Basil M. Manly, former director of research and investigation for the commission; Mr. Otto F. Bradley, secretary of the Committee on Industrial Relations; Mr. H. E. Wills, assistant grand chief Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers; Mr. Val Fitzpatrick, vice president, Brotherhood of Railway Trainmen; Mr. W. N. Clark, vice president, Order of Railway Conductors; Mr. P. J. McNamara, vice president, Brotherhood of Locomotive Firemen and Engineermen; Mr. M. Grant Hamilton, representing the American Federation of Labor, all of whom submitted statements urging the printing of the final report and testimony in sufficient numbers to meet the demand therefor. Mr. Manly suggested that 100,000 copies of the final report and 10,000 copies of the testimony would be considered sufficient for Congress to print at this time, and his recommendation was concurred in by former Commissioner Lennon, and seemed to meet the wishes of representatives of labor, who were present at the hearing. Owing to the fact that the great mass of exhibits and most of the reports of the special investigators, which were transmitted to Congress by the commission, had not been edited or put in proper form for publication, the committee was uncertain as to what portion of this matter the Commission on Industrial Relations really desired should be printed by Congress as part of its report. The chairman of the Joint Committee on Printing therefore directed the following letter, under date of January 8, 1916, to the former chairman of the Commission on Industrial Relations, Hon. Frank P. Walsh, of Kansas City, Mo., who is now chairman of the Committee on Industrial Relations:

CONGRESS OF THE UNITED STATES,
JOINT COMMITTEE ON PRINTING,
Washington, January 8, 1916.

Hon. FRANK P. WALSH,
Chairman Commission on Industrial Relations,
Kansas City, Mo.

MY DEAR MR. WALSH: There are pending before the Printing Committees of the two Houses of Congress numerous resolutions providing for the printing of the report of the Commission on Industrial Relations. These resolutions call for the printing of either the "final report," "the full report," "the hearings," "all the testimony taken at the hearings by said commission," "the report of the Colorado strike," or "the Colorado report with the Rockefeller correspondence attached."

The so-called "final report" of your commission was transmitted to Congress in printed form, together with two supplemental reports also in printed form, one relating to the Colorado strike and the other to the National Erectors' Association and the International Association of Bridge and Structural Iron Workers. Accompanying these printed reports there appear to have been submitted to Congress a mass of manuscript including the testimony taken by the commission and a number of supplemental reports which are contained in several large wooden boxes. The Printing Committees therefore are in some doubt as to just what constitutes the "final" or "full" report of your commission, and desire to have some authoritative expression as to what portion of the mass of matter transmitted to Congress from your commission actually constitutes its formal report and should be made a part of the printed report.

In this connection I desire to call your attention to the following statements taken from the volume designated and printed by your commission as the "final report" thereof.

On page xii of the final report appears this statement in Director Manly's letter of submittal:

"I have drawn most largely upon the following reports, which are submitted herewith, with the suggestion that Congress be requested to print them as supplements to this report."

Mr. Manly then proceeds to enumerate 27 reports of special investigators which he thus requests be printed as "supplements" to the final report which you have transmitted to Congress.

On page 289 of the final report appears the following paragraph as a part of the statement submitted by Commissioners Lennon and O'Connell:

"We concur in the history and statement of this regarding the Colorado strike, as written by Mr. George P. West, which is printed as an addendum to this report."

It might be inferred from the foregoing statement that it was the intention of your commission to have the special report on the Colorado strike printed as a part of the final report.

On page 92 of the final report, under the heading of "Conclusions and recommendations," appears this statement:

"The completed corrected testimony is transmitted to Congress, as well as carefully prepared digests of the evidence. The reports of the investigators have likewise been placed in the possession of Congress."

In connection with the latter statement, the committee has been advised that it is not the desire of your commission, as expressed by Mr. Manly, to have all of the exhibits submitted with the transcript of testimony printed as a part thereof, but that only a few of the exhibits have been selected by Mr. Manly as suitable to have printed with the testimony as published by Congress.

I have also been informed that Mr. Manly does not deem it advisable to have printed by Congress at this time the various supplemental reports referred to in his letter of submittal as quoted above, although they appear to have been made a part of, or at least a supplement to, your final report and were formally recommended for printing in the report submitted to Congress.

I feel sure that the printing committees of Congress desire to have the report of your commission printed in an adequate and proper manner and that a suitable resolution authorizing such printing will be reported to Congress as soon as we can obtain information as to just what your commission desired to include in its report as submitted to Congress. If you now desire to have any portion of your report or the accompanying manuscripts and exhibits, which you have transmitted to Congress, omitted from the printed report, an expression from you in this regard would be appreciated by the committee.

Very respectfully, yours,

DUNCAN U. FLETCHER, Chairman.

The following reply was received from Mr. Walsh:

COMMISSION ON INDUSTRIAL RELATIONS,
January 15, 1916.

Hon. DUNCAN U. FLETCHER,
Chairman Joint Committee on Printing,
Congress of the United States, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR FLETCHER: I have delayed answering your favor of January 8 until I had an opportunity to communicate with Mr. Manly, and to reach an understanding with regard to certain of the detailed questions contained therein.

The material which I consider should be printed by Congress is:

First, the final report of the commission in the form in which it was submitted to Congress, including the report of Mr. Manly, signed by Commissioners Walsh, Garretson, Lennon, and O'Connell; the report of Commissioner John R. Commons, signed by Commissioners Commons and Harriman, and, with certain exceptions, by Commissioners Weinstock, Aishton, and Ballard; the report prepared by Commissioner Weinstock and signed by Commissioners Weinstock, Aishton, and Ballard; together with the supplementary statements of the various individual commissioners.

Second, the complete testimony taken by the commission, together with such exhibits as seem to be pertinent and necessary for an understanding of the testimony.

I wish to express my very strong conviction that it is of the greatest importance that the entire testimony be printed. The work of the commission can be judged only in the light of the evidence furnished by the witnesses who appeared before it. Furthermore, this testimony constitutes an almost inexhaustible mine of information regarding economic and industrial conditions in the United States, which should be made accessible not only to students but to men in all walks of life who are interested in any particular phase of the economic problem.

With regard to the reports of the investigators, I wish to say that I do not consider it necessary that these reports should be ordered printed by Congress. They contain a mass of extremely valuable information, it is true, but they were very completely epitomized in the commission's final report, and, furthermore, the main facts which they disclose were communicated to the public through newspapers and magazines at the time of their preparation. I might add that on account of lack of time none of the reports of investigators was formally approved by the commission, and consequently they stand as the findings of individual employees of the commission. The two reports which the commission considered to have the greatest bearing upon its entire work, namely, the report on Colorado, by George P. West, and the report on the National Erectors' Association and the International Association of Bridge and Structural Iron Workers, by Luke Grant, have been published and widely distributed.

With regard to the reports of the investigators, I wish to say that I did not conduct its hearings in the formal manner of a law court, but allowed witnesses to submit anything which they felt might be of value in weighing the testimony. As a result, the exhibits submitted are so voluminous that it would be unwise and impracticable to include them all. They consist, in a large measure, of printed matter which is readily available, such, for example, as constitutions and by-laws of labor unions and employers' associations, testimony before other commissions, official reports and articles by witnesses setting forth their ideas at greater length than was possible in their oral testimony.

The idea of the commission with regard to these exhibits was that all the matters so submitted would be available for reference purposes in making the final report, and that when the testimony was printed only such exhibits would be included as contained original matter not otherwise available or which was necessary for an understanding of the testimony. I understand that Mr. Manly, former director of the commission, has examined the entire mass of exhibits and made such selection. Mr. Manly informs me that the material which was put to one side as not to be included in the testimony consisted of printed matter and supplementary statements of witnesses that were never considered as being in the proper sense exhibits. I believe that a selection made upon such a basis is thoroughly sound and will meet the ideas not only of the commission but of the reading public.

I trust that this covers fully the points raised in your letter. If not, I shall be very glad to communicate with you further.

Very truly, yours,

FRANK P. WALSH, Chairman.

The resolution submitted to the Senate provides for the printing of all the matter which the chairman and the director of the Commission on Industrial Relations have recommended that Congress ought to print. The only portions of the material transmitted to Congress by the commission that are not included in the resolution for printing are the exhibits which were submitted to the commission in printed form, and which undoubtedly are obtainable from libraries and publishers, and the reports of the special investigators for the commission, which Chairman Walsh states in the foregoing letter he does not consider it necessary should be printed by Congress. Two of these special reports, one on the Colorado strike and the other on the National Erectors' Association and the International Association of Bridge and Structural Ironworkers, were printed by the commission itself at the time its final report was printed. Of the final report the commission printed and distributed an edition of 10,000 copies, and of the two special reports referred to 6,500 copies were printed and distributed by the commission, all of which was paid for out of its final appropriation of $100,000, as provided for by the sundry civil act of March 3, 1915.

To print the testimony and exhibits as provided for in the resolution will require considerable preparation to get the copy in suitable form so as to identify and properly place the exhibits that are to be included with the testimony and those heretofore printed which are to be referred to by title, author, and publisher. It is therefore deemed advisable to have the report printed under the direction of Congress as expressed through some such committee as the Joint Committee on Printing, which seems to be the proper committee to vest with this supervision, as has been done in numerous other instances.

The committee has not received any protests from any source whatever against the printing of this report. The resolution here presented was agreed to unanimously by the committee and is believed to meet the wishes of all concerned in the publication and distribution of this report, which was prepared by the Commission on Industrial Relations after an expenditure of $450,000, appropriated by Congress for its investigation of various industrial problems throughout the United States.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, I do not wish to keep the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER] off the floor unnecessarily. He yielded through courtesy. I now rise to a parliamentary inquiry. I ask if the matter which is now before the Senate can be debated more than five minutes by any one Senator?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair so rules.

Mr. MYERS. The Chair has ruled that it can be?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Yes. The Chair calls attention to the fact that we are not proceeding under Rule VIII:

At the conclusion of the morning business for each day, unless upon motion the Senate shall at any time otherwise order—

The Senator from Montana has made a motion to proceed to the consideration of this matter, and we are not proceeding under Rule VIII.

Mr. MYERS. The reading of the report having been concluded, and the matter being before the Senate, I thank the Senator for his courtesy in yielding, and as I understand he is going to deliver an address I suggest the absence of a quorum. I think he ought to have more Senators present to hear him.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The absence of a quorum having been suggested, the Secretary will call the roll.

Mr. McCUMBER. Before the roll is called I wish to state that I hope the Senator will withdraw that request.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator can not withdraw it.

Mr. MYERS. I am willing to withdraw it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Hardwick	Martine, N. J.	Smith, Md.
Brandegee	Hitchcock	Myers	Smith, S. C.
Broussard	Hughes	Norris	Smoot
Catron	Johnson, S. Dak.	Overman	Sutherland
Chamberlain	Jones	Pittman	Swanson
Chilton	La Follette	Reed	Thomas
Clapp	Lane	Robinson	Tillman
Colt	Lea, Tenn.	Saulsbury	Underwood
Cummins	Lee, Md.	Shafroth	Vardaman
du Pont	Lippitt	Sheppard	Warren
Gallinger	McCumber	Sherman	Weeks
Gore	McLean	Simmons
Gronna	Martin, Va.	Smith, Ga.

Mr. CHILTON. My colleague [Mr. GOFF] is absent on account of illness. I will let this announcement stand for the day.

Mr. PITTMAN. I desire to announce the unavoidable absence of the senior Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE] and to state that he is paired with the junior Senator from Maine [Mr. BURLEIGH].

Mr. SAULSBURY. I desire to announce that the senior Senator from Maine [Mr. JOHNSON] is absent on business of the Senate.

Mr. JONES. I desire to announce that the Senator from Vermont [Mr. PAGE] is necessarily absent on business of the Senate. I also make the same announcement with reference to my colleague [Mr. POINDEXTER].

Mr. CHILTON. I desire to announce the absence of Mr. KERN, Mr. SMITH of Arizona, Mr. WILLIAMS, Mr. HOLLIS, Mr. JOHNSON of Maine, Mr. STERLING, and Mr. THOMPSON on business of the Senate.

Mr. GALLINGER. On account of illness, the Senator from Maine [Mr. BURLEIGH] is detained from the Senate. He is paired with the Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE].

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Fifty Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present.

Mr. McCUMBER obtained the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Will the Senator from North Dakota indulge the Chair for a moment?

Mr. McCUMBER. Certainly.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair desires to reverse his ruling made this morning. At the time the question was presented the Assistant Secretary, Mr. Rose, called the Chair's attention to these words:

The objection may be interposed at any stage of the proceedings.

These words are contained in Rule VIII. At that time we were not proceeding under Rule VIII, but we were proceeding with the morning business, and unanimous consent had been given for the consideration of the bill before the calendar had been reached.

The Chair therefore reverses his ruling.

NATIONAL DEFENSE.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I shall avail myself of the liberality of the rules of the Senate which allow some latitude in the discussion of any particular bill.

In opening the discussion on some of the phases of this preparedness program I am not flattering myself with the expectation that any views or sentiments I may express will influence to any considerable degree in shaping the preparedness legislation; I have but the modest hope that the place of the utterance, rather than any skill of presentation, might challenge some attention and have some little weight in bringing to bear on this great subject a calmer public judgment than that so far manifested by the great press of the country.

PREPAREDNESS.

Mr. President, one can only conjecture what condition this country would be in to-day had Congress at all times allowed journalistic extravagances to dominate and control its actions or yielded to the impulse of every temporary wave of excitement created by this instrumentality. Recognizing the power of the press to excite and lead public sentiment in any particular direction, and often to misconstrue the acts and motives of those Members of Congress whose steps do not measure exact time to its music, these representatives of the public may, and I know often do, find it somewhat difficult to follow the straight line of conviction and duty to public welfare. And this is doubly true when the war spirit of the people is evoked for the accomplishment of a purpose.

Mr. President, I am satisfied the Congress to-day is laboring to bring forth an Army and Navy program that will meet every requirement of the Nation for both defensive and offensive warfare and yet to keep within the bounds of reason and proper economy.

Against this effort and real desire of Congress is the press-created sentiment which has brought into existence a vast number of organizations which, unloosing every restraint, would force upon the country a navy and military program that would outrival and make insignificant the armaments and the militarism of the Old World—a program that would, if carried out, within 10 years entail a cost of at least a billion dollars a year for maintenance and war purposes in general, more than the entire cost of conducting the whole Government to-day. The question is not one between a sufficient and an insufficient preparedness. Everyone is for full and adequate preparedness for war. It will rather be an issue between the demands of reason and the demands of hysteria—between the creation and maintenance of an Army and Navy sufficient to meet every requirement of the country and an Army and Navy capable of cowing the whole world.

From quotations which I shall presently give, we will find that there are grave reasons to fear that we may be led into wild and reckless military and naval extravagances, possibly not by a single plunge, but by following a course that will irresistibly lead us into such a condition.

Mr. President, that my humble efforts to check this wilder spirit of militarism may not be misunderstood, let me say at the outset that, while as a believer in peace and arbitration I have supported every treaty that has broadened the realm of arbitrable questions, I nevertheless recognize that so long as there is no power other than the unrestrained will of any great nation to check or restrain its ambitions, that so long as international difficulties are settled by arbitrament of war, so long as other nations are armed to enforce their demands—to make might the measure of right—it will be necessary for the United States to be able to meet force with force; and I shall support any program of defensive and offensive preparedness which shall meet the needs of the country. I shall go further than my judgment would dictate as to the limit of necessity, to the end that the people may rest assured that this country can at all times master any situation that may come before it.

For the purpose of showing the extent to which many of these organizations I have spoken of would lead us, I wish to quote but one paragraph of the preamble of a resolution adopted by the National Defense Conference of Mayors and Municipal Representatives, at St. Louis, March 3 and 4, 1916. It reads:

Whereas we believe that the Navy should be increased with all speed until we shall become the first naval power of the world, with strength on the Atlantic equal to that of any other power upon that ocean, and with additional strength upon the Pacific such as to make us the first naval power upon that ocean.

That means, Mr. President, that we must have a Navy on one ocean fully equal to the Navy of Great Britain—which navy is more than double that of any other nation in the world—and, in addition, another Navy on another ocean as powerful as that of Japan, which is to-day about as large as any European nation except Great Britain, and that in addition to the enormous coast defenses, mines, submarines, aeros, and so forth.

It would require fully a billion dollars a year to maintain such an extraordinary naval armament, in connection with such military organization as would be a necessary complement to the naval power.

Of course, no such proposition will be proposed by this Congress. But we are not so certain that while this Congress would not consider such an unnecessary, extravagant idea, it might not be led into a policy which would end in such a program, and especially in the light of the declaration of the President himself, that we need a Navy more powerful than any navy afloat.

This startling demand of the President, the Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy, speaking from his position of authority, was reechoed back from our frightened coasts in a demand for a million trained soldiers to repel invasion, and found a further expression in this resolution of a great organization demanding a Navy so enormous in its proportions that the whole world must tremble in the shadow of its might; and it is these extravagant declarations and demands, kindling fires which may grow into a conflagration of unchecked military and naval extravagance, that demand in this Senate some word of refutation.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from North Dakota will suspend for a moment. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. A bill (H. R. 408) to provide for the development of water power and the use of public lands in relation thereto, and for other purposes.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I shall not attempt, in discussing this preparedness question at this particular time, to indicate the number of each character of war craft or the number or composition of a standing army which would answer every requirement of this country, but, rather, to dispel, so far as my efforts may prevail, the imaginary dangers which are being proclaimed by the press and by many organizations to frighten this country into the adoption of a naval and military program that will outdo the militarism and naval prowess of any of the armament-ridden, tax-burdened countries of the Old World.

Mr. President, I have observed in this life that the pathway of prudence generally lies about midway between those advocated by extremists on either side; that the only progress which experience has proven wholesome and permanent has been a conservative progress founded on cool and deliberate, rather than excited or hysterical, consideration; that when a people allow themselves to become stampeded they paralyze for the time being their reasoning faculties and bewilder their good judgment. In the observance of these simple philosophies of life I shall find my justification for refusing to run mad at the beat of tom-toms of fear, no matter how fiercely pounded by any political or industrial organization for political or business effect, or even by those who mistake their vanity for patriotism.

Mr. President, there is no true American living who does not desire, and deeply desire, that his country shall be prepared, not only now but at all times, to meet any danger that may beset it. Such unconcern in his counrty's welfare would be little less than treason. Let us, therefore, assume in this argument that every American worthy of the name is for full and adequate defense. Let us do this that we may fairly, candidly, and calmly pass judgment upon any program of so-called preparedness which may be submitted to us. Let us once and for all remove this man of straw—this supposed indifference to national safety, created only to furnish extreme advocates an object against which they can direct their assaults. Let us go further and eliminate every bogey cunningly thrown on the screen of national affairs to excite the public mind and fire the public heart in furtherance of the interests of a political party or of a business propaganda.

We need in the consideration of this great subject that precision and accuracy of judgment which emanate from minds free from the phantoms of fear. We need a plain and honest view of our exact military and naval status and position as compared with other nations of the world. Side by side with their security and our weaknesses we should place our security and their weaknesses.

Mr. President, there is and there can be, never a moment in the history of a country when it is for the best interests of its people to be deceived, when it is best that innuendo and veiled suggestion should hide the real truth. If the safety of this country has suddenly become endangered, we are entitled to something more definite and understandable than that "sparks of the European conflagration are falling around us." If we are to enter upon a program not of simple preparedness for probable emergencies but of excessive armament, powerful enough to bring the whole world to its knees, and entailing an expenditure of billions in the near future, we are entitled to something more substantial than gilded epigrams, something more definite than the assertions of the Executive that as the nations of Europe are engaged in the process of butchering each other, we may be called upon any day to assist in the utter annihilation of one or the other side.

Mr. President, as no man can look upon a desperate battle between two others with utter complacency and unconcern and free from any degree of excitement, so each neutral nation of Europe, at whose very threshold the crimson waves of this maelstrom of blood now rages, may be excused if its tranquillity has been disturbed and it is thereby rendered less capable of that calm reasoning now so necessary for its preservation and future welfare.

But for this country, as powerful, measured by its resources, as any two nations now exhausting themselves in this deadly struggle, and with the ocean between us and them, to lose its head is worse than senseless. National sanity is always a very useful attribute, but when all of the rest of the great nations are war mad, with their lunacy directed only toward the destruction of each other, then, above all times, is it proper and meet for us to remain perfectly sane, to propound sane questions, and demand sane answers.

In the face of all this excitement about preparedness and increased armament, we may well ask ourselves what is the cause of this sudden awakening to our unpreparedness, an awakening which sets into feverish activity the support of our armor-plate and munition factories; that fills the press with scare-head lines; that initiates and sets into active endeavor navy leagues; that calls the Executive from the seat of Government, where he is most needed to advise, counsel, or command the majority party in Congress in all its daily activities; that fills the country with lecturers on preparedness, fills it with moving pictures of this country of mammoth size, population, and wealth being invaded, conquered, and maltreated by a country thousands of miles away, so small in territorial domain that it could be wrapped within the borders of an ordinary State of the Union.

What is the cause of such a rude awakening to such awful, depicted dangers? Why has not this thing occurred to us before? Is it because we have been blind these many years, blissfully ignorant of some mighty danger which has hovered o'er us? Do we really hear the ominous mutterings of the black cloud of war ever drawing near us? Is the danger signal true or is it imaginary? The normal mind, reasoning from cause to effect, would naturally arrive at the conclusion that when all the other nations of the world have so exhausted themselves, have so bankrupted their treasuries, have so burdened future generations with debts heretofore undreamed of that they can fight no longer, our danger from assault from any of them would be so much lessened. But this hysteria reasons exactly in the opposite direction. It says that we should treble our normal war strength immediately; that while we have never had the slightest fear of any live nation, we must treble our naval and military power to be able to defend ourselves against a half-dead one. We know this extraordinary departure from our old policy can not be intended to meet any exigency that could arise out of this war, because it would take five years to construct the warships and create the proposed Army, and these warring nations will be exhausted long before five years.

Mr. President, there is a very widespread error that this vast increase in the size of our Navy is to meet exigencies that may arise during this great war. We do not stop to consider that it would be about two years before the first battleship or cruiser would be in existence. Of course, there never has been a time and never can be a time when we could not have a war if we were bound to make one, for any nation will battle to defend itself. But that is not the argument used to excite public sentiment to support this extraordinary war power. It is the scare of invasion—of our own cities sacked, of tribute exacted, of unprepared armies demolished on our own soil. We are asserting that we are unprepared to defend ourselves. We may admit that we are not prepared to land 10,000,000 soldiers in Germany or Russia. But, Mr. President, we will never have occasion to land soldiers there. The screaming headlines of the press all deal with the terrible inadequacy of our defenses. The President simply declares that there is danger of a war. He does not say whether offensive or defensive. While he asserts in one speech that no sensible man will believe for a moment that any nation will attempt to invade us, he asserts in another that our coast line is so extensive that we could not protect it against invasion. I am not criticizing this inconsistency, but rather attempting to allay the excitement which fails to note such inconsistency.

Mr. President, if war comes it must come through the declaration of Congress. If we are to raise billions for armaments, Congress must vote the appropriations and levy the taxes. Therefore, Congress should be the judge of the necessity and of the propriety of changing our historical attitude of allowing nations whose conditions necessitate it to continue the crushing weight of armaments, while we, blessed by nature in our isolation and invulnerability, could direct our greater energies along the pathway of peace and progress.

DANGERS FROM FOREIGN POWERS.

Mr. President, it takes two nations to make war. If we are liable at any moment to get into a war with another country, then it behooves us to prepare for it. But do you not really think that it might be well for us, before we vote for an extraordinary program, to ask ourselves what country we are liable to have a war with? And would it be unpatriotic for us to pause another moment to measure the comparative strength and comparative weakness of that other nation with our own, for certainly the comparative war efficacy of two nations must be determined by the sum total of the strength and weakness of each. And as reasoning human beings may we not assume that before another nation would permit itself to get into war with us, if it could help it, it would take measurement of both the comparative strength and weakness of the two countries; that before the spaniel tackles the mastiff he will stop to consider, not which can get the first bite, but which in all probability will take the last one. Mr. President, we can not have a war without an enemy. Let us suppose that the enemy is Great Britain. First let us look at our supposed enemy from our own side of the water. There is a country whose very life depends on maintaining her merchant marine and her channels of trade all over the whole world. If she had three times her present navy, she could not protect that commerce against us. With practically all the German battleships locked up in the Baltic, the sun scarcely sets on a day that does not chronicle the sinking of from one to six British merchantmen. In her war against Germany she has to guard only two little passageways to prevent the escape of German cruisers or submarines—the Strait of Skagerak, only about 60 miles wide, and the mouth of the Kiel. If she can not with her vast navy guard this narrow strait, tell me how can she guard her merchant marine over the entire earth from foes which may approach from all parts of the vast ocean.

The President in one of his addresses speaks of our weakness due to the vast coast line of the country. Why, Mr. President, in a battle against a naval power that vast coast line is a bulwark of enormous strength, not a weakness. Battleships are not for coast defenses, their use is on the broad ocean. Our land batteries and our submarines and our mines will take care of the coast. With half a thousand inlets from which submarines or cruisers could emerge to play upon British commerce, how impotent, how useless would be the entire naval armament of Great Britain to protect her merchant marine! If we have three or four thousand miles of coast that may be assaulted, we have just that many miles of coast which must be guarded against by an enemy navy. The moment Great Britain would accept our challenge to war our cruisers would scatter over the ocean in search of her merchantmen. While she would be attempting to guard the escape from New York or Charlestown or New Orleans we would be sending cruisers from San Francisco, Portland, and Seattle; we would be sending submarines to attack her warships and merchantmen from a hundred other ports. Looking to the northward, we could send an army of such size as to crush all resistance of her principal colony, Canada. It would be impossible for her in case of war with the United States to land a sufficient number of men to defend that Province. Great Britain's stake would be too heavy, the assurance of defeat too certain, for her to ever court war with the United States or to permit one if she could with national honor prevent it. I do not think that Great Britain has ever conducted a war where her sacrifices have not been double those of the enemy. Her maritime situation makes this so. With this great country as her enemy her sacrifices would be multiplied many times over.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. VARDAMAN in the chair). Will the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. McCUMBER. Certainly

Mr. SUTHERLAND. The Senator has suggested that in case we might be at war with Great Britain we could send cruisers and submarines and various other battleships from a very large number of points upon both coasts. In order to do that we would have to have the cruisers and battleships and submarines first, would we not?

Mr. McCUMBER. Oh, yes. I am in favor of a sufficient number of them.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I did not know.

Mr. McCUMBER. But I am considering the possibility of Great Britain attempting to attack us, becoming the aggressive power—attempting to invade our territory.

In peace, in order to live, she has had to battle the storms of ocean. There are more English bones lying in the bottom of the sea than those of any other nation or all nations of the world. There are more English ships sleeping beneath the oceans than the ships of all other countries.

If Great Britain has been mistress of the seas, she has paid the toll with her British dead. The lines of Kipling come to us with mighty force as we contemplate her history:

We have fed the seas for a thousand years
And she calls us, still unfed,
For there's never a wave of all her waves
But marks our English dead.
We have strawed our best to the weeds' unrest,
To the sharks and the shearing gull.
If blood be the price of admiralty,
Lord God, we ha' paid in full.

And, Mr. President, as we look over the list of British warships and British merchantmen that have been sunk to date in this war, with practically all their crews and passengers sent down to death, we begin to realize the astounding truth so graphically portrayed by that great author:

There's never a flood goes shoreward now
But lifts a keel we've manned;
There's never an ebb goes seaward now
But drops our dead on the sand;
But slings our dead on the sands forlore,
From the Ducies to the Swin.
If blood be the price of admiralty,
Lord God, we ha' paid it in.

Happy, indeed, Mr. President, is the situation of that country whose internal resources are such that all her food and clothing and all those elements which make for convenience and comforts can be produced within her own borders, and thrice happy should she be in her security if with all of these resources she be separated by thousands of miles of ocean from any other great power that might desire to threaten her. No nation on the face of the earth can compare in these respects with the United States.

On the other hand, most dangerous and precarious is the lot of that nation whose territory can furnish but a meager proportion of the necessities of life and the lives of whose millions of population must rest on the ability of the nation to bring from across the oceans and from every land under the sun the raw materials for her factories, to keep open every channel of trade on the globe, that her people may be fed and clothed.

That is the position which fate has imposed upon the people of Great Britain. There is reason and necessity in the policy of Great Britain to keep her navy equal to any two navies of the great powers of Europe. The life of that little island demands it. That is why Great Britain has bent every effort to maintain a mighty navy and a comparatively small army. Her navy is maintained, not for aggression, not because she desires a navy that can punish or conquer in an aggressive war the navies of any two countries, but for the defense of her vital interests should she be attacked by any two great naval powers, and big as that navy is, it is none too great to insure and guard her bread line.

Our condition and necessities for a mighty Navy are not only not similar but are exactly the reverse of Great Britain's. We are not dependent in any respect upon the outside world. It follows, Mr. President, that the declaration of the Executive, that we need a Navy as powerful as that of any other country, if the papers properly quote him, is not well founded. The creation of such a Navy would contravene the rule founded upon reason, that all preparedness should measure up to the necessities of our situation; and that means sufficient to protect the vital interests of the country. We should not stop short of this requirement in our preparedness, and we should not burden the people in an attempt to go way beyond it as has been proposed.

Admiral Grant, in his testimony, says in substance that there is but one country in the world whose navy might enable her to make a landing of soldiers on American shores, and that there was no danger of that nation trying. He referred to Great Britain. When asked why, he stated in substance, the friendliness of the two nations and the lack of anything to fight about. I think his answer savored a bit more of diplomacy than of the greater reason, that Great Britain would measure the cost of such a step, and would never give a real cause for war.

No, Mr. President, we could force war upon Great Britain. We could force it by making unjust demands. Great Britain, with her peculiar weaknesses, with her vulnerable position and dependence upon the outside world, can not and will not ever do more than make a defensive war against us. The population of Great Britain is about 40,000,000, the United States about 100,000,000. The estimated wealth of Great Britain is about $80,000,000,000, the United States about $200,000,000,000.

COMPARATIVE POWERS.

Great Britain, by arming her last available man, might place an army of 4,000,000 men in the field. To meet these we could assemble a host of 10,000,000 men. Great Britain would be compelled to transport these 4,000,000 men, with supplies and ammunition, across the ocean and maintain an unbroken transport line. Were she four times more powerful she never could do it. Even though we watched with folded hands and complacent smile she could not land more than 150,000 a month. Through scouts, through wireless we would know every moment of the day just where those ships were located. Great Britain would have to drive those ships through our mines and under our guns in every port. No; that is an error, for not a transport could ever get within a hundred miles of a port before it would be sent to the bottom by a submarine. But, you say, some of those dreadnaughts have guns of superior power and range to those on our shore batteries. Well, then, increase the size of our shore guns. If one shot from one of their vessels should by any possibility find a shore battery it might dig a hole in the earthworks; if one of our shells should find a man-of-war the chances are ten to one that the dreadnaught, with its thousands on board, and with its $18,000,000 of cost, would go to the bottom of the sea. Do you believe the commander of a dreadnaught would take that unequal chance? They are not doing it in Europe to-day, and they never would do it. No, Mr. President, while the history of British wars is replete with official blunders in all her battles from Hastings to Gallipoli, I could never believe that country, so great in so many respects, would ever be guilty of such assinine stupidity as to attempt the invasion of this vast country.

And if, Mr. President, under normal conditions Great Britain would be comparatively weak as compared with us, what must her position be to make war or even defend herself against us in war by the time the present raging conflict ceases?

Lloyd George declared in Parliament the other day that the war had cost the belligerents so far $40,000,000,000. England's contribution to that war is now $25,000,000 per day and her expenses increasing each day—$9,000,000,000 a year now, $10,000,000,000 next year. If the war should last four years in all, as it probably will unless some very great discovery, some new and very effective instrument of destruction shall sweep the British Navy from the sea, Great Britain's cost alone will be $40,000,000,000, or more than half of the estimated wealth of that Empire—a cost of about a thousand dollars for every man, woman, and child in the country, a mortgage of the par value on every acre in the island.

One year of submarine warfare sent to the bottom more than 800 merchantmen of the entente powers. According to the German report, up to November 1, 1915, 624 British ships, with a total tonnage of 1,231,944 tons, had been torpedoed, or about one-seventeenth of the entire merchant marine of Great Britain destroyed.

During the 18 months of war, the central powers have borrowed $11,000,000,000, the entente powers about $16,000,000,000.

During the first 18 months of the war, 3,000,000 men in the prime of life have been killed, two and a half million have been made prisoners, and ten million have been wounded. Great Britain, having a comparatively small army at the front, has lost about 625,000 men.

I have a statement here from the War Department giving the estimated casualties up to date of all of the nations engaged in the European war, which I will ask may be printed at the close of this address.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there is no objection, it will be so ordered.

The statement referred to will be found as Appendix A to Mr. McCUMBER's speech.

Mr. McCUMBER. At the beginning of this war Great Britain had of the predreadnaught class, mostly old and antedated, 40; we had of a newer type and of later construction, 22. Great Britain had of the later type of dreadnaught, 20; we had of that type and of a higher average rating for effectiveness, 8. During this war Great Britain has up to December last lost of her battleships, 8; she has lost 13 cruisers, 2 gunboats, 8 submarines, 5 destroyers, 3 torpedo boats, and 6 armed liners. She has lost to date about 700 merchantmen.

These are only those which are acknowledged to have been lost. This is the toll of Great Britain alone. Do you imagine she will do anything to challenge another war which might destroy her commerce altogether?

Can any sane man say that there is danger of Great Britain hazarding a war on us, even were it possible to stop the devastation on her ships and shipping to-day? Would she to-day court another enemy?

And yet, Mr. President, they tell us that when this war is over these nations will be so powerful that any one of them may make war on the United States. What an abominable falsehood to frighten unthinking men. Great Britain has borrowed to the limit in this country. In case of war with us where could she look for further credit, and how would she guard her bread lines?

Is it Germany that looms up a mighty figure on the mirage of our frightened vision as being ready to destroy us when her military prowess has enslaved all of Europe?

Germany before the war had of the dreadnaught type, 13; of the predreadnaught type, 20. She had 9 battle cruisers, as against our 11; she had 41 armored cruisers, as against our 14; 130 cruisers, as against our 51. Germany has lost since this war started—that has been conceded: Battleships, 1; cruisers of all classes, 24; gunboats, 9; submarines, 15; destroyers, 10; torpedo boats, 12; armed liners, 14.

Germany has lost practically all of her war vessels which were at sea, all except those protected under the guns of her batteries and her flotilla of submarines, and, in addition, practically all of her merchant marine; and yet we are trying to frighten ourselves with the idea that Germany has designs upon our peace and tranquillity.

Mr. President, I have here a statement from the Naval Intelligence Office showing the casualties of armed vessels of every character of all of the nations up to January 1, and how each vessel has been destroyed. It contains such important information in determining the kind and character of war vessels we should construct that I shall ask that it may be printed in the RECORD at the close of this address.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there be no objection, it will be so ordered.

The statement referred to will be found as Appendix B to Mr. McCUMBER's speech.

Mr. McCUMBER. So much, then, of the fighting strength of these nations is gone; so much, then, is lessened the possibility of either of these nations attempting an aggressive warfare against us while they are engaged in this war; and I am trying to make clear what the general public apparently fail to take cognizance of—that whatever we do now in the shape of increased military power can have no relation to this war because the work can scarcely be begun before the war is over.

Is there danger from Germany now, when she is engaged in a life and death struggle in Europe? Her commerce has been swept from the seas, her transports breast no ocean waves, and her dreadnaughts hide behind the mines and under the great guns of her harbors. Only her submarines are dealing destruction to the enemies' commerce. Is it Germany that we fear? I admit that if we insist upon dictating how Germany shall conduct her war against her enemies in every particular she might refuse and we could declare war on her; but that will not happen, and, if it should happen, this five years' program would not help us now.

Is it Great Britain? She is struggling as never before to protect her commerce, and in the face of her most strenuous efforts not a day passes but that from one to seven of her merchant vessels go down to death, stung by this new serpent of the seas. Can she go to war with the United States? Can she invite a further devastation.

Is it France? About a third of her territory is to-day in the hands of the enemy. Trench after trench is being wrested from her, with no present prospect of regaining an inch of her conquered territory. Can she turn from the foe in front and meet another enemy behind, thrice her population and many times her resources?

Can Russia, with a large portion of her armies now prisoners of war to the Teutons, cultivating the fields of her enemies, and digging graves for their own brothers, turn her attention to us?

Can any one or all unloose their death grapple to battle with this country? Can Europe, slowly bleeding to death, meet this fresh, unwounded giant of the West?

Is it Japan? Can that little island of 45,000,000 people, poor of the poorest, with no credit on the face of the earth, her people still bending beneath the load of her last war tax, attempt to make war on a nation two and a half times her population, one hundred times her resources, and three hundred times her territory, can she hope to successfully invade us? Will the present war craze of Europe develop into such utter imbecility of either or any of the great nations that it would attempt an invasion of the United States?

HISTORIC LIES.

A witness before the House committee deplored the fact that our school histories are so false to the fact that they give the American boy an exalted idea of American fighting prowess which is not justified by the facts, and naturally inculcates the idea that we could whip the world without any preparation. I agree with him that the inferences drawn from our school histories are worse than lies. They are in many instances such silly lies that they dwarf the reasoning faculties.

I am astonished, however, that these critics fail to see the same exaggerations which are now filtering through the press and being sent home to the youth of the land in the "Battle Cry of Peace" and like productions going to the other extreme and impressing one with the idea that any little nation on the face of the earth can whip the United States; impressing him with the idea that the hundreds upon hundreds of millions of dollars spent in warships and coast defense has been money thrown away; that countries with not one-third of our population nor one-tenth of our resources—nations now nearly bleeding to death—are liable to attack and conquer us; giving us the idea of the horrors of a German invasion. Ought not these lies to be checked? If the old falsehood ought to be re-formed out of our histories, why should not the new ones be re-formed out of the press of the country? I want the boy in our public school to know that when we fought the battles of the Revolution we battled against brave and valorous soldiers, and that we were not chasing cowards and imbeciles, as our school histories would indicate. So, too, I want him to understand—and it might be well for his father to also understand—that this country, with its more than a hundred millions population, the wealthiest, best-fed, and most comfortably clad people in the world, would probably be doing something itself while another nation of half or a third its powers would be capturing its great cities and enslaving its inhabitants. It might be well for him to look at the weaknesses of our supposed adversary before going into hysterics over some inadequately protected port. If we find a place where the other nation can strike us a blow, it might be well for us just to stop to see the hundreds of places where we can strike a death blow, and then use our judgment as to whether this other nation will jeopardize its very existence because it sees some opportunity where if it should strike when we were not looking it might scratch our face a little.

For a century Great Britain has had a navy twice as powerful as our own, and it never occurred to us in all these years that we were in any danger. We knew where we could strike and strike home, and she knew it also. We have never had a fort or warship between us and the British possessions for about a century. Why? Because she knew and we knew how futile such forts would be with 3,500 miles which could be crossed, and we knew we had no fear of invasion from Canada. These conditions and these reasons have not changed in the slightest degree. But it is declared that because of our naval weakness some of the warring nations are infringing upon our commercial rights.

WARRING NATIONS WILL AVOID WAR WITH US.

Mr. President, no nation is pursuing a policy detrimental to our interests because of our military or naval weakness. Every warring nation knows that if we should throw the weight of our great prowess against either of the nearly balanced forces now at war it would mean the quick defeat of the power against which it should be hurled. These nations are holding persistently to their claims because they believe they are within their just rights, not, perhaps, measured by international law heretofore obtaining, but by the stern necessities of their several situations in this war. With them it is a question of life or death, and each one of them is asking us to view the case in its peculiar circumstances and conditions, and each one is relying upon us to insist upon no mere technical right which, if accorded, would mean defeat to it.

Each nation is attempting to make us see its own desperate situation as it sees and knows it. Each one feels that to weaken any special advantage which it may have, to overcome or equalize the special advantage of its foe, to loosen its grip upon the throat of the other, would mean its own death. Each appeals to us not to use our strong arm to neutralize or destroy its special means of aggression or defense.

Under such circumstances, ought not every principle of justice, humanity, and fairness demand of us that we do not stand with rigid and austere attitude, demanding the last ounce of the pound of flesh which we may by international law exact? Do we not owe a higher duty to ourselves, under the peculiar circumstances of these nations, than the insistence upon every possible recognized right? Ought we not to put ourselves in the position of Germany and Austria, with commerce raided and destroyed, surrounded by foes, and ask ourselves what we would do under the same circumstances? Ought we not to put ourselves for a moment in the position of Great Britain and France, whose territory has been slowly but surely invaded by the Teuton allies, and whose merchantmen are going down to death at the rate of more than a thousand a year, and ask ourselves what we would do to prevent supplies going to the enemy—put ourselves in the position we were in during the Civil War, when not a copper penny was allowed by us to enter through a southern port?

I insist, Mr. President, that there are far higher duties which the Government owes to its own people, to its own sense of integrity and justice, than to demand in their name from the suffering, struggling nations every possible commercial or traveling right. There are higher duties it owes to its people than to exact the last drop of blood to which it might be entitled from the unhappy nations of Europe.

But the President says that war may be with us to-morrow. What does he mean? We know the other nations can not make war on us to-morrow. He must, therefore, mean that we are liable to make war on any one of them to-morrow. We are the only country, except possibly Japan, that can make war to-day. And my belief is that we will not have occasion to make it. I am not unmindful that of late years the American people have strayed very far from that spirit of the Constitution which provides that Congress and not the President should be the lawmaker. I will admit that Congress itself, in its growing servility, has allowed its functions to be usurped by the Executive, until it has become but the tool to convert presidential programs into law. But, thank God, we have one safeguard in that old Constitution left, which I believe Congress will respect. That safeguard is that Congress and not the President shall determine and declare war, and on that I pin my faith that, while war scares may be indulged in for political effect or business profits, the people are powerful enough to prevent this country from making a cowardly assault on any of the unhappy, bleeding nations of Europe. But "our rights," cry the tom-tom performers.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER [Mr. OVERMAN in the chair]. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. McCUMBER. Certainly.

Mr. BORAH. Before the Senator leaves the point which he has been discussing, I desire to ask him a question. What is the position of a neutral nation in the midst of a conflict such as that which is now prevailing in Europe with reference to maintaining neutral rights? The Senator says that we should yield to this nation and to that nation and should place ourselves in the position of this nation and that nation, and not maintain, with too much exactness at least, the rights of neutrals. Would the Senator go so far as to say that——

Mr. McCUMBER. I want to answer that part first. That is what the Senator says I said.

Mr. BORAH. Did I misunderstand the Senator?

Mr. McCUMBER. I think so.

Mr. BORAH. Well, I understood the Senator to say that we should not exact the last pound of flesh. I take it by that that he was speaking in a figurative and imaginative way to the proposition that we should not insist upon a strict regard for the rights of neutrals. Was I correct in that?

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I have stated that we should be charitable and ought to take into consideration the desperate conditions of the warring nations, and not insist upon every inconsequential right. That is perhaps as succinct as I can make it.

Mr. BORAH. But the time would come, I think, even under the Senator's philosophy, when we would have to assert our rights. While we should not be exacting, yet in substantial matters we could only yield so far. The encroachment could be so great and so marked that the time would come when we would have to be prepared to take care of ourselves.

Mr. McCUMBER. Then we would take care of ourselves; but let us remember what I have been stating, that so far as this program—and I am not speaking of the program which has been reported or which is likely to be reported to the Senate, but of the program demanded by a great many people—that so far as that program is concerned it can not affect any immediate conditions, because it would take at least two years before the first ship would be constructed under it. So that the whole idea of our building a mighty fighting machine, in my opinion, looks beyond this war.

Mr. BORAH. I am inclined to agree with the Senator that we would not perhaps under this program be ready to take care of an immediate situation, but it is not the immediate situation which appeals to me; it is the situation which confronts a great Nation like this, whose commerce is ramifying all parts of the earth, and which is most likely in time, in my judgment, to have some misunderstandings with different nations of the earth. The best way to insure peace, the best way to insure respect, is to be prepared for war. Of course, we are not to seek for war, but can we maintain our rights and protect our citizens unless we have reasonable preparation to that end?

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I do not think there is any disagreement with the Senator upon that proposition. We all stand for the rigid enforcement of vital interests and important rights, but there never occurs a war in which one nation or the other in the desperation of its conflict does not strain or pass over the strict line of international rights; and where such questions can be settled without conflict we certainly ought not to make them a cause of war.

Mr. BORAH. Precisely, and that has been the history of this country for 125 years. I do not at all wish to change our policy of a peaceful Nation.

Mr. McCUMBER. Yes; and I wish it to remain so.

Mr. BORAH. I think it is going to remain so; but, notwithstanding it has been the policy of this country from the beginning to settle matters without difficulty and without conflict, the Father of our Country and practically all of his successors have said that the way to avoid conflict is to be prepared for conflict in case there is a disposition to encroach upon our rights.

Mr. McCUMBER. Why, Mr. President, that is just what I stated in the beginning of this address—that we should be prepared to meet any probable contingency; and I certainly shall support war measures that will meet that requirement. It is simply a question as to how far we need to go.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. McCUMBER. In just a moment. I insist that our condition, our size, our ability to produce everything within our own borders, should be taken into consideration in the question of the size of the Navy; and I insist that it is not necessary for the life and protection of this country that we should have a navy on the Atlantic larger than that of Great Britain and on the Pacific larger than that of any Asiatic power.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President——

Mr. McCUMBER. I now yield to the Senator from Mississippi.

Mr. VARDAMAN. In answer to the question propounded by the Senator from Idaho, I ask, Has this country been prepared in the past to defend its rights? If it has been prepared and if it has done those things which are necessary to uphold the rights of the country and its citizens, it seems to me a very safe assertion that 125 years of experience might be worth something in lighting the way for our conduct in the future.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, that is true; but the last time we had to meet a situation of any moment from a foreign foe we were not prepared, and we got badly hurt and had the Capitol here at Washington burned.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Certainly not.

Mr. BORAH. It was a war only on one side, and that was the other side.

Mr. McCUMBER. I thought it ended rather favorable to our side. But, irrespective of that, in 1812 Great Britain's population was about two and one-half times greater than ours; in 1916 our population is about two and one-half times greater than that of Great Britain. The conditions are reversed in our favor.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. McCUMBER. I do.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Before the Senator resumes the thread of his argument, I should like to invite his attention for a moment to a statement he made a moment or two ago, in which he was contrasting the population and the resources of this country with other countries with which we might be likely to come into conflict. He said what was quite accurate, that Great Britain had a population of 40,000,000, and we had a population of 100,000,000, and Japan had a population of about 45,000,000. Now, I ask the Senator whether or not in his judgment, upon reflection, that is after all a very valuable comparison?

Mr. McCUMBER. In the matter of invasion of the country of 100,000,000 by a country of 45,000,000, it is a most important factor.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Let me call the Senator's attention to the fact that China has a population of 400,000,000, four times as much as ours.

Mr. McCUMBER. Yes.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. And yet little Japan had no difficulty whatever in invading China in spite of her overwhelming population, almost ten times as great as that of Japan. After all, is not the proper comparison that of the fighting strength? If Japan has an army of trained men a million strong, and we have an army of 60,000 or 65,000, notwithstanding our great population, is not Japan in a better condition from a military point of view than we are?

Mr. McCUMBER. Why, yes; if that was all we could raise to meet them.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Is she not more likely, if the conditions are not equalized, to win in a contest than we would be?

Mr. McCUMBER. Oh, not finally; of course not. We would more than equalize her number. But I was comparing one branch of the Caucasian race with another. I could scarcely place the American people in the category of the Chinese people, and therefore I do not think the illustration is very pertinent.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Connecticut?

Mr. McCUMBER. Just one moment. On the question of an invasion—and all this defense talk is on the question of invasion; we are defending against some imaginary enemy—I think our 100,000,000 American people would be able to take care of any part of that 45,000,000 that must cross the ocean, and must keep up a line of communication to maintain themselves.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Let me remind the Senator that I was instituting a comparison between two oriental peoples, between two Asiatic powers.

Mr. McCUMBER. Well, they are not much alike.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. My comparison was between Japan upon the one side and China upon the other. One was prepared and the other was not.

Mr. McCUMBER. You might as well make a comparison between a pack of wolves and a flock of sheep.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Then, Mr. President, let us make a different comparison, as between Japan transporting its army across the sea and whipping Russia, and whipping her finally.

Mr. McCUMBER. In the first place, Japan did not have to transport her soldiers very far. Secondly, Russia had to bring hers on one line of railroad a vast distance, and Russia was hardly in condition for a real war at that time.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. She was in as much condition as we are.

Mr. McCUMBER. I should hate to think that.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I hate to think it, too, but I believe it.

Mr. McCUMBER. If so, Mr. President, then the Senator and myself and others have been voting away an enormous number of millions of dollars that have been of no practical use to us.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. We will have to vote more. I do not know of how much use it will be.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. McCUMBER. Certainly.

Mr. THOMAS. I have been greatly interested in the discourse of the Senator from North Dakota, and am in accord with many of its important features, particularly that which has reference to the relative strength of the navies. In this connection I desire to ask the Senator if his attention has been called to the testimony of Admirals Fletcher and Badger before the House Committee on Naval Affairs in December, 1914, on which occasion they were examined by the late Judge Witherspoon, from Mississippi, who, in my judgment, knew more about the Navy and every feature of it and of other navies than any man in public life? If not, I think it is very appropriate, because it is quite short, to read into the RECORD, in connection with the Senator's remarks, what was there said about the strength of the American Navy.

Mr. McCUMBER. Would the Senator just as soon put it at the end of my address, where I have placed other records concerning the comparative strength of the navies, and so forth, so that the two will be together?

Mr. THOMAS. It is entirely as the Senator shall determine with reference to that.

Mr. McCUMBER. I think it had better go there, because we will have the whole thing right there together then, as I shall put in a further record showing the comparative strength.

Mr. THOMAS. It is such a complete and perfect refutation of the present contention that we have a weak Navy, drawn from the reluctant lips of some of those now so contending, that it is extremely appropriate as a part of the Senator's address.

Mr. McCUMBER. I have heard a great deal of what our naval men think ought to be done in the construction of ships. I read some time ago what they said in reference to the submarines—that they were practically useless, and never would be of any material value. I read a good many things that they said that have not just exactly proved accurate in the present European war.

Mr. President, in the midst of this carnage, while each nation believes its very life hangs on its aggressive and defensive measures, we hear them shout "We can not carry on our business just as we did when the sun of peace smiled over that land.

Our commerce and our freedom of travel have been interfered with and we must make these nations yield to our demands; we must by force maintain our self-respect."

Talk to me about maintaining our self-respect by insisting upon every possible legal right in such a contest as this. Can a grown man who would strike to death a drowning child because in its frantic struggles for life it may spatter water on him, retain his self-respect? Can a great Nation like ours pounce upon one of these combatants because it is trying to do those things which it regards absolutely necessary for the maintenance of its life, because it may differ with our ideas as to what international law now is, or as to the full and complete rights of shipping goods destined ultimately to belligerents, because it is doing just what we would probably do were we so sorely pressed and beset?

No, Mr. President, we do not need to deviate from our course of orderly progressive development of our Navy because of any new danger of assault on us. Every thinking man knows that so far as defensive war is concerned, we are safer to-day than ever before in our history.

What then does this cry for excessive preparedness mean? I am not speaking now of the preparedness that we ought to have, but this enormous preparedness, capable of cowing the entire earth. I shall not speak now of the support it receives from those who wish to make munitions and armor plate, nor of those army and navy leagues, who may desire that we shall at all times be in a position to make other nations tremble at our prowess. I know there are many in the country who wish an enormous navy that we may bully Great Britain. I know there are many who want an enormous navy to cow Germany. I regret that the hatreds of the one or the animosities of the other should influence any one in this great question. Standing squarely for those rights which clear justice and true neutrality demand, we should not be severely punctilious in the assertion of inconsequential rights. I should expect such clemency and consideration to be exercised by the neutral nations during this conflict as would be exercised by individuals under like circumstances.

What I want to get at is the administration's sudden conversion to a military and naval policy which he and his party have always condemned. The history of our diplomatic relations with the belligerent powers since this war began foreshadows the real purpose, which has so far been adroitly hidden, or at least but half revealed. The purpose of the administration in abandoning our ancient policy of steady but healthy growth of our Navy and of maintaining such a standing army as is necessary for a peace footing, and in a single leap suddenly demanding a navy that can overcome any other navy in the world and an army that will rival the militarism of any power of continental Europe, is that we may compel any one of the fighting nations by a show of our teeth to accede to our view as to what commercial rights may be to our financial interest to insist upon, no matter though the insistence upon such rights would sound the death knell of such other nation.

That seems to be the purpose of this preparedness program—offensive, not defensive, preparedness. It seems to be the same spirit that harried Huerta to his death and continued the reign of terror in Mexico for years; that regarded the overthrow of Huerta to satisfy an animosity as of more consequence than the peace of Mexico. If it is the high destiny of this great country of ours that it is to be the one supreme dictator of the world, then, of course, we must maintain the proposed armament. If our influence is to be maintained by a show of force rather than by a spirit of justice, then we must have our Army and Navy more powerful than any other country.

Mr. President, we hear very much about the training of men, of the necessity for years of practice and drill. We cling to an old idea long after its reason has departed. When practically all battles were fought by the weight and force of human impact, when each section of an army must adjust its movement to those of another, must load and fire its guns with the precision of a single unit, long drilling was necessary. But how are battles fought to-day? They are fought with spade and pick, with burrowing and mining, with gases and fire jets and curtains of fire, with desultory firing, with long-range and immense siege guns, and with short-range and deadly machine guns.

Kitchener, speaking of the recruits being raised in Great Britain, said: "I don't care whether they know the right foot from the left; I want them to learn to shoot and shoot true." And, Mr. President, I know enough about shooting to know that a man can learn to shoot and shoot true in three months or he never can learn.

No, Mr. President, the wars of to-day mean chemistry, science, mathematics, everlasting study, and the highest degree of mental training on the part of the officers. No private soldier of one nation is so superior in courage or fighting qualities to the other. It is a question of governmental support and of official acumen. The volunteer has given just as good account of himself as the trained veteran.

NEED COMPETENT OFFICERS RATHER THAN EXTRA TRAINING OF MEN.

Mr. President, if we have any grounds for alarm because of inefficient training, we would better direct our attention to the training of the officers rather than of the private soldiers. If there is any one thing that this war has brought home to us with greater force than any other, it is the unpreparedness of the officers of the armies and navies rather than the unpreparedness of the men. And next to that is the nonsense of stage setting Army drills.

Germany is the only country engaged in this war that has had fully competent commanders, and next to Germany is France; and what has that meant to Germany? To-day she has 1,500,000 prisoners—a sufficient number to perform all of the labor necessary to produce all the food for her people and her armies. And these prisoners are not mobs who have not had training. They did not become prisoners because of their inefficiency. On the contrary, they are for the most part the regulars—the trained soldiers of Russia, of France, and of England—men who can step perfectly and obey commands. German learning, careful and complete study, led the half-informed officers of the allies again and again into traps, and the poor private soldiers could do nothing but obey the commands of their superior officers to surrender. It does not require any great amount of training to instruct an army of men how to stack their arms and surrender themselves to the enemy. All of the successes of this war have been successes won by science and skill of officers, coupled with superior guns, and not through any predominating valor or training of the soldiers of any particular army.

In the beginning of the war Russian leaders threw their armies among the lakes and marshes of east Prussia, every foot of which was known to German military men, and every means of entrapping the enemy therein had been worked out by them with mathematical accuracy. And before Russian generals and other officers had the faintest idea of what was happening they were securely netted and a quarter of a million of the flower of the Russian Army were German prisoners.

Austria was again and again defeated by the overwhelming numbers of Russian infantry, but when German officers took the command the tide of battle turned. Science won the day. Great Britain, true to her ancient record, has added horror after horror to the incapacity of her admirals and her generals.

As we look back over the military history of that plucky little island—and no nation furnishes braver men—from the Battle of Hastings, where again and again the brave Saxons were led by a feint of the Normans to follow a seeming retreat only to be closed in upon and annihilated, all the way down to the shocking failure of the Gallipoli Peninsula affair, we find a history of blunders, not blunders of the men but blunders of the officers. Those blunders turned to our advantage when Great Britain failed to feed and support her American armies. Those blunders manifested themselves in the abandonment of armies to their fate in India, the failure to support Gen. Gordon in Africa.

She has lived and been successful in the world through the sturdy fighting qualities of her common soldiery, their ability to suffer and die, their courage and tenacity. The Duke of Wellington speaks contemptuously of the army which won the Battle of Waterloo. Victor Hugo, a Frenchman, gives the credit of the victory to the raw recruits of Great Britain who had never before handled a musket. Britain raises a mighty monument to Wellington, forgetful that its foundation is the cement of the blood and bone of her common soldiery.

What more pitiful admission than that made by Kitchener himself, when, after visiting the front at the Dardanelles, he declared that he never knew there were such obstacles to be overcome! The duty of a commander is to know. German officers did know, and from the very beginning they prophesied the collapse of this enterprise.

Winston Churchill at the very beginning of the war declared that the British Navy would hunt the German Navy out of its holes like rats; and it started out to do so, but mines and submarines beset the dreadnaughts and the rats are still there, and every once in a while one slips out of its hole and the first knowledge the British Admiralty has of that fact is the sinking of a dozen or so of her merchantmen, the capture of her great liners. Those officers were brave enough, but the evidence of inefficiency is very strong at least.

I do not know whether our officers of the Army and Navy measure up to the Germans. I have no means of knowing; I simply know that all of their prophecies, so far as I have heard them, concerning the war in Europe have proven untrue. I know they founded their faith on the mighty dreadnaughts and scoffed the little submarine. I do not know how much time they give each day to the study of a possible world-wide war and all its possible details. I simply know that the ordinary human machine is not so constructed that it can tango during the night and study very hard the next day. And I know also that this war teaches that a knowledge of the topography of a vast section of the earth is necessary.

I am coming more and more to the belief, Mr. President, that we are depending altogether too much on what we call expert testimony to guide our policy.

The average expert, holding closely to details, rutted in some theory, is liable to overlook great governing principles. He can make computation of how Germany can land a million of men in this country in a given number of months, provided we do nothing in the meantime, without stopping to consider the foolhardiness of Germany adopting that most dangerous method of striking at us—a method which would secure for her ultimate defeat, with no ultimate end to be gained, and where she could accomplish much more in another direction with less danger to herself. I may not be able to give these naval officers advice, but I can remember when they scoffed at the submarine idea, and what few we did construct were forced down their reluctant throats. And those submarines in this war, measured by the amount of money expended upon them, have accomplished a thousandfold more than any other type of warcraft.

I am not overconfident that the Army or Navy officer can give me reliable advice in all matters pertaining to his own vocation. I think he is too liable to get into a rut himself, too liable to hang to world traditions and world customs long since worn out. The danger of every kind of organ created by man is that it gets to running into certain grooves, which it never gets out of until it is pried out by some other force. The sword, which had outlived its usefulness more than a century ago, must still be worn because it was one time used. The bayonet had its particular use when firearms had not been perfected as they are to-day. The little automatic revolver, which could be worn with ease and which would be worth a hundred bayonets at bayonet range, has no place in warfare, because it does not show off in parade.

So far in naval warfare the most effective work has been accomplished by the little fighting craft. In my own candid judgment, if we would take the $15,000,000 which it costs to construct one dreadnaught, with, say, 15 big guns, and expend it instead in 15 smaller swift war vessels, capable of carrying and handling one big gun each, they would be ten times as effective as your $15,000,000 dreadnaught, but, of course, they would not be so imposing in a naval parade. I have always believed that in actual warfare the swift armored cruisers, with long-range guns, were far more useful than the great dreadnaughts which would sink if they received a jar. Heretofore our naval strategist has stuck to the dreadnaught and underestimated the smaller craft, and they are practically doing the same now because they insist even to-day that the real fighting force of the Navy must still be its dreadnaught. This war has demonstrated the dreadnaught to be a liability rather than an asset.

Mr. President, those who preach a navy big enough to crush any other two navies in the world, an army big enough to cow any other nation in the world, have proceeded in a very cunning way to blind the American public. None of them ever discuss the great question that should govern such wonderful preparedness. They content themselves in trying to show how we could be greatly injured by some foreign power. They do not stop to consider that the foreign power may have sense enough not to attempt to attack a country of this size and resources. They do not stop to consider what justification there could possibly be for any of those foreign powers warring with us. They do not stop to tell us the real condition of these countries or any of them for aggressive warfare after they are through with their present blood-letting process. They picture them with armies landing in every port of this great country. They tell us that with such an immense coast line we must have a comparatively immense Navy to defend it. They carefully conceal from us the fact that from every port on this immense coast line could issue submarines and war vessels and that the enemy would have just that many more places that it must also guard. They do not tell us what our own submarines and cruisers might be doing to the commerce of the other nation and to their troop transports while they would be engaged in the folly of attempting to land troops on our soil. They do not explain to us exactly how Great Britain, with about 40,000,000 people and with her very life depending upon taking care of her channels of ocean trade, could spend her energies in landing troops away from her base of supplies in a vast country reaching from the Atlantic to the Pacific and containing more than 100,000,000 people. There is no mention made of what we would be doing. The man who does any thinking knows that Great Britain will never wage a war with us except it be a wholly defensive one on her part.

Mr. President, 16 years ago on the floor of the Senate I propounded to the chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs the question of why about every five years, or about the time that any warship should be completed, it should be found to be out of date, not sufficiently powerful, and armed with guns of too short a range; why it was not better for us to look ahead, to go at once to the full limit of possibilities in speed and carrying power of our naval guns and coast-defense guns, rather than each year trying to go a little step ahead of some other nation? I have never received an answer to that question, although 20 years ago the necessity of cruisers more speedy than those of any of the enemy, of guns more powerful than those of the enemy, was just as apparent as it is to-day. We could have crossed that gap at one bound just as well as to spend hundreds of millions for vessels which would be antedated before completed. But we followed the advice of our naval board, and now we are complaining of the comparative inadequacy of our Navy.

The scare-head lines of our press call attention to the fact that our coast guns can not carry as far as the guns of some of the heavier dreadnaughts. Very well; that is easily remedied; make them bigger. No one objects to that; everyone would vote for that. And while we are about it, make them larger than any other gun that was ever made. Take time by the forelock and reach the limit in the beginning.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. McCUMBER. Certainly.

Mr. THOMAS. In his testimony before the Committee on Military Affairs Gen. Weaver, who is in command of the Coast Artillery, testified that our coast defenses are the best in the world, and that all that is needed to make them effective is a greater force of men and the increase of the trajectory of the guns; that that done they would have no superior, even with the present size of guns, anywhere in the world.

Mr. McCUMBER. I am glad to hear it, Mr. President, because I saw in the New York papers, but a very short time ago in one of their scare articles, that any one of those great dreadnaughts could be out at sea and destroy the city of New York, as we did not have a coast gun that could reach them. I did not believe it at the time, but that is the stuff that is being fed to the American people; that is the stuff that we gather in this Battle Cry of Peace play that pictures New York in the hands of the Germans.

Everyone will agree to vote the money necessary for purposes of defense. If you are fearful of some nation half our size attempting to land men and support them in a country of our territorial dimensions, just build enough submarines to make it too hazardous for any nation to so attempt. There will be no one objecting to such preparedness for defense.

But when it comes to demanding that we impose upon our people, even though we can stand it, such a burden as has been imposed upon the peoples of Europe to maintain a navy armament as large as the largest in one ocean and half as large again in the other we then have a right to ask the reasons. Germany does not need as large a navy as Great Britain in order to live. The reason is manifest. She can live—with great economy, we may admit—though cut off from the rest of the world. Great Britain can not live six months under such conditions. Her very life depends on her keeping open the channels of ocean trade. Her people must be fed and they must be clothed, and she can not produce enough to clothe and feed them. Her policy of a navy big enough to cope with any two nations of Europe is a sane policy just so long as nations settle their differences by the gauge of battle. No such condition confronts the United States. We not only can produce everything that is necessary for our people to live on, but we can produce it ten times over. We could live and be prosperous if there was nothing else in the world but ourselves. Our life does not depend upon a great navy like that of Great Britain. The only purpose of such a navy would be to be able to crush any other country in the world, because with our size, our resources, and our population, and with such an army, we would have no difficulty in accomplishing that feat.

The knowledge of our potential power to-day by other nations of the world is so well understood that those nations would submit to any just demand rather than dare to wage war with us.

I do not mean that we could have our own way in everything. In the mighty struggle now going on across the ocean I have no doubt but that if we would make such demands on Germany as would spell defeat to her she would take her chances rather than submit to it. I have no doubt but that if we would make such demands upon Great Britain that it would be equivalent to pushing her off the plank on which she is now struggling in the waves of war she would fight us rather than go down to death without a fight. But neither of these countries and no other country in the world to-day is going to battle us unless we carry our demands of what we claim to be our rights outside the pale of international justice. We do not need a navy big enough to carry on a war of aggression on our part and overcome the biggest navy of the world. I go further and declare that we ought not to have such a navy. I can imagine no one thing that would be worse for a man than to be more powerful than all other men. I know of no more dangerous condition of a country from every moral standpoint than to be in a position where it knows that it is not responsible to world sentiment and fears no danger to itself. Such a condition is not necessary for the true advancement of any nation in the world and it is most detrimental to national character. Why, Mr. President, that is just what the world is claiming ails Germany, that her military power has made her a menace to world peace. We are all of the same Caucasian race, and the same cause will operate the same way.

If it would make Germany a menace to the world, it would make any other country having supreme power a menace to the peace of the world. Our citizenship is made up of Germans, English, Scandinavians, Irish, Scotch, Poles, Russians, Greeks, and Italians. They bring over to us the same characteristics that their ancestors had in their own homes. The same inherited characteristics under the same conditions which will produce the same results. If the mighty war power of Germany is a danger to the world, then putting us upon an equal condition in the world would undoubtedly detract from our peaceful proclivities.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to his colleague?

Mr. McCUMBER. Certainly.

Mr. GRONNA. Is it not possible that in speaking of the preparedness of Germany the public has been misinformed as to the appropriations made by that Government for the navy? I read the other day a statement, which I believe is true, that during the last decade we have appropriated $1,200,000,000 for our Navy and Germany during that same period has appropriated only $900,000,000.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. McCUMBER. I yield with pleasure.

Mr. THOMAS. Since 1901 our appropriations for naval purposes have exceeded those of any other nation except Great Britain.

Mr. McCUMBER. That is true.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President——

Mr. McCUMBER. I yield to my colleague.

Mr. GRONNA. If my colleague will pardon me, I simply want to add to what I said, that in that same statement I saw that during the time Germany had added in number to her craft 260 or more ships and the United States had added in number 64.

MILITARISM.

Mr. McCUMBER. I know at heart the American people are opposed to the militarism suggested in the program for a million soldiers ready for immediate action.

What do we mean by militarism? It means, first, a nonproducing official aristocracy, raised by the people themselves above themselves, maintained by the people by taxing themselves to support a society which pays no taxes itself, produces nothing itself, is freed from all anxieties and worries incident to the ordinary life of humanity, and is assured support throughout its entire existence, subject to no vicissitudes of success and failure that beset the path of the ordinary mortal—a caste that may retire from even the light duties of making reports or signing balance sheets at the age of 62 or 64 years, with salaries going on just the same, which salaries must be paid by those who have labored strenuously during a long life and who must still follow their trade until the working tools fall from the feeble hands of age.

It means throwing into our midst army and navy societies and auxiliary army and navy societies composed of wives and daughters, to conduct a campaign of movies and theatricals to increase their numbers and powers, to fill the country with lurid pictures of captured American citizens, their inhabitants enslaved by imaginary buccaneers, of a giant beaten to death by a dwarf, a whale swallowed by a catfish.

It means a tendency toward the development of the arrogant side of humanity and the dwarfing of the manly independence of it. It means punishment in court-martial proceedings for minor offenses against haughtly demeanor so out of proportion to the importance of such offense that it shocks our sense of justice. It means what we have all learned very lately that court-martial justice is generally so excessive and might be called barbarous in some instances. If a servant or employee in civil life resents abuse by master or employer with a blow, a civil court might, for the sake of upholding the peace and order of the community, impose a fine of $10 or a sentence of 10 days' imprisonment. If a private soldier, exasperated by discourteous treatment that any true American ought to resent, resents with physical force, he is sent to the penitentiary for five years, and that five years very often in its final result is equivalent to a death sentence. This is the difference between civil justice and military justice. That is one of the reasons why the American people have a dread of military domination.

It means just what it has grown to mean in some of the old countries of the world, that the civilian has no right that the military is bound to respect. If the young officer with strutting mein shoves the civilian off the walk in one of these military-dominated countries, the latter dare not resent it manfully, because he knows the awful penalty of lèse majesté.

There is no evading the truth that a mighty standing army with the officials that command it as a separate institution in this country means the division of our citizenship into civil and military castes, just exactly what it has done in other countries. Americanism and militarism can not walk hand in hand.

FROM WHAT SPRINGS THIS DEMAND FOR OVERPOWERING MILITARY FORCE?

Mr. President, when we get right down to the basis of the sentiment which actuates so many Americans, and which is so strongly reflected in this Congress and in this Senate in the demand for a gigantic naval and military program, I find that this sentiment is founded upon a sense of pride rather than a sense of danger.

We love to exult in the knowledge of our superior power. We want other nations to fear us. We want this country to be bigger than any other country in the world not only in territorial domain but in everything that makes for power and preponderance. We have seen the same sentiment reflected in the jealousy and envy that often exist between two neighboring cities—a jealousy of the size, the wealth, the population of another city. We have seen that envy become so tense as to result in the padding of the census of one or the other that it might outstrip its neighbor in bigness. We have altogether too many people in the world who mistake this sentiment for patriotism. It is nothing more or less than common, everyday vanity. You never hear of such a city working itself up to a white heat to demonstrate that it has a higher standard of civic righteousness or citizenship or a higher degree of excellency in any respect than its neighbor. It is the vanity of bulk rather than a just pride of quality.

Naturally these persons can not find much use for those whom they denominate "sentimentalists," who believe that national character is of more importance than national prowess, who believe that the sentiment that thou shalt not steal or bribe is of more importance to our country than a strip of Nicaraguan territory or the coveted coaling station in Francesco Bay.

No, Mr. President, we are deceiving the people of the United States in projecting upon the black curtain of fear this ghost of unpreparedness, unless we mean to make war and not merely to defend ourselves against war.

IN THE MIDST OF ARMAMENTS WE MUST BE ARMED.

Mr. President, since the initiation of this movement to change our ancient policy from the paths of peaceful progress to the pathway of military prowess, we find the press slurring those whom it calls "pacifists," picturing them as a spineless people, who would rather retreat than fight. It may be that my observation of the true courage and fighting qualities of men in general has been of the exception rather than the rule, but I do not believe it. From my own observation, if I were to select a man upon whom I was to rely for courage of conviction, for staying qualities, one who would fight to the death for a principle, and against all odds, I should always select the man whose words and efforts are for peace. I would never in the world select the bully or the braggart. The rule that holds good as between individuals would equally hold good as between collections of individuals which make a state or a nation.

The "pacifists" who do not believe in such preparedness as the conditions of the country demand are so neglible in numbers that they need not be taken into consideration. While I believe, and believe firmly that the time will come, and measured by the life of nations, will come soon, when there will be an international code of rights, liabilities, and duties of nations, subscribed to by all the great nations of the world, and enforced by combined action against any one of the membership which should defy its rules, and that those rights and liabilities will be, by compulsory process, determined by a great international court, I nevertheless know that such time has not yet arrived; that so long as there is no power other than the unrestrained will of any great nation to check it, so long will greed and selfishness prevail over right, so long will the stronger of nations impose upon the weaker, and so long will it be necessary for each nation to meet force with force.

But, Mr. President, this does not necessitate enslaving the populations of the great nations of the earth to maintain national life and national rights.

Mr. President, is there any general safe and sane rule which should govern a nation in the character and extent of its naval and military program or preparedness? If so, what is it? And if there is such a rule, should we not follow it, measure up to its demands, and keep within its limits?

The first duty of a nation is to defend its territory from invasion or subjugation. No matter what the cost to its people, its bounden duty is to maintain such a navy and at least the nucleus of such an army and such coast defenses as are ample for such purpose; second, a sufficient army and navy to guard its vital interests. In respect to this, one nation's requirement might be almost wholly in her navy, another's in her army, another's in both army and navy, and still another may be so situated that she is not liable to be molested.

What, then, do we need? With newer and longer range guns to replace the older ones of our shore batteries, with submarine flotilla to supplement these stationary defenders of our coasts, with a sufficient equipment of aeros, with a steady, progressive growth and development of our program, followed so many years, for cruisers and dreadnaughts, and with a system of training of either our State militia or the cadets of high schools and colleges, which would give us a peace army fit for any emergency that might suddenly be forced upon us, we should be able to meet, and meet successfully, the prowess of any two nations of the world.

Mr. President, we are in danger of sacrificing our ancient policy of aggrandizement in the arts of peace, a policy which our splendid isolation makes possible—we are in danger of surrendering that for the aggrandizement of military prowess. It is the vanity of power gaining mastery over the just pride of a higher, better, and more humane enlightenment.

You are seeking to stampede our people by the cry of danger that you may overthrow our ancient policy. As the false cry of fire in a crowded hall will for a moment destroy the higher sentiment of chivalry and cause the weak and helpless to be trampled to death beneath the feet of the strong, so your false danger cry will dethrone the loftier sentiment and policies of this country and crown the god of brute force, into whose rapacious jaws you will pour the golden stream of wealth drawn from the toil and sweat of our people.

APPENDIX A.

WAR DEPARTMENT,
Washington, February 29, 1916.

Hon. P. J. MCCUMBER,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. MCCUMBER: Referring to your letter asking for certain statistics, you are informed that it is very difficult indeed to obtain any data that are accurate, and it results, therefore, that the information furnished you is nothing more than an estimate, and these estimates differ very widely.

There are no lists of casualties that give an accurate idea of the real conditions. Germany omits to publish slight wounds; France publishes no list at all; the Russian lists are defective; in all lists the same name may occur more than once; a great majority of the more slightly wounded or slightly diseased men go back in a short time to the colors, and many of the more serious cases do the same; and since August no lists have been received at the Army War College. The British list is the latest. The rest date from July.

Casualties.

France (estimated 800,000 killed)	2,000,000
Germany (estimated 580,000 killed)	2,500,000
Austria-Hungary	2,000,000
Russia (estimated 1,000,000 killed)	5,000,000
Great Britain	620,000
Italy	175,000
Serbia	228,000
Belgium	160,000
Turkey	350,000

There are wide discrepancies in all these estimates. Mr. Simonds estimates the German loss up to September 15 as 2,400,000; the English estimate of the same losses up to July 31 is 2,640,000; the Geneva Red Cross estimated the French losses at 2,115,500; the Russian loss has been estimated at from 3,500,000 to 3,600,000, which is thought to be too low. These casualties, of course, include prisoners and missing, as well as killed and wounded.

This is probably as accurate a list as could be made.

With reference to your second question, the following estimate is made of the indebtedness incurred by the belligerents, to include the 1st of January, 1916:

England	$14,000,000,000
France	7,500,000,000
Germany (includes reported loans to Turkey and Bulgaria)	8,000,000,000
Austria	5,500,000,000
Italy	4,500,000,000
Total	39,500,000,000

Referring to your third question asked in your letter, it is absolutely impossible to give even an estimate of the property destroyed. No data exist upon which to base an estimate, and reports differ widely.

The inclosed papers are furnished for your information.

Very truly, yours,

H. L. SCOTT,
Secretary of War ad interim.

APPENDIX B.

OFFICE OF NAVAL INTELLIGENCE,
December 27, 1915.

Table of naval losses of the various belligerents since the outbreak of war.

[The following table is compiled from various articles appearing in the press of the several belligerent nations. These reports are so contradictory that it is impossible to furnish an absolutely correct list of vessels lost to date. In many cases the belligerent powers have failed to acknowledge the losses of all the vessels. No attempt has been made to include herein a list of the various trawlers, mine sweepers, and such odd small craft which may have been destroyed while mine sweeping or on submarine patrol duty.]

Name.	Type.	Tonnage.	Remarks.
JAPAN.[1]
Shirotaye	Destroyer	380	Ran ashore, Tsing Tao, Sept. 4, 1914.
Takachiho	Schoolship	3,700	Torpedoed by German destroyer S-90 off Tsing Tao, Oct. 17, 1914.
33	Torpedo boat	82	Sunk by mines while mine sweeping off Tsing Tao, Nov. 11, 1914.
FRANCE.
Zelee	Gunboat	636	Sunk by German cruisers at Tahiti, Sept. 22, 1914.
347	Torpedo boat	97	Sunk in collision with each other Oct. 9, 1914.
338	do	97
Mousquet	Destroyer	298	Sunk by German cruiser Emden at Penang, Oct. 28, 1914.
Curie	Submarine	392	Sunk by Austrians at Pola, Dec. 21, 1914.
	Torpedo boat		Reported to have been lost in January, 1915.
Saphir	Submarine	386/?	Sunk at the Dardanelles, Jan. 15, 1915.
Dague	Destroyer	720	Sunk by Austrian mine off Antivari, Feb. 24, 1915.
Bouvet	Battleship	12,007	Sunk at the Dardanelles, Mar. 18, 1915.
Leon Gambetta	Armored cruiser.	12,352	Torpedoed by Austrian submarine in the Straits of Otranto, Apr. 26, 1915.
Casa Bianca	Mine layer	945	Sunk in the Aegean Sea by mine, June 3, 1915.
331	Torpedo boat	97	Sunk in collision off Cherbourg, June 16, 1915.
Joule	Submarine	392/?
Calypso	do	345/490	Rammed and sunk during maneuvers off Cape Lardier, July 8, 1915.
Mariotte	do	522/615	Sunk at the Dardanelles, July 20, 1915.
Indian	Auxiliary cruiser.	800	Sunk by submarine off Rhodes, Sept. 8, 1915.
Turquoise	Submarine	386/?	Sunk in the Sea of Marmora, Nov. 3, 1915.
Branlebas	Destroyer	330	Sunk by mine.
Fresnel	Submarine	392/?	Sunk in the Adriatic by an Austrian ship about Dec. 5, 1915.
ITALY.
Turbine	Destroyer	325	Scuttled to avoid capture after an engagement with Austrian vessels in the Adriatic, May 24, 1915.
Medusa	Submarine	241/295	Torpedoed and sunk by an Austrian submarine, June 17, 1915.
Amelfi	Armored cruiser.	9,958	Sunk by an Austrian submarine in the Adriatic, July 7, 1915.
Garibaldi	do	7,234	Torpedoed off Ragusa by Austrian submarine, July 18, 1915.
5-PN	Torpedo boat	118	Torpedoed by Austrian submarine off Venice, June 26, 1915.
17-OS	do	118	Sunk by one of her own mines while mine laying off Salvore, July, 1915.
Nereide	Submarine	221/315	Sunk by Austrian submarine in Adriatic, Aug. 5, 1915.
Benedetto Brin	Battleship	13,215	Blown up and sunk by an internal explosion, Sept. 28, 1915.
Intrepido	Destroyer	680	Sunk by mine in the Adriatic Dec. 17, 1915.
Re Umberto	Transport		Do.

[1] In addition to the above, five special service ships were sunk during the operations off Tsing Tao.

[1] Various German reports state that Russian men-of-war were destroyed in the several minor engagements in the Baltic. These losses were never officially announced by the Russian Admiralty.

[2] In addition to the above, other Turkish men-of-war may have been destroyed around the Dardanelles and in the Black Sea. Reports from England, Russia, and Turkey in regard to these operations are so conflicting that it is impossible to accurately state what Turkish vessels have been destroyed, especially transports and supply ships.

[3] In addition to the above there seems to be no doubt but that a great number of German submarines have been destroyed around the British Isles and possibly also in the Mediterranean and near the Dardanelles. The exact number of German submarines sunk during this war is not known, although the press states this number to be at least 50, and possibly as many as 70.

URGENT DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATIONS.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I ask unanimous consent that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (H. R. 13043) making appropriations to supply further additional urgent deficiencies in appropriations for the fiscal year 1916 and prior fiscal years.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Virginia?

Mr. MYERS. For that purpose I ask unanimous consent that the unfinished business of the Senate be temporarily laid aside.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

Mr. THOMAS. I object.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Virginia.

Mr. MYERS. A parliamentary question, Mr. President. What effect would that have, if carried, upon the unfinished business of the Senate?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It would displace it.

Mr. MYERS. If the appropriation bill is finished before the Senate adjourns, and then the unfinished business is taken up again, what would the effect be?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If taken up before adjournment to-day, it would again become the unfinished business.

Mr. MYERS. Would it require a motion to take it up and make it the unfinished business again?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair holds that it would.

Mr. MYERS. I should like to ask the Senator from Colorado why he objects to laying aside the unfinished business to take up the appropriation bill, if he will be kind enough to inform me?

Mr. THOMAS. Let me inquire of the Senator from Virginia what is the nature of the bill which he desires to call up? Is it the Indian appropriation bill?

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. It is the urgent deficiency bill.

Mr. THOMAS. And not the Indian appropriation bill?

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. Not the Indian appropriation bill.

Mr. THOMAS. I withdraw my objection.

Mr. MYERS. Then I ask unanimous consent that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside until the deficiency bill is disposed of.

Mr. SMOOT. Of course I have no objection to laying the unfinished business aside temporarily, and that is all the request that is necessary, because as soon as the appropriation bill is finished the unfinished business again comes up.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to laying aside the unfinished business temporarily? The Chair hears none.

Mr. ASHURST. Just a moment, Mr. President. I do not want to object. I rise simply to give notice that immediately upon the conclusion of the urgent deficiency appropriation bill, which I apprehend will not take more than 15 or 20 minutes, I shall ask the Senate to consider the Indian appropriation bill. I shall make that request immediately after this bill is finished.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 13043) making appropriations to supply further additional urgent deficiencies in appropriations for the fiscal year 1916 and prior fiscal years, which had been reported from the Committee on Appropriations with amendments.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I ask unanimous consent that the formal reading of the bill be dispensed with, that the bill be read for amendment, and that the amendments of the committee be considered as they are reached in the reading of the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, that course will be pursued. The Chair hears none.

The Secretary proceeded to read the bill.

The first amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, under the head of "District of Columbia," on page 2, after line 15, to insert:

For such miscellaneous expenses as may be authorized by the Attorney General, including the same objects specified under this head in the District of Columbia appropriation acts for the fiscal years that follow:
Nineteen hundred and fifteen, $3,010.64;
Nineteen hundred and fourteen, $192.25;
Nineteen hundred and eleven, $6.60.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the head of "Naval Establishment," at the top of page 3, to insert:

BUREAU OF YARDS AND DOCKS.

Maintenance: For general maintenance of yards and docks, including the same objects specified under this head in the naval appropriation act for the fiscal year 1916, $52,000.

Contingent: For contingent expenses and minor extensions and improvements of public works at navy yards and stations, $85,000.

Repairs and preservation at navy yards and stations: For repairs and preservation at navy yards, coaling depots, coaling plants, and stations, $45,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the subhead "Contingent expenses," on page 3, after line 21, to insert:

For miscellaneous expenditures, including the same objects specified under this head in the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation act for the fiscal year 1912, 55 cents.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the subhead "Miscellaneous objects," on page 4, after line 7, to insert:

Enforcement of antitrust laws: For the enforcement of antitrust laws, including the same objects specified under this head in the sundry civil appropriation act for the fiscal year 1913, $6.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 4, after line 16, to insert:

Commissioner of Glacier National Park: Commissioner in Glacier National Park, $1,500. The provisions of section 21 of the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation act, approved May 28, 1896, shall not be construed as impairing the right of said commissioner to receive said salary as herein provided.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I should like to inquire if this $1,500 appropriation is a new provision, creating a salary which does not now exist?

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. That is a salary which is provided for by law but has not been paid.

Mr. GORE. I did not know that we ever overlooked anything of that sort.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. That is frequently done.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, I understand that the amendment has been adopted.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It has been agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, under the head of "United States courts," on page 5, after line 5, to insert:

For salaries, fees, and expenses of United States marshals and their deputies, including the same objects specified under this head in the sundry civil appropriation act for the fiscal year 1915, $27,633.91.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the head of "United States courts," on page 5, after line 5, to strike out:

The payment of the salary of Ewing C. Bland, from the appropriation entitled "Salaries, fees, and expenses of marshals, United States courts, 1915," for the period from December 12, 1914, to and including March 4, 1915, during which period services were rendered by him in good faith as United States marshal for the western district of Missouri, is authorized, notwithstanding the fact that his appointment was not confirmed by the United States Senate.

And in lieu thereof to insert:

That payment of the salary of Ewing C. Bland from the appropriation entitled "Salaries, fees, and expenses of marshals, United States courts, 1915," for the period from December 12, 1914, to and including January 6, 1915, during which period services were rendered by him in good faith as United States marshal for the western district of Missouri, is authorized, notwithstanding the fact that his appointment was not confirmed by the United States Senate.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, I understand that the amendment now under consideration is offered in lieu of the amendment originally reported by the Senate committee, striking out all of the language from line 6 down to and including line 15, on page 5. I do not think this amendment should be agreed to, but I think the House provision should be retained in the bill. I will state briefly my reasons for this position.

The United States marshal for the district for which Mr. Bland was subsequently appointed died about February 1, 1914. The judge of the district appointed an acting marshal, who served until the President, during the recess of the Senate and about the 1st or 2d day of December, 1914, appointed Mr. Ewing C. Bland. That officer qualified about the 12th day of December, 1914, and served as United States marshal of the district for which he was appointed until the 4th of March, 1915. The Senate on the 6th day of January, 1915, rejected Mr. Bland's nomination. The purpose of the amendment now offered is to authorize compensation for the time transpiring between the 12th day of December, when Mr. Bland qualified, up to the day that his nomination was rejected.

The undisputed facts are that a nomination was sent to the Senate on the 7th day of January of another nominee to become United States marshal for that district, but no commission was issued to him and no action was taken upon that second nomination either during that session of the Senate or subsequently. So Mr. Bland continued to serve in good faith until the 4th of March.

The Constitution, in Article II, section 2, clause 3, authorizes the President in the following language to make appointments to fill vacancies happening during the recess of the Senate:

> The President shall have power to fill up all vacancies that may happen during the recess of the Senate by granting commissions which shall expire at the end of their next session.

My position is that since this appointment happened, within the meaning of the Constitution, during the recess of the Senate and the President made the appointment of Mr. Bland to fill that vacancy, under the Constitution his commission did not expire until the end of the next session of the Senate, which was on the 4th of March. Compensation is carried in the House bill for the entire period served by Mr. Bland.

It is not disputed that Mr. Bland performed services up to the 4th of March, 1915; it is not contended that there was anyone else who could have performed the duties of United States marshal for that period. Under the Constitution the President had the power to make the appointment; and unless Mr. Bland's commission was revoked—and this was not done—his authority continued until the 4th of March, notwithstanding the fact that he was rejected by the Senate prior to that time, and on the 6th day of January, 1915.

I do not deem it entirely material to discuss the power of the President to make recess appointments where vacancies originally occurred during the session of the Senate. That, however, is the case in this instance. The vacancy originated in February, 1914. I believe that the authorities are uniform, in so far as any authorities exist upon the subject, that a proper construction of the language in the Constitution giving the President power to fill vacancies which happen during the recess of the Senate, means, in the language of Mr. Attorney General Wirt, vacancies which exist during the recess of the Senate, and is not confined to vacancies which originate while the Senate is not in session.

Even if that were not the case, Mr. President, it would be the duty, in my judgment, of Congress to pay Mr. Bland his salary for the time that he served in this office in good faith, since it was the duty of the President, under his general power to enforce the laws of the United States, to appoint some one to fill this vacancy. If the President had issued a commission to the appointee who was nominated subsequent to the time the Senate rejected Mr. Bland, that would in all probability have operated as a revocation of the commission of Mr. Bland; or, if the Senate had confirmed the subsequent nominee, and a commission had been issued upon that nomination, it might have operated as a revocation of Mr. Bland's commission; but that was not done. So Mr. Bland actually continued to serve until the 4th of March, when, under the Constitution, his commission expired.

It seems to me to be unfair to him to limit his salary to the very brief period between the 12th of December, when he actually qualified, and the 6th of January, when he was rejected by the Senate. That the President had the power during the recess to fill this vacancy, although it originated while the Senate was in session, is established by an opinion which goes back as early as 1823, rendered by Mr. Attorney General Wirt in a case almost exactly analogous to this. I shall not take the time of the Senate to now read that opinion in all of its details, but I want to call attention to some of its features. Mr. Wirt said:

> Had this vacancy first occurred during the recess of the Senate, no doubt would have arisen as to the President's power to fill it. The doubt arises from the circumstance of its having first occurred during the session of the Senate. But the expression used by the Constitution is "happen"; "all vacancies that may happen during the recess of the Senate." The most natural sense of this term is "to chance—to fall out, to take place by accident." But the expression seems not perfectly clear. It may mean "happen to take place"—that is, "to originate"—under which sense the President would not have the power to fill the vacancy. It may mean, also, without violence to the sense, "happen to exist"; under which sense the President would have the right to fill it by his temporary commission. Which of these two senses is to be preferred? The first seems to me most accordant with the letter of the Constitution; the second most accordant with its reason and spirit.

In conclusion, Attorney General Wirt said:

> The construction which I prefer is perfectly innocent.

That is, the construction sustaining the power of the President to make the appointment.

> It can not possibly produce mischief, without imputing to the President a degree of turpitude entirely inconsistent with the character which his office implies, as well as with the high responsibility and short tenure annexed to that office, while at the same time it insures to the public the accomplishment of the object to which the Constitution so sedulously looked, that the offices connected with their peace and safety be regularly filled.

I ask permission to have printed in the RECORD at this point in my remarks the entire opinion of Attorney General Wirt.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. In the absence of objection, permission to do so is granted.

The opinion referred to is as follows:

OFFICE OF THE ATTORNEY GENERAL,
October 22, 1823.

SIR: Under the act of the 15th of May, 1820, "to limit the term of office of certain officers therein named," etc., I find that Gen. Swartwout's commission as Navy agent at New York expired during the last session of the Senate. Your nomination of another person to fill that vacancy was not confirmed by the Senate, and the vacancy still exists.

It is the case, then, of a vacancy which arose during the session of the Senate, but which, from the circumstance that has been mentioned, continues to exist in the recess. The question on which you ask my opinion is, "whether, under the Constitution, you can fill the vacancy by a commission to expire at the end of the next session?"

The provisions of the Constitution on this subject are: (1) That the President shall nominate and, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, shall appoint all officers, etc.; (2) that the President shall have power to fill up all vacancies that "may happen during the recess of the Senate by granting commissions which shall expire at the end of their next session."

Had this vacancy first occurred during the recess of the Senate, no doubt would have arisen as to the President's power to fill it. The doubt arises from the circumstance of its having first occurred during the session of the Senate. But the expression used by the Constitution is "happen"—"all vacancies that may happen during the recess of the Senate." The most natural sense of this term is "to chance—to fall out—to take place by accident." But the expression seems not perfectly clear. It may mean "happen to take place"—that is, "to originate"—under which sense the President would not have the power to fill the vacancy. It may mean also, without violence to the sense, "happen to exist," under which sense the President would have the right to fill it by his temporary commission. Which of these two senses is to be preferred? The first seems to me most accordant with the letter of the Constitution; the second, most accordant with its reason and spirit.

The meaning of the Constitution seems to me to result in this: That the President alone can not make a permanent appointment to those offices; that to render the appointment permanent it must receive the consent of the Senate; but that whensoever a vacancy shall exist which the public interests require to be immediately filled, and in filling which the advice and consent of the Senate can not be immediately asked because of their recess, the President shall have the power of filling it by an appointment to continue only until the Senate shall have passed upon it, or, in the language of the Constitution, till the end of the next session.

The substantial purpose of the Constitution was to keep these offices filled, and powers adequate to this purpose were intended to be conveyed. But if the President shall not have the power to fill a vacancy thus circumstanced, the powers are inadequate to the purpose, and the substance of the Constitution will be sacrificed to a dubious construction of its letter.

Put the case of a vacancy occurring in an office held in a distant part of the country on the last day of the Senate's session. Before the vacancy is made known to the President the Senate rises. The office may be an important one; the vacancy may paralyze a whole line of action in some essential branch of our internal police; the public interests may imperiously demand that it shall be immediately filled. But the vacancy happened to occur during the session of the Senate, and if the President's power is to be limited to such vacancies only as happen to occur during the recess of the Senate the vacancy in the case put must continue, however ruinous the consequences may be to the public. Cases of this character might be easily multiplied, and it would seem to me highly desirable to avoid a construction which would produce effects so extensively pernicious, if it can be done with a just respect to the language of the Constitution.

Now, if we interpret the word "happen" as being merely equivalent to "happen to exist"—as I think we may legitimately do—then all vacancies which from any casualty happen to exist at a time when the Senate can not be consulted as to filling them may be temporarily filled by the President, and the whole purpose of the Constitution is completely accomplished.

The casualty which has prevented the cooperation of the Senate may be such as in the case hypothetically stated above. It may arise from various other causes—the sudden dissolution of that body by some convulsion of nature; the falling of the building in which they hold their sessions; a sudden and destructive pestilence, disabling or destroying a quorum of that body; such an invasion of the enemy as renders their reassemblage elsewhere impracticable or inexpedient; and a thousand other causes which can not be foreseen. It may arise, too, from their rejecting a nomination by the President in the last hour of their session, and inadvertently rising before a renomination can be made. In all these cases there is no guilt either on the part of the Senate or of the President; but by some casualty the vacancy happens to continue and to exist in the recess, and the public good, may, even the safety of the Nation, may require it to be forthwith filled. Looking to the reason of the case, why should not the President have the power to fill it? In reason, it seems to me perfectly immaterial when the vacancy first arose, for whether it arose during the session of the Senate or during their recess it equally requires to be filled. The Constitution does not look to the moment of the origin of the vacancy, but to the state of things at the point of time at which the President is called on to act. Is the Senate in session? Then he must make a nomination to that body. Is it in recess? Then the President must fill the vacancy by a temporary commission.

This seems to me the only construction of the Constitution which is compatible with its spirit, reason, and purpose; while, at the same time, it offers no violence to its language. And these, I think, are the governing points to which all sound construction looks.

The opposite construction is, perhaps, more strictly consonant with the mere letter. But it overlooks the spirit, reason, and purpose; and, like all constructions merely literal, its tendency is to defeat the substantial meaning of the instrument, and to produce the most embarrassing inconveniences.

The construction which I prefer is perfectly innocent. It can not possibly produce mischief without imputing to the President a degree of turpitude entirely inconsistent with the character which his office implies, as well as with the high responsibility and short tenure annexed to that office; while, at the same time, it insures to the public the accomplishment of the object to which the Constitution so sedulously looks, that the offices connected with their peace and safety be regularly filled.

I have the honor to remain, sir, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

WM. WIRT.

To the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES.

(1 Opin., p. 631.)

Mr. ROBINSON. The next case in which the question seems to have arisen was in 1832, when Mr. Attorney General Taney, who, as we all know, was afterwards Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of the United States, in another case very similar to this expressed the same opinion as that asserted by Mr. Wirt. He held that—

The President has power, during the recesses of the Senate, to fill vacancies that may happen to exist in the subordinate offices of the Government, and is not limited in its exercise to those which occur during recesses.

It was the intention of the Constitution that the offices created by law, and which are necessary to the current operations of the Government, should always be full; and that, when vacancies happen, they shall not be protracted beyond the time necessary for the President to fill them.

I ask unanimous consent at this point to include in the RECORD the opinion of Attorney General Taney.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. In the absence of objection, permission to do so is granted.

The opinion referred to is as follows:

ATTORNEY GENERAL'S OFFICE,
July 19, 1832.

SIR: In obedience to your direction, I proceed to state my opinion in relation to the appointment of a register of the land office for the Mount Salus district, in the State of Mississippi.

The facts in the case I understand to be these: After the adjournment of Congress, on the 3d of March, 1831, and before their meeting in December of the same year, a vacancy occurred in the above-mentioned office of register, and Samuel Gwinn was appointed to fill it. During the late session of Congress he was regularly nominated to the Senate, and rejected by them. The President having afterwards received strong testimonials in his favor from the State of Mississippi, and being requested by one of the Senators from that State to renominate him, his name was again sent to the Senate, with the additional recommendations which had been forwarded to the President. The second nomination was made on the 11th of June last. It was considered on the 10th of July, and laid on the table. And on the 16th of July, the last day of the session, the following resolution was moved and considered:

"Resolved, That the President of the United States be informed that it is not the intention of the Senate to take any proceeding on the renomination of Samuel Gwinn to be register of the land office at Mount Salus, in Mississippi, during the present session."

This resolution was ordered to lie on the table; and the Senate adjourned without taking any further order in the matter.

In this state of things, can the President, during the recess, appoint Mr. Gwinn, or anyone else, to the office before mentioned?

The office was created by the act of Congress of May 6, 1822. As the President is required by the Constitution to take care that the laws be faithfully executed, it becomes his duty to fill the offices which are necessary, and have been legally established for that purpose, provided the Constitution confers on him the power.

The Constitution gives him the right "to fill up all vacancies that may happen during the recess of the Senate, by granting commissions which shall expire at the end of their next session."

The appointment of Mr. Gwinn during the last recess "filled up" the vacancy which had then happened, and the office remained full; and there was no vacancy, from the time of his appointment and acceptance until the close of the late session. The nomination made not being confirmed by the Senate, the commission granted by the President expired at the end of the session; and the moment after it closed the office again became vacant. This was a new vacancy.

Has this second vacancy happened during the recess of the Senate, so as to authorize the President to fill it, under the grant of power contained in the article of the Constitution above referred to?

It has, I know, been contended that, in order to enable the President to make the appointment, the vacancy must take place during the recess; in other words, that the office must be full at the time of the adjournment of the Senate and become vacant afterwards.

I can not think that this is the true interpretation of the article in question. The Constitution was formed for practical purposes, and a construction that defeats the very object of the grant of power can not be the true one. It was the intention of the Constitution that the offices created by law and necessary to carry on the operations of the Government should always be full, or, at all events, that the vacancy should not be a protracted one. A government can not go on, nor accomplish the purposes for which it is established without having the services of proper officers to execute the various duties required by law. To guard against any abuse of the appointing power by the President the approbation of the Senate is required. But as it was foreseen that, from the various contingencies and uncertainties to which human affairs are liable, vacancies might be found to exist during the recess of the Senate in offices which the public interest required to be filled, the power above mentioned was given to the President in order to provide against the evil of requiring a vacancy to continue in every case until the Senate could be convened, and the further evil of calling them together upon every one of the vacancies which might unexpectedly be found to exist during the recess. But the control of the Senate over appointments to such vacancies is effectually preserved by the limited term for which the President is authorized to make them.

Suppose an officer to die in a distant part of the United States and his death not to be known at Washington until after the adjournment; must the office remain vacant until the Senate can be convened? It is admitted by everyone that the President may appoint in such cases, and the practice of the Government has continually conformed to that construction. But if the Constitution required that the office should be full at the time of the adjournment and that the vacancy should take place afterwards, then the President could not appoint; for in the cases above mentioned the vacancy happens during the session and the office is not full at the time of the adjournment. It becomes vacant the moment the incumbent dies, and the notice does nothing more than inform the President that a vacancy has happened; and it informs him, at the same time, that it took place while the Senate was in session and not during the recess.

I am aware that it has been said that in these cases the vacancy must be regarded as happening when the notice of the death is received, and that therefore such a vacancy is to be considered as happening after the adjournment and during the recess. But how can it be so considered, in opposition to the admitted fact? There are no words in the Constitution that justify such an interpretation. It does not speak of the notice of a vacancy, but of the existence of a vacancy. It does not say if a vacancy shall become known, but if a vacancy shall "happen"; and if the words of the Constitution give the power to fill those vacancies only which take place after the adjournment, then the vacancies which I have just mentioned could not be filled.

It is manifest, however, that the Constitution could not have intended to place such cases on a different footing from vacancies which occur after the adjournment. There is no reason for a distinction between them. And the words used in the Constitution do not, I think, by any fair construction, require a distinction to be taken. It was intended to provide for those vacancies which might arise from accident and the contingencies to which human affairs must always be liable; and if it falls out that, from death, inadvertence, or mistake, an office required by law to be filled is, in the recess, found to be vacant, then a vacancy has happened during the recess, and the President may fill it. This appears to be the common sense and natural import of the words used. They mean the same thing as if the Constitution had said "if there happen to be any vacancies during the recess." The framers of the Constitution had provided for filling the offices with the concurrence of the Senate, but foreseeing that, from the various casualties to which human concerns are exposed, vacancies would be found during the recess, they gave power to fill them until an opportunity can be afforded of bringing the appointments before the Senate; and they use words which denote the character of the vacancies which they foresee may occur, and for which they are providing. He may fill up vacancies which "happen" during the recess, but vacancies are not designedly to be kept open by the President until the recess for the purpose of avoiding the control of the Senate; and the word "happen" is used to describe the class and kind of vacancies and not the particular time at which they took place.

I might suggest another case, showing that the restricted construction contended for can not be the one contemplated by the framers of the Constitution. Suppose a nomination made to a vacant office and confirmed by the Senate; the office is not full until the person appointed accept. Suppose he refuses to accept and his refusal is not known until after the adjournment; in such a case, the original vacany would remain unfilled, and, as it took place during the session and not after the adjournment, the President could not fill it. It can not be imagined that such cases were intended to be excepted out of the power granted to him.

It has been said that this power, if possessed by the President, may be so used as to defeat the intention of the Constitution and exclude the Senate from all share in appointments. The answer to such an objection appears to be a plain one. If the President willfully abuses a power given to him, the Constitution has provided a remedy. In this case the Senate have had a full opportunity of acting, but have not acted, and have held the nomination under advisement and left it to fall vacant as soon as they adjourned. They must be supposed to have had sufficient reasons for keeping the nomination in their power and suspending their action upon it. The President could not nominate another person for the same office until this was disposed of and was either withdrawn by him or finally acted on by the Senate. And as the Senate have had an opportunity of acting, but have determined to suspend their decision, I can not see how an appointment now made by the President can be supposed to interfere with the rights of the Senate. There is nothing in the case that can be construed into a desire to avoid their constitutional control.

If, however, the restricted interpretation contended for were admitted, still, in the case before me, the President would have the right to appoint. The vacancy did take place in the recess. The former appointment continued during the session, and there was no vacancy until after they adjourned. The vacancy followed the adjournment; and whether it took place immediately afterwards, or at distant interval, can make no difference. If it took place after the adjournment, it happened during the recess, according to the narrowest interpretation proposed to be given to the article; and, consequently, even in that view of the subject the President has a right to fill it.

I do not desire to place my opinion on this ground, but upon what I believe to be the true construction of the Constitution, as before stated.

In the case of Amos Binney Mr. Adams must have proceeded on the same construction of the Constitution with the one I have given.

The commission of Amos Binney, as navy agent of the port of Boston, expired by operation of law February 15, 1825, during the session of Congress. He was nominated for the same office February 28, 1825.

The session closed on the 3d of March, and the Senate adjourned without acting on the nomination. They were convened on the 4th of March, 1825, by the summons of the President; and on the 7th Mr. Binney was again nominated. On the 9th this nomination was postponed by the Senate to the first Monday in December following; and they adjourned on the same day, leaving this vacancy unfilled. On the 22d of March, 1825, during the recess, Mr. Binney was appointed by the President to the office above mentioned.

Here, then, was a vacancy which occurred during the session; was known to have taken place; was left unfilled at the close of the session; and was afterwards during the recess filled up by the President. I know of no precedent in favor of the opposite construction.

And as a vacancy in the office of register of the land office for the Mount Salus district until the next meeting of Congress would produce serious inconvenience to the public, and the vacancy is, in my judgment, one of that character which the Constitution contemplated in the grant of power before mentioned, I respectfully advise that the appointment be made.

R. B. TANEY.

To the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES.

(2 Opin., 525.)

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, as I have already stated, this officer's commission, under the Constitution, did not expire until the 4th of March, and he continued actually to perform the duties of the office up to that date. Under the law the Department of Justice can not pay his salary, his nomination having been rejected by the Senate, the provision of the Revised Statutes, section 1761, being as follows:

No money shall be paid from the Treasury, as salary, to any person appointed during the recess of the Senate, to fill a vacancy in any existing office, if the vacancy existed while the Senate was in session and was by law required to be filled by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, until such appointee has been confirmed by the Senate.

Since in this case the vacancy originated when the Senate was in session and since the appointment was made in vacation and the appointee was not confirmed, the power does not exist, under the statute, to pay his salary without express authorization by Congress; but it does seem to me that under the circumstances of this case, since the services were admittedly rendered in good faith and there was no one else who could perform them, and since it was necessary in the interest of the enforcement of law that there be some one available to discharge the duties of United States marshal, the salary of Mr. Bland should be paid until the time his commission expired.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Arkansas yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. ROBINSON. With pleasure.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. As I understand, the vacancy in this office occurred during the session of the Senate?

Mr. ROBINSON. Yes, sir; in February, 1914.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. But the President neglected to send in a name, which he might have done?

Mr. ROBINSON. No nomination was made until December, 1914.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. How long was the Senate in session after this vacancy originally occurred?

Mr. ROBINSON. I do not recall the exact time; but I think it was several months.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Then there was ample time for the President to act?

Mr. ROBINSON. Undoubtedly.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. And does the Senator know why the President withheld action in the matter?

Mr. ROBINSON. I think it is within the knowledge of every Senator in the Chamber why no action was taken; but I would not undertake to state it. It is a matter of common knowledge, I think, to Senators. I will, however, say this: These nominations, as the Senator well knows, are usually made by the President upon certain recommendations, and no recommendation that the President approved of was made within that time. For that reason no nomination was earlier sent to the Senate.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. It was withheld probably on that account.

Mr. ROBINSON. I do not undertake to express any reason for the President's failure to act earlier; but I think that may have been the reason.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. The appointment, then, was sent in during the recess. I think the Senator is right when he says that within the meaning of the Constitution that vacancy happened during the recess. I think it means if a vacancy existed during the recess, as the Senator has said, and I think he is right in saying that, notwithstanding the rejection of the nomination of the President subsequently sent to the Senate, the marshal who received the temporary appointment continued to hold until Congress adjourned on the 4th of March following. I think that has been held repeatedly. I know it was held by two or three opinions of Attorneys General, and it has been held by at least one of the courts. But the question which troubles me about the matter is that there is a statute to which the Senator has called attention which provides that payment shall be withheld in a case of this very kind. The Senator read the statute a moment ago. Perhaps he will read it again.

Mr. ROBINSON. I have read it once. I can state it to the Senator.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Very well.

Mr. ROBINSON. It is simply this, that the executive departments shall not pay money out of the Treasury on account of salary of a person whose nomination has been rejected by the Senate; in other words, it requires additional legislation to compensate him.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Hardly that, as I remember it. The statute applies to a case where the——

Mr. ROBINSON. I did not state it accurately. I should have said that in cases where vacancies originate while the Senate is in session and recess appointments are made which are not confirmed, but are rejected—in such cases there is no legal authority to pay the salary, and authorization is required.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Therefore, we have this situation; that if the vacancy actually happens during a recess of the Senate and an appointment is made to fill that vacancy, then the accounting officers of the Treasury may make payment.

Mr. ROBINSON. That is, if it originates during the recess; yes.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. If it originates during the recess; but if it originates while Congress is in session, then the general statute forbids his being paid.

Mr. ROBINSON. That is, forbids the accounting officers paying it; yes.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Forbids their paying it. Now, it occurs to me that there is a very wholesome purpose behind that statute, and that is that the President shall not be permitted, when a vacancy happens—"when a vacancy originates," to use the Senator's language—during the time Congress is in session, to withhold making an appointment so that he may send it in during the recess; in other words, the President might be sure that some appointee——

Mr. ROBINSON. No; the Senator is wrong about that, because he concedes that the right to make the appointment exists.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I had not quite finished my statement. The case is conceivable where the President might have in mind an appointee whom he was quite sure would be rejected by the Senate if he sent the nomination in, but, by withholding it until the Senate adjourned, he could make a recess appointment and enable that man to hold until the adjournment of the succeeding Congress, which might conceivably be the better part of a year; and it seems to have been the purpose of the statute to prevent cases of that character.

Mr. ROBINSON. Whatever may have been its purpose, its effect is simply this, that when an appointment is made by the President to fill a vacancy that originated while the Senate was in session, the appointment being made during the recess of the Senate, the appointee receives no compensation until Congress makes an appropriation for his compensation. That is the effect of the statute.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Arkansas yield to the Senator from Connecticut?

Mr. ROBINSON. Yes.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I thought the Senator had finished. I do not desire to interrupt him. I was going to take the floor myself.

Mr. ROBINSON. I think I have completed all I desire to say. I insist, Mr. President, that under the circumstances of this case the salary should be paid.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Connecticut.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I notice the language of the bill is that this appointee rendered the service "in good faith." I do not know what the object of putting those words in may be. I have no doubt that he rendered the services.

Mr. ROBINSON. Will the Senator yield to me for a moment?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Yes.

Mr. ROBINSON. That was the language incorporated in the House provision and was merely the language submitted by the Attorney General in his estimate sent to Congress. That is undoubtedly the reason the House used that particular language.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. That may be the reason the House used it, but I still am in doubt what intention is sought to be conveyed by the language, even if it were taken from the letter of the Attorney General. All I can make out of it is that the appointee continued to serve after he knew perfectly well that the Senate had rejected his nomination.

Mr. ROBINSON. Yes; but let me call the Senator's attention to the fact that there was no one else authorized to serve, and that the public interest required that he continue to serve until some one else was authorized to do so, his commission running until the end of that session of Congress.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I am perfectly aware of that; but it seems to me that the appointee must have known that there was a United States statute in existence which practically said to him, "If after the Senate has rejected your nomination you continue to serve under your commission you do so at your peril."

Mr. ROBINSON. The Senator understands that Mr. Bland collected no salary for the period between the time he qualified and the time he was rejected?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Yes; I am not quarreling with him about that; and the fact that the gentleman's commission did not expire until the 4th of March does not meet the point that I raise. The marshal was not compelled to perform these duties; he could have resigned at any time he had a mind to; he could have thrown up his commission, and he could not have been compelled to perform these services; but he voluntarily held on in the face of the statute.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President——

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I yield.

Mr. ROBINSON. The Senator does not mean to say that the marshal could have just walked out of the office without having his resignation accepted, and, by quitting the office merely because the Senate had refused to confirm him, absolve himself and his bondsmen from liability for failure to discharge his duty?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I mean——

Mr. SUTHERLAND. The court could have immediately made an appointment.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I mean to say that the marshal could have immediately notified the President that he did not care to perform the duties any longer, which the United States statute prevented him from getting pay for, and the President could have immediately appointed another man, or the court could have appointed another man, to attend to the duties of marshal.

Mr. ROBINSON. Will the Senator yield to me for a further statement?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Yes.

Mr. ROBINSON. The President did immediately nominate another candidate—I think the nomination was made on the very day following the action of the Senate—but the name of that candidate is still before the Senate. It has been before the Senate now for more than a year, and the Senate has failed to act on that nomination. Supposing the Senate rejects that nominee's name, he would have to come back to Congress and ask for an appropriation to pay his salary, and so on ad infinitum.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Who is performing the duties of the office now?

Mr. ROBINSON. I do not remember his name.

Mr. SMOOT. William A. Shelton.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. Shelton; that is the name.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. That shows that there was no danger of the duties of the office being neglected or any bond being forfeited or any penalty incurred.

Mr. ROBINSON. But, if the Senator will excuse me, William A. Shelton did not receive a commission until after the 4th of March, and he could not perform any duties until he had received his commission and qualified.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, I know nothing about the motives of this gentleman; but it seems to me to be a clear case of attempting to compensate a man by special act of Congress when the general statutes prevent his getting the salary as he would have gotten it if he had been confirmed by the Senate. What is the amount involved? Does the Senator know?

Mr. SHAFROTH. The total amount is about four hundred and some odd dollars, which includes part of what is allowed in this bill.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. The bill does not mention the sum, as I look at it.

Mr. ROBINSON. I will tell the Senator exactly in a moment. Nine hundred and twenty-two dollars and twenty cents is the total amount of the salary.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. What is the difference in money involved between the language stricken out of the bill by the Senate committee and the amendment proposed by the Senate committee?

Mr. ROBINSON. I have not computed the difference.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. What is the difference in time?

Mr. ROBINSON. The difference in time is this: The amendment offered by the Senator from Virginia will compensate Mr. Bland for services from the 12th of December until the 6th of January. The provision inserted in the bill in the House of Representatives will compensate him for the entire time he served.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. It is a matter of two months, is it not?

Mr. ROBINSON. The difference?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Yes; the difference.

Mr. ROBINSON. Yes; a little less than two months.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, when the Committee on Appropriations met for the consideration of the bill on March 15, the item for the payment of the salary of Ewing C. Bland was stricken from the House bill. I think there was no objection on the part of any member of the committee present to that action. This morning the committee met for the reconsideration of this amendment and for the consideration of a number of other amendments that were submitted to the committee after the bill was reported, and the question of the payment of Mr. Bland was discussed by the subcommittee and then by the whole committee.

The appointment of Ewing C. Bland was a recess appointment made by the President after the adjournment of Congress March 4, 1915.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. How soon after the adjournment? Has the Senator the date?

Mr. SMOOT. I have not the date of his appointment for the present. He served during that recess appointment, and when the Senate convened in December, 1915—that is, last December——

Mr. SHAFROTH. The Senator's figures are one year too late. This provision is for the period from December 12, 1914, to and including March 4, 1915.

Mr. ROBINSON. If the Senator will pardon me, I can give the dates accurately.

Mr. SMOOT. Then the memorandum that was handed to me is wrong.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Yes; that is it.

Mr. SMOOT. I will simply state, then—and I think that is true—that the appointment was one year earlier than I stated. But be that as it may, when the appointment was made in December, 1914, it was considered by the Judiciary Committee; it was reported to the Senate, and, on January 6, 1915, the Senate rejected the nomination of Mr. Bland.

We have innumerable cases where the President has appointed persons to positions during a recess, and reappointed them upon the convening of the next Congress, and during that Congress the Senate has not acted upon them, and then we have in such cases paid them the salary that was due them for services rendered up until March 4 of that year. But there is no case that I can find, nor was any case pointed out to the committee, where an appointee of the President of the United States has been paid a salary after the Senate has rejected that appointment, but that will be the case, Mr. President, if the House provision prevails. After a reconsideration of this item of the bill this morning by the committee, the committee decided, with the exception of the vote of the Senator from Arkansas——

Mr. ROBINSON. The Senator is mistaken about that. There were a number of other votes cast for it.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I will state that I voted for the position taken by the Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. ROBINSON. And a number of other Senators.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. It is out of order to allude to the vote in committee, anyhow.

Mr. SMOOT. I suppose I should not allude to it.

Mr. ROBINSON. No; I do not think the Senator ought to have made that statement.

Mr. SMOOT. I will then state it was an overwhelming vote. The committee agreed that it would pay Mr. Bland from the time he received his commission, December 12, 1914, to January 6, 1915, the day the Senate rejected him; or, in other words, they have changed the provision of the House by eliminating any appropriation for his salary after the Senate of the United States had rejected his nomination.

Mr. President, if we adopt the House provision, there will be a precedent established that will always be pointed to, that, no matter whether the Senate rejects the nomination of a man or not, he can serve the balance of that session, and the Congress will appropriate money to pay him for it.

I do not believe this ought to be done. If it can be done, then the President of the United States could appoint a man, as was done, in early December of 1914; the Judiciary Committee could consider the appointment and report it back to this body; the Senate could reject it; the very next day the President could appoint another person to the place; his appointment could be considered by the Judiciary Committee and rejected by the Senate; and both of those appointees could draw a salary under the precedent which would be established in the payment of this claim. I do not think the Senate wants to establish any such precedent as this.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, will the Senator permit me to interrupt him there?

Mr. SMOOT. Certainly.

Mr. ROBINSON. If Congress refuses to pay this salary, it will also put itself on record as favoring the practice of permitting a nomination to remain in the Senate for more than a year without taking action upon it, permitting an officer nominated to continue to render services, and then, after the lapse of a year or two, reject him and deprive him of any compensation whatever. That would occur if Mr. Shelton should be rejected and the principle contended for by the Senator applied to him.

Mr. SMOOT. I do not look at it that way, Mr. President. This is the situation exactly: If Congress provides payment for Mr. Bland after he was rejected, it is setting aside a general statute of the United States.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me for an inquiry?

Mr. SMOOT. Just as soon as I finish this statement I will yield to the Senator.

The Senator has referred to the fact that there was no other person to perform the services during that time. The fact of the matter is that the court had power to appoint an officer if Mr. Bland did not serve after he was rejected; and where a man is appointed to an office by the President, and has a fair hearing before the Judiciary Committee, and his nomination is reported to the Senate, and the Senate rejects the appointment, I do not believe we ought to encourage him to continue in the office; and we ought to give notice now to the courts that wherever such a case happens the courts should appoint a person to fill the place.

Now I yield to the Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. ROBINSON. The Senator has departed entirely from the discussion of the point concerning which I wanted to interrupt him. The statute to which he refers, forbidding compensation of officers who are rejected by the Senate, forbids compensating Mr. Bland in any part; so that it is necessary to come to Congress to get authority to pay him anything.

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; I admit that.

Mr. ROBINSON. We have now an actual case where, on January 7, 1915, after the Senate of the United States had rejected Mr. Bland, another nomination was made. The Senate was in session. No action has been taken upon that case. If Mr. Shelton is rejected now, after more than a year has gone by, the same statute which the Senator regards as so sacred will deprive Mr. Shelton of any compensation whatever.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I want to call the attention of the Senator to this fact: Up until January 7 Mr. Bland did not know whether the Senate was going to reject him or not; but after he was rejected there was no excuse for his continuing in the office.

Mr. ROBINSON. Why, Mr. President, the Senate does not serve any notice upon Mr. Bland.

Mr. SMOOT. It did by his rejection.

Mr. ROBINSON. Just a moment. Mr. Bland gets his authority from the commission issued by the President. That commission authorized him to serve until the 4th of March. Pursuant to that commission he performed the services; and in law and in fairness he is just as much entitled to compensation for the whole time served as he is for the period prior to the action of the Senate in rejecting him.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, the Committee on Appropriations decided that, as Mr. Bland served as marshal from December 12, 1914, up until January 6, 1915, with no action on the part of the Senate until that time, he should be paid up until that time; but, after the Senate had acted, the committee thought it was unwise and it was not a proper thing to pay him beyond that time.

I will admit what the Senator says, that the payment to Mr. Bland from December 12, 1914, to January 6, 1915, is contrary to the statute; but we do say that he did serve during that time, and, as the House put it, in good faith. He had no knowledge but that he would be confirmed by the Senate up until that time, and therefore the committee thought he ought to be paid for that length of service.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. SMOOT. Certainly.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Is Mr. Bland asking for pay for any time that he did not serve?

Mr. SMOOT. No, Mr. President. He served from January 6 until March 4; but the Senate, on January 6, refused to confirm his nomination.

Mr. VARDAMAN. The fact I want to elicit from the Senator is whether or not the man rendered this service to the United States.

Mr. ROBINSON. Everybody admits that he did.

Mr. SMOOT. I do not think anybody denies that he served from December 12 until March 4.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Does the Senator want him to serve without compensation? Has he not rendered the service? Is it not within the power of Congress to compensate a man for performing honest and efficient service?

Mr. SMOOT. Why, certainly it is. If the Senate wants to reject the nomination of a man, thus serving notice that they will not confirm his nomination, and for reasons of his own continues in the office, and then appropriate money to pay for such services, of course, it can do so; but I do not think it is the proper course to follow, and no such precedent should be established.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Connecticut?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. As I understand, there is no denial that he served. He not only served, but he insisted on obtruding his services upon an unwilling country.

Mr. ROBINSON. Oh, Mr. President, if the Senator from Utah will permit me to make a brief reply, I do not think that is a fair statement. Mr. Bland's commission authorized him to serve until the 4th of March. There was no one authorized to take his place. He was entitled, under the Constitution, to continue in the service until the 4th of March.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, these are the facts of the case: A. J. Martin resigned in March, 1914, and the court appointed Henry C. Miller to fill the place until another marshal was appointed. That is where the court acted. The court could have acted in the case when the Senate rejected Mr. Bland.

Mr. ROBINSON. But it did not do it.

Mr. SMOOT. No; but the Senator, I think, knows why the court did not do it, and I do not want to go into that question.

Mr. ROBINSON. I do not know why it did not do it; but I will say to the Senator that I am not sure that the court could in that instance have appointed a marshal, because if the President had authority to issue Mr. Bland's commission in the first instance his commission continued him in the duties of that office until the 4th of March, without regard to the action of the Senate.

Mr. SHAFROTH. There was no vacancy until the 4th of March.

Mr. ROBINSON. There was no vacancy until the 4th of March. The vacancy did not arise until the 4th of March; that is, until the expiration of the session.

Mr. SMOOT. Now, Mr. President, I will continue my statement.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President, if the Senator will yield, I should like very much to know the reason. Let us have the facts about it.

Mr. SMOOT. No, Mr. President; I am not going to state them on the floor of the Senate, and there is no necessity for doing so. They are political, however.

Mr. ROBINSON. If the Senator from Utah will permit me, the facts are that the court could not have appointed a marshal to take the place of Mr. Bland after he was rejected by the Senate prior to the 4th of March, because there was no vacancy. A vacancy did not arise until the expiration of the commission which had been delivered to Mr. Bland, which was the 4th of March. The mere rejection of his name by the Senate did not revoke his commission. There is not a lawyer living who will claim that.

The implied position of the Senator from Utah—and, if I understood the Senator from Connecticut correctly, it is his express position—is that when Mr. Bland learned that he had been rejected by the Senate he should have resigned. He did not do that, however. He continued to serve. He performed the duties of the office; and he is just as much, in law and in good faith, entitled to compensation for the time he served after action was taken in the Senate as he was before it was taken.

Mr. SMOOT. I take the position that if Mr. Bland, after the Senate rejected him, wanted to serve without pay he could have done so; and his rejection was notice that if he served he would have to come to Congress for the salary that he might ultimately receive, and he knew it.

Now, Mr. President, I am going to make a short statement of the case, and I hope no one will interrupt me while I am presenting it.

A. J. Martin resigned in March, 1914, and the court appointed Henry C. Miller to fill the place until another marshal was appointed. The Senate was in session at the time of this resignation, and continued in session for about eight months—up until the latter part of October, 1914. During this time the President sent no name to the Senate for confirmation for this place. On December 4, 1914, after the Senate had adjourned, and three days before the Senate again convened, the President appointed Ewing C. Bland to fill the vacancy.

I am not going to repeat what happened after that time. I have already stated it, and so have other Senators. If the Senate now, after hearing the case and understanding the situation as it really exists, wants to make an appropriation to pay Mr. Bland after the Senate had rejected him, in the face of the statute which says that he shall not be paid, then, of course, that is for the Senate to decide. That is the case exactly as it is.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, it seems to me that the evils which the Senator tells us might happen, in the way of keeping men in office after the Senate had rejected their nominations, might occur in some instances; but when those instances occur, then is the time to invoke the harsh rule that the Senator proposes.

Here is a man who was appointed on the 4th day of December, and he qualified on the 12th day of December. He resigned a judgship in order to take the appointment of the United States marshalship at Kansas City, Mo. He served continuously until the 4th day of March. Notwithstanding the fact that the Senate failed to confirm him or refused to confirm him on the 6th day of January, he still held under his commission until a new appointment was made, or until a judge appointed some other person to fill the place. The judge did not appoint; in fact, as the Senator from Arkansas has said, the judge could not appoint, because no vacancy occurred.

By reason of that, here is a man who has served for this length of time. No one else is claiming this pay. No one else occupied the marshalship. No one else is here pretending that he performed any service whatever. If the United States Government does not pay this, it is practiacly depriving somebody of the rights that are due under that appointment, or, rather, it is getting ahead by reason of the fact of not paying any salary for persons who perform services.

It may be that there is a great question here involving the right of the Senate as against the right of the President; but that principle ought to be invoked, it seems to me, in a case where there is an evil to be remedied. Here is a man who has performed these services. The judge could not have appointed some one else. The man could have resigned, that is true, but where is there a man who will step out when he is rejected by the Senate without any notice from the person who appointed him insisting upon his stepping out?

It seems to me that having performed this service, having done it well, it being necessary that the office of marshal should be administered by some one, it is only fair to pay Mr. Bland this small salary. It is as much a violation of the law which the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] has cited for him to get paid to the 6th of January as it is for him to get paid to the 4th of March. Consequently, if you are going to break it in one instance, and there has been actual service performed, and no one else is claiming the salary, it seems to me he ought to be paid the full compensation for the services which he rendered to the Government.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President, my objection to this amendment is because, by a special act, without any reasonable excuse for doing so, it undertakes to set aside a general statute, which I think was passed for a wise and proper purpose.

The vacancy in this office happened in March, 1914. Congress remained in session for several months after that happened. The court, acting upon statutory authority, appointed a man to fill the place until somebody should be regularly appointed by the President and confirmed by the Senate.

This general statute provides—I have not the statute before me, and therefore I may not quote it accurately, but I am quoting the substance of it—that where the vacancy occurs during the time Congress is in session, and an appointment is made during the recess following, compensation shall not be paid to the officer. That denies to the accounting officers of the Treasury the power to pay compensation to an official appointed under those circumstances.

The purpose of the statute is perfectly evident. It is to prevent the President withholding an appointment from the Senate when the Senate is in session, to enable himself to make an appointment during a recess, and thereby allow his appointee to serve until the adjournment of the succeeding Congress, whether the Senate approves of the appointment or not.

It may happen that an appointment may be made under those circumstances where Congress would be justified in departing from the provisions of this general statute. For example, a vacancy might occur within a day of the adjournment of Congress and the President might be quite unable to send an appointment to the Senate within that short time. That would come under the provisions of the general statute, it is true; but it would present a case where there was reasonable excuse for the failure of the President to send in the appointment while Congress was in session. In that case Congress would be justified in passing a special statute such as this is, and thereby, in that individual case, setting aside the provisions of the general statute.

In this case, however, there is no excuse whatever. The President withheld this appointment from the Senate for six or seven months. He could have sent it in during that time; and not only that, but Congress adjourned in October, and did not reassemble again for two months. The President waited during that two months, until within two or three days of the meeting of the Senate, and then sent in this appointment, apparently because he realized that if he sent it at that time it would be a recess appointment, and his appointee would hold over until the 4th of March, no matter what the Senate determined to do about it.

If the President could wait until two or three days before the meeting of the Senate, he could have waited until the Senate met and then have sent in the appointment. The whole case is surrounded by circumstances of such a character that I do not think the Senate is warranted in departing from the provisions of this general statute. I think under these circumstances the committee have gone even farther than they should have gone in allowing any compensation at all; but certainly they have gone far enough in allowing compensation up to the time when the appointee was rejected by the Senate.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, I wish to call the attention of the Senator from Utah to the fact that there is no effort in this instance to have the person whom the President appointed draw any long salary in the absence of a session of the Senate, because this man was appointed on the 3d or 4th day of December and the Senate immediately met on the 7th day of December. It is not like an appointment after the 4th of March in such a recess as we had last year. If the President had appointed him on the 5th day of March last year, it would have been a recess appointment, and he would hold until December and then the question of his confirmation would come up. It is not that kind of a case where he would get nine months' salary. Here was an appointment made just three or four days before the Senate met.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. The President waited two months after Congress adjourned before he sent in the appointment at all. Let me ask the Senator from Colorado why the President did not wait three days longer and then send it to the Senate in the regular way, without making a recess appointment at all?

Mr. ROBINSON. The Senator knows how these nominations are made. No doubt many times there is great difficulty in the selection of a nominee. The Senator understands fully the difficulties that surround it in many cases.

I do not know whether it is germane to the point immediately under discussion, but I wish to call the Senator's attention to the fact that no word here or elsewhere has ever been alleged against either the integrity or the ability of Mr. Bland or the manner in which he has discharged his duty.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Conceding that the President was justified in not sending the appointment in during the time Congress was in session, which I only concede for the sake of argument, and conceding likewise that he was justified in withholding the appointment for nearly two months while Congress was in recess, then I ask the Senator from Arkansas or the Senator from Colorado to tell me why he did not wait three days longer and send it to the Senate in the regular way instead of making a recess appointment, which enabled the appointee, under the provisions of the Constitution, to hold until the 4th of March no matter what the Senate did. If he had waited three days longer and sent it to the Senate in the regular way, the Senate would have acted upon it, and he would have been rejected on the 6th of January, and he never would have gone into office at all.

Mr. ROBINSON. I do not know how the Senator makes that assumption, since the name of Mr. Shelton had been pending in the Senate for more than a year; but, in reply to the Senator's question——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Colorado further yield?

Mr. SHAFROTH. I thought the Senator from Utah had the floor. I yield.

Mr. ROBINSON. I wish to make a brief statement, in reply to the Senator's question as to why the President did not act differently and wait until the Senate met to send in the name. I merely want to say that I have attempted to present the aspect of the case as showing that the making of these nominations and the manner of making them are within the constitutional prerogative of the President, and, I think, the Senator agreed with me expressly in that statement. If that is the case, I do not think it would lie in my mouth or in the mouth of the Senator from Utah to criticize the action of the President in not making the nomination sooner than he did make it. The subject was surrounded with difficulties, the nature of which in no wise affected either the character or the capacity of Mr. Bland to discharge the duties of the office. The Senator is familiar with these matters, and I am not going to enter into a discussion of them. I rest this case upon the principle that the President, under the Constitution, had the power to make this appointment as a recess appointment; that the commission of Mr. Bland authorized him to continue in service until the 4th of March; and, since the service has never been questioned, but was rendered in good faith, the mere fact that the Senate did not confirm him, but rejected him, did not revoke his commission. If Congress pays him anything, it ought to pay him for the entire time of his service.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. The President has the constitutional power to do a great many things, yet he may do them in a way which will justify criticism, and I think he has made this appointment, although it is an appointment that I concede he had the constitutional power to make, in a manner that justifies criticism.

The statute to which the Senator himself invited attention provides in express terms that when an appointment is made under these circumstances, made in the precise way this appointment was made, the appointee shall not be permitted to have pay, and it requires a specific and special act of Congress to set aside that general statute. I think the statute is wise, and I do not think circumstances have been shown here which justify us in setting it aside.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, it does not seem fair——

Mr. ROBINSON. I want to reply in a few words to the Senator from Utah.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. ROBINSON. I think the Senator from Utah is familiar with the condition under which the statute forbidding payments of salaries in cases of this kind was enacted. It was the result of a conflict between the Congress of the United States and President Johnson, a very bitter conflict involving many questions of alleged encroachments by the Executive on the powers of the Senate, and I do not think it should bar payment of salaries in cases like that now under consideration.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, I do not think it is fair to impugn the motives of the President, no matter what time he sent in the appointment to the Senate or what time he makes the appointment. It is possible that where there have been repeated efforts on the part of the President to fill an appointment there might be something in it that would be the subject of criticism, but in this case it seems to me clearly, if there was reason for criticism, you do not want to visit on the head of an innocent man that which the President did. Mr. Bland had nothing whatever to do with this appointment save as the recipient. There may be many reasons why the President does not send in a name at a particular time.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. May I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. SHAFROTH. In just a minute I will yield. He may be in correspondence with the very man himself to know whether he will accept or not. It may be that there are a great number of appointments that are to be made, or there may be a number of cases where some might be here urging it and asking it as a special favor. To impugn to the President a motive that he sends in this appointment for some advantage on his part it seems to me is not well taken, because the Senate meets thereafter in a few days, and if there is to be a rejection the man can not have the office, except for a very short time.

I can very well see that the criticism might have some weight if the appointment had been made on the 5th of March in a year where we have a nine months' vacation, but with the knowledge that the Senate is going to meet on the 7th of December and could take up the case and reject it, it seems to me you can not impugn the motives of the President and say that he intends to gain any advantage in salary for the man who was appointed. And now to visit that on the man when he probably had no knowledge of the motive, even if a motive did exist, it seems to me is absurd. I yield to the Senator from Utah.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. The Senator thinks it is unfair to visit this punishment upon the man who was appointed because he was innocent. Of course, that would be the case with every appointment that was made under like circumstances; the man who was appointed would be innocent. Then, does the Senator from Colorado think this general statute ought never to be applied?

Mr. SHAFROTH. I doubt very much whether it ever ought to be applied. I am one of those who believe that due credit ought to be given to the appointing power, that it intends in good faith to perform the duties of the office, and not to send in names unless there is good reason for it.

So far as the statute is concerned, as the Senator from Arkansas has just said, it was passed by the Congress of the United States when there was a most violent conflict over the rights of the President of the United States that ever did exist.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. The statute was passed, among other things, to prevent an abuse of power just like this, where the President, instead of sending in the appointment, waits while the Senate is in session for six months and then makes the appointment during the recess.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, we know that there is great difficulty sometimes in getting Senators to agree upon whom they will recommend. All these appointments are made upon recommendation, and consequently there may be great time wasted in trying to get a recommendation of that kind. The President does not want to act hurriedly if there is no recommendation for the appointment, and yet at the same time when he comes to a conclusion with relation to it I believe that we ought to give full faith and credit to the President, I care not to what political party he belongs, that the appointment is wise and just, at least so far as he is concerned.

But it seems to me it would be ridiculous that this should be visited on the man when he had nothing whatever to do with it, and to say that he should suffer, nothwithstanding he performed the service; notwithstanding the fact that he had rendered it; notwithstanding the fact that he in this particular instance had resigned a judgeship to take this United States marshalship. To say that it is a conspiracy on his part to get two months' salary out of this thing seems to me to be absurd. If we have a right to refuse to follow that statute up to the 6th day of January, we have a right to refuse to follow it until the 4th day of March. When we know he performed the service and nobody else did, and nobody is claiming a double salary or anything else, it seems to me this salary should be allowed.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. Mr. President, I am not going to argue this question. The amount involved is exceedingly small. A great deal of time has been consumed, and so I will not argue it from any point of view, but will simply state the parliamentary situation so that Senators may understand it.

The bill as it came to the Senate from the House provided payment for Mr. Bland during the entire period of his service from the time he was appointed until the 4th day of March following. That included pay for the time before he was rejected and the time after he was rejected. The Senate committee thought he ought to be paid for that portion of his service up to the time the Senate rejected him. The Senate committee was not willing to report to the Senate the provision paying Mr. Bland after his nomination had been rejected by the Senate.

So the Senate committee to carry out that view amended the bill as passed by the House. If the amendment of the Senate committee is adopted, Mr. Bland will get pay for the time commencing with the date of his appointment and ending when his nomination was rejected by the Senate. If the Senate committee amendment is rejected, the House provision remains and Mr. Bland will be paid for the entire service, including the time after he was rejected by the Senate. The Senate committee did not think he ought to be paid after his nomination had been rejected by the Senate. So if the Senate committee amendment is sustained Mr. Bland will not be paid after his nomination was rejected, but he will be paid for all his service up to the date of his rejection by the Senate.

Mr. FALL. Mr. President, I have been very much interested in this debate, and it has been very informing to me and convincing of the necessity of debate upon all questions coming before this body. Had it not been for the clear statement made by the Senator from Virginia, I probably would have supported the committee amendment.

Mr. President, this debate illustrates the necessity of explaining, discussing, and considering all matters. It is further confirmatory of my ideas of the duty of a Senator to appear here at all times while the Senate is in session.

I am sorry to say, Mr. President, that I was derelict in my duty this morning during the morning hour at the time Senate concurrent resolution 17 was introduced in this body, declaring, in so far as this body could declare, the opinion of Congress upon great foreign affairs of immense and enormous magnitude to the people of the United States and tying the hands of our soldiers now on foreign soil in pursuance of their duty. It passed without objection, it passed without consideration, it passed without debate.

I want to apologize to the people of the United States, Mr. President, for having been in my office and not in my seat, as I should certainly have objected to the consideration of that resolution and to its adoption. I understand it not to have been in accordance with the policy of the President of the United States as announced by him in a letter to the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations and of the House Rules Committee upon a recent occasion, the President intimating that, having himself assumed the power and the duty to do certain things with reference to foreign matters, he did not think it necessary to come before the Congress of the United States and ask its permission or its cooperation.

However, I do not propose to discuss this matter. I have carefully refrained, although not agreeing with the President in all matters, from any attempt at discussion or interference with him in the handling of recent Mexican affairs. I am in thorough accord with the action which he has taken, if I do not render him my full approval or cooperation in the methods which he has followed or in the words which he has uttered.

I am entirely out of accord with the action taken by the Senate this morning upon this matter, and I simply wanted to register my disapproval and my regret that I was not performing my duty as a Senator in being in my office and not in the room when the resolution was passed.

Mr. President, as I said, the debate on this matter of itself is certainly illustrative of the principle I have more than once invoked here, that we should have open and frank discussions. I am convinced, I may say to the Senator from Arkansas, by the lucid explanation of the Senator from Virginia.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the adoption of the amendment reported by the committee. [Putting the question.] The ayes seem to have it.

Mr. VARDAMAN. I ask for a division.

Mr. SMOOT. Let us have the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry. To vote "yea" sustains the committee amendment?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It sustains the committee amendment.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. GALLINGER (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from New York [Mr. O'GORMAN]. In his absence I will withhold my vote.

Mr. MYERS (when his name was called). I have a pair with the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. MCLEAN]. I transfer the pair to the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. HUSTING] and vote "nay."

The PRESIDING OFFICER (when Mr. OVERMAN'S name was called). The Chair announces his pair with the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN] and withholds his vote.

Mr. JONES (when Mr. PAGE'S name was called). I desire to announce that the Senator from Vermont [Mr. PAGE] is necessarily absent on business of the Senate.

Mr. JONES (when Mr. POINDEXTER'S name was called). I desire to announce that my colleague [Mr. POINDEXTER] is necessarily absent on business of the Senate.

Mr. SAULSBURY (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. COLT]. I transfer that pair to the junior Senator from California [Mr. PHELAN] and vote "yea."

Mr. SMITH of Georgia (when his name was called). I am paired with the senior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] and refrain from voting unless advised how he would vote if present.

Mr. SUTHERLAND (when his name was called). I announce my general pair with the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. CLARKE], who is absent. I transfer my pair to the Senator from Vermont [Mr. PAGE] and vote "yea."

Mr. TILLMAN (when his name was called). I transfer my pair with the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. GOFF] to the Senator from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON] and vote "yea."

Mr. UNDERWOOD (when his name was called). I am paired with the junior Senator from Ohio [Mr. HARDING]. I transfer that pair to the senior Senator from Louisiana [Mr. RANSDELL] and vote "yea."

Mr. WADSWORTH (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. HOLLIS]. In his absence I withhold my vote.

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I transfer my pair with the senior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] to the senior Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK] and vote "yea."

Mr. SAULSBURY. I desire to announce the necessary absence of the senior Senator from Maine [Mr. JOHNSON] on official business of the Senate.

Mr. JONES (after having voted in the affirmative). I have a pair with the junior Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON] for the remainder of the day; but I understand that if present he would vote as I have voted, and therefore I will let my vote stand.

Mr. JAMES. I transfer the general pair I have with the junior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WEEKS] to the senior Senator from Nevada [Mr. NEWLANDS] and vote "nay."

Mr. SHERMAN. I am paired with the Senator from Kansas [Mr. THOMPSON] and withhold my vote.

Mr. CATRON. I am paired with the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN]. As he is not present and has not voted, I withhold my vote.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I transfer my pair with the junior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. OLIVER] to the Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON] and vote "nay."

Mr. WALSH. I wish to announce that the Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE] is paired with the Senator from Maine [Mr. BURLEIGH].

Mr. CHILTON. I wish to announce the absence of the following Senators on official business:

The Senator from Indiana [Mr. KERN], the Senator from Arizona [Mr. SMITH], the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS], the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. HOLLIS], the Senator from Maine [Mr. JOHNSON], the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. STERLING], the Senator from Kansas [Mr. THOMPSON], the Senator from Washington [Mr. POINDEXTER], and the Senator from Vermont [Mr. PAGE.]

Mr. CURTIS. I have been requested to announce the following pairs:

The Senator from Idaho [Mr. BRADY] with the Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER];

The Senator from Vermont [Mr. DILLINGHAM] with the Senator from Maryland [Mr. SMITH];

The Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE] with the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS];

The Senator from Michigan [Mr. SMITH] with the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED];

The Senator from Washington [Mr. POINDEXTER] with the Senator from Arizona [Mr. SMITH];

The Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON] with the Senator from Indiana [Mr. KERN]; and

The Senator from South Dakota [Mr. STERLING] with the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. SHIELDS].

The yeas and nays resulted—yeas 22, nays 18, as follows:

YEAS—22.

Bankhead	Jones	Martin, Va.	Thomas
Brandegee	Kenyon	Norris	Tillman
Chilton	Lane	Saulsbury	Underwood
Clapp	Lea, Tenn.	Smith, Ga.	Works
Curtis	Lippitt	Smoot

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Twenty-two Senators have voted in the affirmative and 18 in the negative, and there are 4 present not voting, making less than a quorum.

Mr. CHILTON. I move that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I ask the Senator to withhold that motion for a moment as I wish to submit an amendment to a pending resolution, which I desire to have printed and lie on the table.

Mr. CHILTON. I withhold the motion for that purpose.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. In the absence of a quorum, under the rule, no business can be transacted until a quorum develops.

Mr. CHILTON. Then I renew my motion that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 5 o'clock and 25 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Saturday, March 18, 1916, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, March 17, 1916.

The House met at 11 o'clock a. m.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Infinite Spirit, Father of all Souls, we would approach Thee in the beauty of holiness, that we may worship Thee in spirit and in truth, that our souls may be vitalized and unified into one purpose by the loving touch of a heavenly Father.

Our little systems have their day;
They have their day and cease to be;
They are but broken lights of Thee
And Thou, O Lord, are more than they.

Thou hast opened the door to opportunities, which invite us to enter in. Efficiency is our task. Give us the courage of our convictions, that we may fulfill our destiny in a faithful service to our fellow men, guided by the light of truth. In Christ Jesus our Lord. Amen.

THE JOURNAL.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read.

The SPEAKER. The word "occupied" in the Journal, in the reference to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. RODENBERG], ought to be "control." With that amendment, without objection the Journal as read will stand approved.

There was no objection.

LEAVE TO PRINT.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members of the House have leave to print remarks on the bill H. R. 12766, the Army reorganization bill, confining their remarks to the bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HAY] asks unanimous consent that all Members shall have the right to print their remarks——

Mr. MANN. For five legislative days after the conclusion——

Mr. HAY. Yes; for five legislative days after the passage of the bill.

The SPEAKER. For five legislative days after the passage of the bill, and the remarks to be confined to the bill itself. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. HICKS. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on the subject of the shellfish industry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York [Mr. HICKS] asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD on the shellfish industry. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

POSTAL SAVINGS SYSTEM.

Mr. MOON. Mr. Speaker, the bill (H. R. 562) to amend the act approved June 25, 1910, authorizing a Postal Savings System, has been returned from the Senate to the House with amendments. I move that the House disagree to the Senate amendments and ask for a conference.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill by title.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 562) to amend the act approved June 25, 1910, authorizing a Postal Savings System.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MOON] asks unanimous consent that the House disagree to the Senate amendments to the bill and ask for a conference. Is there objection?

There was no objection; and the Speaker announced as the conferees on the part of the House Mr. MOON, Mr. FINLEY, and Mr. STEENERSON.

Mr. STEENERSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for five minutes and explain one of these new propositions.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. STEENERSON] asks unanimous consent for five minutes in which to explain one of these amendments. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. STEENERSON. Mr. Speaker, I want to call the attention of the House to the new section, numbered 18, on page 12 of the bill H. R. 562, as amended in the Senate, which reads as follows:

SEC. 18. That hereafter the Postmaster General may establish, under such rules and regulations as he may prescribe, one or more branch offices, nonaccounting offices, or stations of any post office for the transaction of such postal business as may be required for the convenience of the public.

This provision, it is true, went into the appropriation bill last year, but the bill failed to become a law. The proposition was recommended by the department and submitted to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, and was voted down, for the reason that it is a revolutionary proposition.

It looks very innocent on its face, but it amounts to this, that the Postmaster General can abolish some fifty-odd thousand post offices and annex them as substations to the principal offices that he may select. It is proposed by some to make the county a postal division under this bill, and the First Assistant Postmaster General stated in the hearings that he would have authority under the law to establish one post office in each county of the United States and have all the other offices as substations.

Now, there are 533 first-class offices, 2,139 second-class offices, 6,248 third-class offices, and 47,460 fourth-class offices in the United States. If that plan as proposed should go through, it would be possible—and it is evidently the intention of the department—to make one post office in each county. There are 3,000 counties in the United States. You would therefore abolish something like 55,000 or 56,000 post offices and make them substations and make the postmasters superintendents of substations. Of course they would be under the civil service, but it would create that many vacancies to be filled, whether they appointed the old postmasters as superintendents of substations or selected new men. There is no question about the effect of this proposition. At the hearings, on page 128, before the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads the matter was gone into very thoroughly, and the chairman asked several questions. I read:

STATEMENT OF HON. DANIEL C. ROPER, FIRST ASSISTANT POSTMASTER GENERAL.

BRANCH OFFICES.

The CHAIRMAN. I believe you testified to everything except this matter on page 47?

Mr. ROPER. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Let me ask you about this matter:

"Hereafter the Postmaster General may establish, under such rules and regulations as he may prescribe, one or more branch offices, nonaccounting, for the transaction of any post-office business which may be required for the convenience of the public."

What is meant by that statement in there?

Mr. ROPER. We find in the operation of the Postal Service that we could give more satisfactory service if the Postmaster General had greater leeway in the matter of establishing stations than under the present law, which requires that the villages, towns, or cities shall have not less than 1,500 population and be located within 5 miles of the post office to which the proposed station is to be attached.

With the expanding postal service we are able to give to these outlying communities better facilities, as by establishing such stations we are able to extend the delivery service to such communities in many instances, and in many cases, by tacking on such outlying communities to the larger postal district, to give more satisfactory supervision. That is, the station would fall under the general supervision of a man more experienced in handling postal affairs. This measure also would add materially to the convenience and economy of distributing supplies and keeping in general touch with the smaller locality. It is a matter which would naturally be very gradually administered. We are now, as you know, under the law, gradually bringing such districts under this superior supervision when the conditions justify it. We are simply seeking here a little more leeway in the administering of the station feature.

* * * * * * *

The CHAIRMAN. It is your purpose in establishing a nonaccounting office to extend the jurisdiction of the main or central office beyond 5 miles, you say, the limit in taking in these nonaccounting offices?

Mr. ROPER. We are removing the limitations and leaving that to administration.

The CHAIRMAN. So that if at the county seat one county has a large town and you saw fit to do it you would take in the post offices of the adjoining county?

Mr. ROPER. We could make the unit what good administration proves to be the best.

The CHAIRMAN. Whether it was 5 miles or 100 miles, you make it what you saw fit?

Mr. ROPER. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Is that intended to apply to anything except fourth-class offices?

Mr. ROPER. The legislation sought would make it broad enough to apply to other offices.

The CHAIRMAN. To make it apply to other offices—first, second, and third class offices?

Mr. ROPER. To make it apply to any offices where the administration of the service showed it necessary, practicable, and best for the service and the people affected.

The CHAIRMAN. Then, for instance, at Indianapolis, where you have a post office, you could make all your second, third, and fourth class offices subordinate to the Indianapolis office that you saw fit in the State of Indiana?

Mr. ROPER. Of course, the object of this is to create practical units. It would have to be determined from experience in handling this service what the most workable and satisfactory units would be.

Mr. STEENERSON. Did I understand the answer to be in the affirmative?

The CHAIRMAN. Yes. That would have the effect of putting under civil service all the offices you saw fit to put under the control of the chief office, would it not?

Mr. ROPER. Under the present civil-service law it would have the effect of making the postmaster of the office consolidated eligible for classification as station superintendent.

The CHAIRMAN. Do you think that would be satisfactory to the people to have their first, second, and third class offices all subordinate to another first-class office; to have no postmasters, excepting superintendents, appointed under the civil service for them?

Mr. ROPER. I could hardly see how the people would recognize any difference at all, because the station would carry the same name as the offices heretofore carried, and it would carry all the facilities, too.

Mr. BEAKES. They would get city delivery, would they not?

Mr. ROPER. In many instances they would get city delivery, and in all instances they would have better supervision. The offices would be more readily checked up than now, and the cost of auditing accounts would be materially reduced. The losses by burglary would be reduced, for the reason that the stock of stamps would be replenished from day to day by the central post office.

The CHAIRMAN. The postmaster, however, would be just as apt to come from some other town as that one, would he not?

Mr. ROPER. It would make it possible to establish an interchangeable personnel in the service.

The CHAIRMAN. And civil service throughout?

Mr. ROPER. Civil service throughout.

Mr. MADDEN. This would put the Postmaster General in position to appoint one postmaster in the county, would it not; and would put all the other post offices in the county as nonaccounting offices, subject to his jurisdiction?

Mr. ROPER. If the county should be the unit.

Mr. MADDEN. It would make it possible?

Mr. ROPER. Yes, sir.

Mr. MADDEN. That would reduce the number of accounts to be kept in the general office from, say, 60,000 to 3,000, that being the number of counties in the United States, would it not?

Mr. ROPER. Yes, sir; it would very materially reduce the work here.

Mr. MADDEN. It would make the tenure of office of the men who are now postmasters, in every case except those that would not be changed, permanent?

Mr. ROPER. The Postmaster General has already recommended the classification of postmasters of the third and second classes.

Mr. MADDEN. It would introduce a system similar to the system we have, say, in the big cities, like New York and Chicago. For example, we have 2,500,000 people in Chicago, and we have 1 postmaster and 52 post offices, in effect, because we have 51 stations outside of the post office, over each of which there is a superintendent presiding.

Mr. ROPER. From an administrative standpoint, we look upon the entire county as an enlarged city.

Mr. MADDEN. Surely. And you believe that this suggestion is a suggestion in line of good administration for the department, do you not?

Mr. ROPER. I do.

Mr. MADDEN. I am inclined to agree that it is myself.

Mr. COX. What is your judgment as to economies it would bring about, cost of administration, and so forth? Would it lessen or increase them?

Mr. ROPER. I think anything which adds to the efficiency of operation necessarily results in economy, and in this we would certainly have very material efficiency added to the service.

Mr. COX. Have you any data or compilations along that line showing the approximate amount that would be saved to the Government if a plan of that kind should be worked out?

Mr. ROPER. I have no data except the information relating to localities which have become stations during this administration, compared with the operation of those stations prior to the time when they were stations.

* * * * * * *

Mr. MADDEN. I could illustrate one or two cases myself, Mr. Cox. For example, Chicago to-day has about 200 square miles of territory. Before the annexed outside territory came in we had 37 square miles of territory. With each new annexation we brought in one or more post offices, over which postmasters presided. After annexation the post office with the postmaster was discontinued. The post office itself was continued as a station with a superintendent. The salary of the superintendent was probably not in any case more than one-half the salary of the postmaster before it came in.

Mr. ROPER. Not less than two-thirds and in some cases more. The minimum salary paid to a superintendent of a station is $1,200. As the majority of offices consolidated with larger offices are of the third and fourth classes, consolidation usually results in an increase in the salary of the postmaster of the discontinued office. Although when larger offices are consolidated the postmasters of the discontinued offices suffer a reduction in salary, they are compensated for this by being made secure in their positions.

Mr. MADDEN. I would not think it was that much. Perhaps it may be. I would not undertake to say certainly. But I think it is agreed by everybody that the service rendered by the superintendent of the station is infinitely more satisfactory than the service rendered by the post office as such before the annexation.

Mr. COX. Right in that connection you have found from experience out there that there has been a great economy in the way of saving of salaries?

Mr. MADDEN. Oh, yes.

Mr. COX. Now in the way of supplies and reports backward and forward, have you any estimate of that?

Mr. MADDEN. They all make their reports to the postmaster of the city of Chicago and he makes his report to the Postmaster General, which only makes one account from Chicago between the general office and Chicago, whereas if we had the 52 post offices we would have 52 reports and 52 sources of supplies.

Mr. COX. And the department here would be running 52 accounts with 52 postmasters in the city of Chicago?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes, sir.

Mr. COX. Whereas now it is only running one account?

Mr. MADDEN. That is right. That is what will happen all over the country if this provision recommended by the Postmaster General be adopted.

The CHAIRMAN. If you had just one office in each State you would have 48 accounts?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes, that is true.

The CHAIRMAN. And if you had only one in the United States you would only have one account. That is the logic of that.

Mr. STEENERSON. About how many officers would there be if this new provision were enacted into law? Could you give an estimate?

Mr. ROPER. I would state, Mr. STEENERSON, that these units would have to result from experience in operating the service. I mean the size of the units would have to be determined from experience. It would be impossible to advise in advance just how large or how small those units should be.

Mr. STEENERSON. It has been suggested here that there are 3,000 counties in the United States, approximately, and there are approximately 60,000 post offices now.

Mr. ROPER. Yes; 56,000 post offices.

Mr. STEENERSON. So it might reduce it to 6,000?

Mr. ROPER. There are sometimes several important municipalities within one county. That might make it necessary to have in some counties several units, but there would be a great many counties, no doubt, in which one unit would answer.

Mr. STEENERSON. Probably in the majority?

Mr. ROPER. Probably in the majority of the counties of the country.

Mr. STEENERSON. Right here I should like to have you give the substance of the law now as it is on the subject, so we can compare it with the proposed provision.

Mr. ROPER. I will insert it in exact terms and ask the stenographer to insert the law.

Mr. STEENERSON. We should like to have your version so we can understand how it is interpreted.

Mr. ROPER. It simply gives to the Postmaster General the right to extend the service of these large communities so as to take in communities where the population is as much as 1,500, and where such communities are within a radius of 5 miles of the post office to which it is to be attached.

Mr. STEENERSON. You might insert the exact language.

Mr. ROPER. It is as follows, Postal Laws and Regulations, which is the law:

"SEC. 249. The Postmaster General, when the public convenience requires it, may establish within any post-office delivery one or more branch offices (stations or substations) for the receipt and delivery of mail matter and the sale of stamps and envelopes; and he shall prescribe the rules and regulations for the government thereof. But no letter shall be sent for delivery to any branch office contrary to the request of the party to whom it is addressed.

"2. No station, substation, or branch post office shall be established beyond the corporate limits or boundaries of any city or town in which the principal office to which such station, substation, or branch office is attached is located, except in cases of villages, towns, or cities of 1,500 or more inhabitants not distant more than 5 miles, as near as may be, from the outer boundary or limits of such city or town in which the principal office is located."

Section 252 of the Postal Laws and Regulations:

"2. No post office established at any county seat shall be abolished or discontinued by reason of any consolidation of post offices made by the Postmaster General under existing law * * *: Provided, however, That this provision shall not apply to the city of Cambridge, Mass., or to Towson, Md., or to Clayton, St. Louis County, Mo."

Mr. COX. I wish to ask you a question in that connection. Practically the plan that you are seeking to have incorporated here is now in force in the large cities, is it not? Only one post office, and all the rest of the stations accounting to the post office?

Mr. ROPER. Yes. We have now, of course, the service in that respect organized by municipalities, as you say. Then we have around these municipalities certain communities which have been tacked on for the purpose of giving them city delivery service.

Mr. COX. In what cities do you have this kind of service in force?

Mr. ROPER. In nearly all of the large cities.

Mr. COX. Your idea now, if I gather it, is to simply enlarge and to extend that service out over the State, or out over the United States?

Mr. ROPER. We are asking authority to do that when it seems to be in the interest of the service. There are no fixed units in our minds at this time, and I doubt whether you could fix uniform units for the entire country. You would have to deal with the conditions as they exist.

Mr. COX. Under your present system of only having one accounting officer in the cities, practically, like Chicago, there is no question but what we have better service under the present system than we would have if we had 52 different offices, is there?

Mr. ROPER. I think that we have absolutely uniform testimony that the service is superior.

Mr. COX. Is superior?

Mr. ROPER. Yes.

* * * * * * *

Mr. COX. * * * I suppose the same system in force in Chicago is in force in New York, Philadelphia, Boston, and St. Louis, is it not?

Mr. ROPER. Certainly. In Boston we have about 80 stations.

Mr. MADDEN. You go outside of the city of Boston?

Mr. ROPER. Yes, sir; we take in municipalities like Cambridge, the university city of Boston, Brookline, Chelsea, etc.

Mr. MADDEN. For example, we have some stations in Chicago with as many as 200 men, I think one at least, and I think the superintendent of that station, which is the Canal Station, gets about $2,200 a year, if I am not mistaken.

Mr. COX. As postmaster he would get $4,000?

Mr. MADDEN. From 160 to 200 men would be a big post office, would it not?

Mr. COX. It would; surely.

Mr. MADDEN. You can imagine what he would get if he was postmaster.

Mr. COX. Take the State of Indiana, with Indianapolis as the center, and it is nearly the center of the State. Would it be your idea to gradually work the plan out over the State so as to make Indianapolis the accounting office for the whole State of Indiana?

Mr. ROPER. That would not be my idea. That would be too large a postal district.

Mr. COX. Too large a territory?

Mr. ROPER. If you will permit me to give an offhand opinion, I should say that, as a rule, the counties of Indiana would constitute about as large districts as would be found practicable for this purpose.

Mr. COX. That would mean 92 postmasters in the State of Indiana, and the remainder of them stations?

Mr. ROPER. Probably we would have to make exceptions to that and deal with these large municipalities as separate districts.

Mr. COX. But in rural communities, where you have 1,000 to, say, 3,000 inhabitants, you would make one town in each county the accounting office and the rest of them to be served from there?

Mr. ROPER. The county, or part of county agreed upon, would constitute the unit, and in that unit there would be one accounting office and the others would be stations of that office.

Mr. COX. The head of the accounting office would be the postmaster for that territory?

Mr. ROPER. He would be the postmaster for that territory.

Mr. COX. And he would be an appointed officer?

Mr. ROPER. Yes, sir.

Mr. COX. And the stations would be under civil service?

Mr. ROPER. Stations would be under civil service.

Mr. RANDALL. Gen. Roper, in the matter of auditing the accounts of the 52 stations of the Chicago post office it was to be shown in the record the amount that is saved to the department at Washington on that account. Is it not the fact that the accounts of those 52 stations will have to be audited in the Chicago post office instead of being audited here, and would it not cost as much to audit them there as in the Post Office Department in Washington?

Mr. ROPER. We find not. That is a question for the auditor to answer, but it seems to me that the auditing can be done much more expeditiously and much more economically by these accounting offices. The former is very important, namely the expedition. We have been, as you know, for a number of years endeavoring to lessen the period between the transaction and the audit in order that we might get in closer touch with the transactions of the post offices of the country with regard to the handling of our funds.

Mr. MADDEN. So you keep these accounts——

Mr. ROPER. I can see no other way in which it can be made and kept current the postal accounts.

Mr. RANDALL. I refer only to expenses. It strikes me that you are better equipped in the auditor's office here to audit accounts than you would be in Indianapolis or Topeka or any such place as that.

Mr. ROPER. I am unable to see why these districts could not be made just as effective, through their knowledge of local conditions, as we are in the auditor's office in Washington; but a more important feature than you have mentioned is getting this auditing on a current basis and checking and protecting the revenues of the Government.

Mr. ROUSE. This only could be applied to presidential offices, could it not? For instance, if you had a county without a presidential office in it, you could not establish this provision, could you?

Mr. ROPER. Oh, yes.

Mr. MADDEN. Yes; because it would make it presidential. If you take the receipts of the whole county, it would make it presidential, do you not see?

Mr. ROUSE. But could you do that? There are a number of counties, take, for instance, in the mountains, where you have nothing but fourth-class offices; some in other sections that are not mountainous; for instance, Mr. COX'S district.

Mr. MADDEN. But if you took the aggregate receipts of all fourth-class offices in that county, that would make one presidential office.

Mr. ROUSE. But that is not contemplated, is it, General?

Mr. ROPER. We have endeavored to ask you here for legislation that will permit us to work this out in the most feasible and practicable manner. I can not undertake to say to you now just what experience will show to be the most practicable unit.

Mr. ROUSE. Let me get back to that original proposition again. I referred to Mr. COX'S district, which is not fair. But I will take my own district, for instance. I live in a county that has not a presidential office. I know of one town in the county, the county seat, with less than 200 people. It has a fourth-class office. There is not one presidential office in the county. The nearest presidential office to my home is 15 miles away, at Covington, Ky., in an adjoining county. Could Covington be made the accounting office and all the offices in my home county get their mail by star routes? Could they be made to account to the Covington office under this plan?

Mr. ROPER. As I have stated in answer to Mr. COX'S question, I feel now that the county is as large a unit as we would want to deal with, and, even in a county where there are several municipalities, that county might be subdivided into further units.

Mr. AYRES. Under this plan the second and third class post offices come under the same plan, and the fourth class being under civil service.

Mr. ROPER. The Postmaster General has already recommended the classification of the postmasters of the second and third classes, and this would naturally result in classifying the offices that would be consolidated with the accounting office.

The CHAIRMAN. If there was only one first-class office——

Mr. ROPER (interposing). There might be some counties where the office might not be rated as a first-class office—might be rated second class.

The CHAIRMAN. Say the program for change put the second and third class offices under civil service; presidential offices would only be first class?

Mr. ROPER. Yes; really the approval of the recommendations that the Postmaster General has made accomplishes that.

Mr. RANDALL. Would it not be possible and would it not be the policy of the department to establish a number of small stations and rural routes where fourth-class postmasters have been discontinued on account of the establishment of rural routes? Would it not be possible to restore service, to get the same accommodations that the fourth-class post office formerly afforded, by establishing small stations?

Mr. ROPER. As I say, we no doubt would find through experience that such conditions as you mention would arise, but in advance of any experience along this line I could not say whether the suggestion that you have made would be considered or not. It might be.

Mr. MADDEN. If this suggestion should be adopted and the county was made the unit, or whatever was made the unit would be made large enough, the unit would be made large enough so that the postmaster appointed for the unit would be the first-class postmaster. It necessarily would be a first-class post office, because the receipts within the unit would be large enough to justify his appointment as such.

Mr. ROPER. In answer to the chairman, I have just said that I presume that would be the case in most instances, although there are some small counties, no doubt, where the postmaster would not be ranked perhaps above the second class.

Mr. MADDEN. But there would not be anything below the first and second class?

Mr. ROPER. First and second class offices.

Mr. MADDEN. And all fourth-class postmasters would be done away with and superintendents of stations would take their places?

Mr. ROPER. No; they would not be done away with. The fourth-class postmaster would simply become the superintendent of the station or clerk in charge.

Mr. MADDEN. That is what I say. He would not be a postmaster any longer, but the superintendent of a station?

Mr. ROPER. For all intents and purposes he is a postmaster.

Mr. MADDEN. Suppose he is a postmaster; what would be the basis of pay for the fourth-class postmasters?

Mr. ROPER. You are here providing a scale in this bill for the payment of station superintendents.

Mr. MADDEN. But that scale generally does not go as low as the salaries of those fourth-class postmasters?

Mr. ROPER. The lowest salary we could have would be an $800 clerk, the entrance grade.

Mr. MADDEN. That is too much to pay these men, is it not? Suppose the man's salary as fourth-class postmaster amounts to but $200 or $300; are you going to put him under civil service and pay him $800?

Mr. ROPER. You understand we have different kinds of stations where that might result in establishing not a classified but a contract station, with a clerk in charge receiving a salary as low as $50, based upon the business of the station, the same as is now done in large cities.

Mr. STEENERSON. I think there are probably 25 post offices in my district where the postmaster's salary is less than $50 a year. Would their salary be raised under this plan, or would it be reduced?

Mr. ROPER. In all probability the salary of such postmaster would remain the same as at present. We probably might not disturb your district at all, if it were not in the interest of better service for your district. The object of this is to improve the service, and if we could not get better service through the plan here suggested we would maintain the present service.

Mr. STEENERSON. But the suggestion made by Mr. Madden, that in counties where there are no second-class and no third-class offices, no presidential offices, that all the offices might be consolidated so as to form a presidential office; that is not contemplated by this, is it?

Mr. ROPER. No; he used the word "might."

Mr. STEENERSON. But it might not. As I read this proposed law, you would not have any such authority. You would have to change your language in this provision if you were going to do that, because this proposed language only authorizes you to consolidate with some existing third or second class office or first-class office. I do not think you can create or consolidate offices in a whole county and make that kind of office a presidential office.

Mr. ROPER. I will read the language:

"That hereafter the Postmaster General may establish, under such rules and regulations as he may prescribe, one or more branch offices, nonaccounting offices or stations, of any post office for the transaction of such postal business as may be required for the convenience of the public."

Mr. MADDEN. That would give him the right, then, Mr. Roper, to appoint a superintendent of a station where it was justified instead of a postmaster, or it would give him a right to establish a contract station where he would not be justified in appointing a superintendent of a station.

Mr. ROPER. Yes; or maintain the present system.

Mr. MADDEN. Yes; either one.

Mr. ROPER. Yes, sir.

Mr. BEAKES. Would there not be economy in the shipment of supplies from Washington to the central post office instead of to the several post offices?

Mr. ROPER. I will answer for the Fourth Assistant on that. In my opinion it will effect very great economy in that respect, but a greater economy than even the one you have mentioned would be the better care of supplies.

Mr. BEAKES. I was going to speak of that.

Mr. ROPER. Better supervision.

Mr. BEAKES. Has not the department found that these offices have no use for a great many of the supplies, and would they be likely to get those supplies if they asked for them from the central post office?

Mr. ROPER. Not only that, but this central postmaster could deal more equitably with the demand and conditions of these other offices accounting to him than probably could be done from Washington.

Mr. BEAKES. Would it not be possible to work out a scheme which would preserve the local communities by allowing them to keep the name of the post office while putting them on the station basis?

Mr. ROPER. That is what I intended to say in the outset. It is our idea not to disturb the name, not to infringe on the pride of the community which it may have in regard to its name; to give the community everything it now has, and a superior service to what it now has.

* * * * * * * *

Mr. STEENERSON. You spoke of a sentiment of the patrons. Now, in these recent considerations, for instance in Boston, have you consulted the sentiment of the people?

Mr. ROPER. The consolidations in the Boston district were made in the administration immediately preceding this.

Mr. STEENERSON. Have you heard of any dissatisfaction?

Mr. ROPER. There was some dissatisfaction growing out of what would appear to have been a too rapid consolidation. We have in Boston about 80 stations, and the previous administration absorbed a great many large communities. Among them was Lynn, the large shoe-manufacturing community adjacent to Boston. In the case of Lynn some protests were filed, which we carefully investigated, and after due investigation reached the conclusion that Lynn should be kept as a postal district to itself, and we therefore have removed Lynn from the station classification made under Mr. Hitchcock's administration, and it is now a separate postal district. We discovered, Mr. STEENERSON, that Lynn was a better district to itself. We have other offices consolidated with Lynn.

Mr. STEENERSON. How was it about Cambridge?

Mr. ROPER. In the case of Cambridge I know of no special opposition.

Mr. STEENERSON. And you have never heard of any?

Mr. ROPER. I would not go so far as that, Mr. STEENERSON, because I should have to refer to department files for positive data.

Mr. STEENERSON. When was that included as a substation?

Mr. ROPER. We have made no consolidation in and around Boston during this administration.

Mr. STEENERSON. They were all made before?

Mr. ROPER. Before my connection with the Postal Service.

Mr. STEENERSON. But under the same law now in operation?

Mr. ROPER. Under the law now in operation. We have not disturbed that district except as to Lynn——

Mr. STEENERSON (interposing). You then retained Lynn as an independent post office?

Mr. ROPER. Yes, sir.

Mr. STEENERSON. If a similar discontent among the patrons of the office existed in Cambridge you would reestablish that?

Mr. ROPER. We would consider it.

Mr. STEENERSON. You would give them the same show you gave Lynn, would you not?

Mr. ROPER. We endeavor to treat all alike.

Mr. MADDEN. We have some outlying territory outside the city limits of Chicago—Argo and Mount Greenway. You probably recall some correspondence on Mount Greenway?

Mr. ROPER. I do.

Mr. MADDEN. The people at Mount Greenway would be very anxious to have a station established there and have the delivery made from the Chicago post office rather than to have a separate post office established. So far the department has not been able to give them the Chicago delivery, so they get their mail by rural delivery. The sense of the people is to the effect that they would prefer to have Chicago delivery than to have a separate post office.

Mr. ROPER. We have a very interesting illustration at North Kansas City. North Kansas City is a community that has developed very rapidly within the last few months, because of the establishment of large mail-order business in that community, but it just happened that the population is not 1,500, and consequently we can not extend the desired facilities to that community under the present law.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there anything further on this matter? The other matter you felt you wanted to discuss in executive session?

Mr. ROPER. The Second Assistant is here, Mr. Chairman, with a statement in answer to certain requests made by Mr. Madden the other day, and I shall be glad to give way to him and not keep him here, if he wishes to make his statement at this time—

And so on. There is no question but that this authority is broad enough to abolish all the post offices in the United States except one in each new division, which might be one in each county, and in some cases, where the counties are small, they might abolish all the offices in two or three counties and make one central office covering them all, and make the other offices substations of the principal office.

It is the most revolutionary proposition. The committee voted it down, but now it has gone on in another legislative body as an amendment to this postal savings bill without one word of comment or debate. [Applause.]

LEAVE TO EXTEND REMARKS.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD, with regard to the Puget Sound customs district.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Washington asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks on the Puget Sound customs district. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

THE MILITARY ESTABLISHMENT.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 12766) to increase the efficiency of the Military Establishment of the United States. Under the rule, I do not know that it is necessary to make that motion——

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks it is.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 12766) to increase the efficiency of the Military Establishment of the United States.

The SPEAKER. The Chair selected the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GARRETT] to preside over this Committee of the Whole, and in his temporary absence he will appoint the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. LLOYD] to take the chair until the gentleman from Tennessee arrives.

Mr. HAY. I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GORDON].

Mr. GORDON. Mr. Chairman, the subject of national defense is one that has received the attention of the Congress and the President of the United States perhaps more than any other one question in our history.

I desire to confine my remarks upon this bill largely to a consideration of our own means of national defense, as contrasted with Switzerland and some other nations. For information upon the technical subject of our legal establishment, as affected by the provisions of this bill, I would prefer not to be interrogated, but would request Members to direct their interrogatories to the distinguished chairman of the House Military Affairs Committee [Mr. HAY], who, I believe, knows more about the Military Establishment of the United States than any other living man.

The framers of the Federal Constitution were great men, learned in the history of free governments, and they undertook to establish upon this continent a free Republic that would endure for all time against dangers from without and dangers from within.

One of the most distinguished writers of English literature, Sir Edward Creasy, in his great work, Fifteen Decisive Battles of the World, in describing the battle of Marathon, in which about 20,000 free citizens of the Greek Republic successfully defended against an invasion of more than 100,000 Persians, composed almost entirely of regular soldiers, speaks of the conduct of the free Greeks in that great and historic battle in these words:

According to old national customs, the warriors of each tribe were arrayed together; neighbors thus fighting by the side of neighbors, friend by friend, and the spirit of emulation and the consciousness of responsibility excited to the very utmost.

This is the fundamental idea underlying the formation of our State militia. Every citizen of the United States between 18 and 45 is described in the statutes enacted by Congress as subject to military service, and they are enrolled by the constitutions of most of the States as members of the National Guard, thus qualifying them for the performance of the most sacred duty of the citizen of a free State and of our great Republic.

The Constitution of the United States, in providing for the national defense, confers upon Congress the power—

To provide for calling forth the militia to execute the laws of the Union, suppress insurrections, and repel invasions.

To provide for organizing, arming, and disciplining the militia, and for governing such part of them as may be employed in the service of the United States, reserving to the States, respectively, the appointment of the officers, and the authority of training the militia according to the discipline prescribed by Congress.

Pursuant to that authority, the Committee on Military Affairs have sought to frame this bill to increase the efficiency of the Military Establishment of the United States.

Like most subjects of general public interest, the question of national defense is now being discussed throughout this Union by many who know very little about the subject, and my observation has been that those of our citizens who know the least are the ones who talk the most. [Laughter.]

We are told in speeches and newspapers that what we need in the United States is the Swiss system; but, following the remarks of many of the gentlemen advocating the Swiss system, we are constrained to believe that they know very little about that system, because the Swiss constitution, like that of every other nation upon the continent of Europe, contains a provision authorizing compulsory military service; and because there are some well-meaning gentlemen in this country, largely Army officers, who want Congress to enact a compulsory military-service law, we hear these heated advocates of the Swiss system exhibiting their lack of knowledge of what that system provides.

The first provision of the Swiss constitution, providing for national defense, is Article XIII, which reads as follows:

The Confederation shall have no right to maintain a standing army.

That is a provision which is not contained in the Constitution of the United States, because the framers of that great instrument felt and believed that in this great Republic that prohibition was unnecessary. It is only fair to say, however, that many eminent men in that convention did advocate such a prohibition as is contained in the Swiss constitution.

Thomas Jefferson, who was then in Paris as our minister to France, advocated such a prohibition in his correspondence with James Madison, who is known in history as the father of the Constitution; and Mr. Madison himself, in that convention, said upon that subject:

As the greatest danger is that of disunion of the States, it is necessary to guard against it by sufficient powers to the common government; and, as the greatest danger to liberty is from large standing armies, it is best to prevent them by an effectual provision for a good militia.

Your committee believe, and submit for the consideration of the House, that the powers of Congress to legislate upon that subject have never been exhausted.

The constitution of Switzerland on national defense reads as follows:

CONSTITUTION OF SWITZERLAND.

ARTICLE 13.

The Confederation shall have no right to maintain a standing army.

No Canton or Half Canton shall, without the permission of the Federal Government, have a standing force of more than 300 men; the armed police are not included in this number.

ARTICLE 18.

Every Swiss is bound to perform military service.

Soldiers who lose their lives or suffer permanent injury to their health in consequence of Federal service are entitled to aid from the Confederation for themselves or their families in case of need.

Each soldier shall receive without expense his first equipment, clothing, and arms. The arms shall remain in the hands of the soldier, under conditions which shall be prescribed by Federal legislation.

The Confederation shall enact uniform provisions as to a tax for exemption from military service.

ARTICLE 19.

The Federal Army shall be composed:

(a) Of all the cantonal military corps.

(b) Of all Swiss who do not belong to such military corps but who are nevertheless liable to military service.

The Confederation exercises control over the army and the material of war provided by law.

In cases of danger the Confederation shall also have the exclusive and direct control of men not included in the Federal Army and of all other military resources of the Cantons.

The Cantons shall have authority over the military forces of their territory, so far as this right is not limited by the Federal constitution or laws.

ARTICLE 20.

The laws on the organization of the army shall be enacted by the Confederation. The enforcement of military laws in the Cantons shall be entrusted to the cantonal officials, within the limits which shall be fixed by Federal legislation and under the supervision of the Confederation.

Military instruction of every kind shall be under the control of the Confederation. The same applies to the equipment of the troops.

The furnishing and maintenance of clothing and equipment shall be within the power of the Cantons, but the Cantons shall be credited with the expenses therefor according to a regulation to be established by Federal legislation.

ARTICLE 21.

So far as military reasons do not prevent, corps of troops shall be formed from soldiers of the same Canton.

The composition of these bodies of troops, the maintenance of their effective strength, and the appointment and promotion of their officers shall belong to the Cantons, subject to the general regulations which shall be issued to them by the Confederation.

It will be observed by reference to article 21 that the people of Switzerland have embodied in their organic law the fundamental idea of our State militia or National Guard, except that they have more closely safeguarded the control of the Cantons—which correspond with our States—over the appointment and promotion of officers than our own Constitution restricts the powers of the States over their own militia, because immediately upon calling forth the militia, under the Constitution of the United States, for either of the purposes therein specified, the President becomes Commander in Chief, and as such is authorized to control the appointment of officers in accordance with his conception of the best interests of the efficiency of the military service, subject to such legislation as Congress may have enacted on the subject.

The constitution of my own State of Ohio declares that—

Standing armies are dangerous to liberty, and shall not be kept up, and the military shall be in strict subordination to the civil power.

Jefferson and Madison were not alone in their views upon the subject of the danger to free governments of a large standing army. I might quote from nearly every President of this Republic upon that subject, and will in the RECORD insert many observations made in official communications to the Congress by Presidents of the United States upon the question. In his sixth annual address to Congress on November 19, 1794, George Washington said:

The devising and establishing of a well-regulated militia would be a genuine source of legislative honor and a perfect title to public gratitude. I therefore entertain a hope that the present session will not pass without carrying to its full energy the power of organizing, arming, and disciplining the militia, and thus providing in the language of the Constitution for calling them forth to execute the laws of the Union, suppress insurrection, and repel invasions.

And in his Farewell Address, September, 1796, the Father of his Country said:

We will avoid the necessity of those overgrown military establishments which, under any form of government, are inauspicious to liberty and which are to be regarded as particularly hostile to republican liberty.

The second President of the United States, John Adams, in a letter to Thomas McKean, June 21, 1812, said:

The danger of our Government is that the general will be a man of more popularity than the President and the Army possess more powers than Congress.

The people should be apprised of this and guard themselves against it. Nothing is more essential than to hold the civil authority decidedly superior to the military power.

In his first annual message, December 8, 1801, Jefferson said:

A statement has been formed by the Secretary of War, on mature consideration, of all the posts and stations where garrisons will be expedient and of the number of men requisite for each garrison. The whole amount is considerable short of the present Military Establishment. For the surplus no particular use can be pointed out. For defense against invasion their number is as nothing, nor is it conceived needful or safe that a standing army should be kept up in time of peace for that purpose. Uncertain as we must ever be of the particular point in our circumference where an enemy may choose to invade us the only force which can be ready at every point and competent to oppose them is the body of neighboring citizens as formed into a militia. On these, collected from the parts most convenient in numbers proportioned to the invading force, it is best to rely not only to meet the first attack but, if it threatens to be permanent, to maintain the defense until Regulars may be engaged to relieve them. These considerations render it important that we should at every season continue to amend the defects which from time to time show themselves in the laws for regulating the militia until they are sufficiently perfect. Nor should we now or at any time separate until we can say we have done everything for the militia which we could do were an enemy at our door. The provisions of military stores on hand will be laid before you that you may judge of the additions requisite (p. 317).

On December 15, 1802, in his second annual message, Jefferson said:

No change being deemed necessary in our Military Establishment, an estimate of its expenses for the ensuing year on its present footing, as also of the sums to be employed in fortifications and other objects within that department, has been prepared by the Secretary of War, and will make a part of the general estimate, which will be presented to you.

Considering that our Regular troops are employed for local purposes and that the militia is our general reliance for great and sudden emergencies, you will doubtless think this institution worthy of a review and give it those improvements of which you find it susceptible (p. 333).

In his fifth annual message, December 3, 1805, Jefferson said, after advising preparation for coast defense:

In the meantime you will consider whether it would not be expedient for a state of peace as well as of war so to organize or class the militia as would enable us on any sudden emergency to call for the services of the younger portions, unencumbered with the old, and those having families. Upwards of 300,000 (population, 5,308,483—1800) between the ages of 18 and 26 years, which the last census shows we may now count within our limits, will furnish a competent number for offense or defense in any point where they may be wanted and will give time for raising Regular forces after the necessity of them shall become certain; and the reducing to the early period of life all its active service can not but be desirable to our younger citizens of the present as well as future times, inasmuch as it engages to them in more advanced age a quiet and undisturbed repose in the bosom of their families. I can not, then, but earnestly recommend to your early consideration the expediency of so modifying our militia system as, by a separation of the more active part from that which is less so, we may draw from it when necessary an efficient corps, fit for real and active service, and to be called to it in regular rotation.

On February 25, 1808, Thomas Jefferson said in a special message to Congress:

The dangers to our country arising from the contests of other nations, and the urgency of making preparation for whatever events might affect our relations with them have been intimated in preceding messages to Congress. To secure ourselves by due precautions an augmentation of our military force, as well regular as volunteer, seems to be expedient. The precise extent of that augmentation can not yet be satisfactorily suggested, but that no time may be lost, and especially at a season deemed favorable to the object, I submit to the wisdom of the legislature whether they will authorize a commencement of this precautionary work by a present provision for raising and organizing some additional force, reserving to themselves to decide its ultimate extent on such views of our situation as I may be enabled at a future day of the session to give you. If an increase of force be now approved, I submit to their consideration the outlines of a plan proposed in the inclosed letter from the Secretary of War. I recommend also to the attention of Congress the term at which the act of Congress of April 18, 1806, concerning the militia, will expire and the effect of that expiration (p. 429).

On November 29, 1809, Madison said, in his first annual message:

I should be failing in my duty in not recommending to your serious attention the importance of giving to our militia, the great bulwark of our security and resource of our power, an organization the best adapted to eventual situations for which the United States ought to be prepared (p. 46).

On January 3, 1810, Madison said in a special message:

The act authorizing a detachment of 100,000 men from the militia will expire on the 30th of March, next. Its early revival is recommended in order that timely steps may be taken for arrangements such as the act contemplates.

I submit to the consideration of Congress, moreover, the expediency of such a classification and organization of the militia as will best insure prompt and successive aid from that source, adequate to emergencies which may call for them (p. 463).

In his second annual message, December 5, 1810, Madison said:

The improvements in quality and quantity made in the manufacture of cannon and small arms, both at the public armories and private factories, warrant additional confidence in the competency of these resources for supplying the public exigencies. These preparations for arming the militia having thus far provided for one of the objects contemplated by the power vested in Congress with respect to that great bulwark of the public safety, it is for their consideration whether further provisions are not requisite for the other contemplated objects of organization and discipline. To give to this great mass of physical and moral force the efficiency which it merits and is capable of receiving, it is indispensable that they should be instructed and practiced in the rules by which they are to be governed.

Toward the accomplishment of this important work, I recommend for the consideration of Congress the expediency of instituting a system which shall in the first instance call into the field at the public expense and for a given time certain portions of the commissioned and noncommissioned officers. The instruction and discipline thus acquired would gradually diffuse through the entire body of the militia that practical knowledge and promptitude for active service which are the great ends to be pursued. Experience has left no doubt either of the necessity or of the efficacy of competent military skill in those portions of an army in fitting it for the final duties which it may have to perform (pp. 470 and 741).

In his third annual message, November 5, 1811, Madison recited that England was making war on our lawful commerce, and recommended that the United States be put into an armor and attitude demanded by the crisis; advised—filling the ranks and prolonging the enlistment of regular troops; for an auxiliary force to be engaged for a more limited term; for the acceptance of volunteer corps, whose patriotic ardor may court a participation in urgent services; for detachments as they may be wanted of other portions of the militia, and for such a preparation of the great body as will proportion its usefulness to its intrinsic capacities.

Nor can the occasion fail to remind you of the importance of those military seminaries which in every event will form a valuable and frugal part of our Military Establishment. The manufacture of cannon and small arms has proceeded with due success, and the stock and resources of all the necessary munitions are adequate to emergencies. It will not be inexpedient, however, for Congress to authorize an enlargement of them.

On September 20, 1814, President Madison, in his sixth annual message, described the progress of the war with England, and said:

To meet the extended and diversified warfare adopted by the enemy, great bodies of militia have been taken into service for the public defense, and great expenses incurred. That the defense everywhere may be both more convenient and more economical Congress will see the necessity of immediate measures for filling the ranks of the Regular Army, and of enlarging the provisions for special corps, mounted and unmounted, to be engaged for longer periods of service than are due from the militia. I can earnestly renew, at the same time, a recommendation of such changes in the system of the militia as, by classing and disciplining for the most prompt and active service the portions most capable of it, will give to that great resource for the public safety all the requisite energy and safety (pp. 534, 535).

In his seventh annual message, December 5, 1815, Madison said:

Notwithstanding the security for future repose which the United States ought to find in their love of peace and their constant respect for the rights of other nations, the character of the times particularly inculcates the lesson that, whether to prevent or repel dangers, we ought not to be unprepared for it. This consideration will sufficiently recommend to Congress a liberal provision for the immediate extension and gradual completion of the works of defense, both fixed and floating, on our maritime frontier; and an adequate provision for guarding our inland frontier against dangers to which certain portions of it may continue to be exposed, and I can not press too much on the attention of Congress such a classification and organization of the militia as will most effectually render it the safeguard of a free State. If experience has shown in the recent splendid achievements of militia the value of this resource for the public defense, it has shown also the importance of that skill in the use of arms and that familiarity with the essential rules of discipline which can not be expected from the regulations now in force. With this subject is intimately connected the necessity of accommodating the laws in every respect to the great object of enabling the political authority of the Union to employ promptly and effectually the physical power of the Union in the cases designated by the Constitution (p. 551).

In his eighth annual message, December 3, 1816, Madison said:

As a subject of the highest importance to the national welfare, I must again earnestly recommend to the consideration of Congress a reorganization of the militia on a plan which will form it into classes according to the periods of life more or less adapted to military services. An efficient militia is authorized and contemplated by the Constitution, and required by the spirit and safety of free government. The present organization of our militia is universally regarded as less efficient than it ought to be made, and no organization can be better than a classification which will assign the foremost place in the defense of the country to that portion of its citizens whose activity and animation best enable them to rally to its standard. Besides the consideration that a time of peace is the time when the change can be made with most convenience and equity, it will now be aided by the experience of a recent war in which the militia bore so interesting a part (p. 561).

In his sixth annual message, December 3, 1822, Monroe said:

The Military Academy forms the basis in regard to science on which the military establishment rests. It furnishes annually, after due examination and on the report of the academic staff, many well-informed youths to fill the vacancies which occur in the several corps of the Army, while others who retire to private life carry with them such attainments as, under the right reserved to the several States to appoint the officers and to train the militia, will enable them, by affording a wider field for selection, to promote the great object of the power vested in Congress of providing for the organizing, arming, and disciplining the militia. Thus by the mutual and harmonious cooperation of the two governments in the execution of a power divided between them, an object always to be cherished, the attainment of a great result on which our liberties may depend can not fail to be secured. I have to add that in proportion as our regular force is small should the instruction and discipline of the militia, the great resource on which we rely, be pushed to the utmost extent that circumstances will admit (p. 758).

In his seventh annual message, December 2, 1823, Monroe said:

The Military Academy has attained a degree of perfection in its discipline and instruction equal, as is believed, to any institution of its kind in any country. (Described effectiveness of national armories.) The manufacture of arms at the national armories and by contract with the department has been gradually improving in quality and cheapness. It is now believed that their quality is now such as to admit of but little improvement. The completion of the fortifications renders it necessary that there should be a suitable appropriation for the purpose of fabricating the cannon and carriages necessary for those works.

I transmit a return of the militia of the several States according to the last reports which have been made by the proper officers in each to the Department of War. By reference to this return it will be seen that it is not complete, although great exertions have been made to make it so. As the defense and even the liberties of the country must depend in time of imminent danger on the militia, it is of the highest importance that it be well organized, armed, and disciplined throughout the Nation. The report of the Secretary of War shows the progress during the three first quarters of the present year by the application of the fund appropriated for arming the militia. Much difficulty is found in distributing the arms according to the act of Congress providing for it from the failure of the proper departments in many of the States to make regular returns. The act of March 12, 1820, provides that the system of tactics and regulations of the various corps of the Regular Army shall be extended to the militia. This act has been very imperfectly executed from the want of uniformity in the organization of the militia, proceeding from the defects of the system itself, and especially in its application to that main arm of the public defense. It is thought that this important subject in all its branches merits the attention of Congress.

In his second annual message, December 5, 1826, John Quincy Adams said:

Under the resolution of Congress authorizing the Secretary of War to have prepared a complete system of cavalry tactics, and a system of exercise and instruction of field artillery, for the use of the militia of the United States, to be reported to Congress at the present session, a board of distinguished officers of the Army and of the militia has been convened, whose report will be submitted to you with that of the Secretary of War. The occasion was thought favorable for consulting the same board, aided by the results of a correspondence with the governors of the several States and Territories and other citizens of intelligence and experience upon the acknowledged defective condition of our militia system, and of the improvements of which it is susceptible. The report of the board upon this subject is also submitted for your consideration.

In his third annual message, December 4, 1827, John Quincy Adams said:

Among the subjects of deep interest to the whole Union which have heretofore been recommended to the consideration of Congress, as well by my predecessors as, under the impression of the duties devolving upon me, by myself are the formation of a more effective and uniform system for the government of the militia. (Page 458.)

On February 26, 1829, John Quincy Adams transmitted a report from the Secretary of War, with the inspection report of Bvt. Maj. Gen. Gaines for the years 1826 and 1827, relating to the organization of the Army and militia of the United States. (Pages 995 and 996.)

In his first inaugural Jackson said:

Considering standing armies as dangerous to free governments in time of peace, I shall not seek to enlarge our present establishment nor disregard that salutary lesson of political experience which teaches that the military should be held subordinate to the civil power. The gradual increase of our Navy, whose flag has displayed in distant climes our skill in navigation and our fame in arms; the preservation of our forts, arsenals, and dockyards, and the introduction of progressive improvements in the discipline and science of both branches of our military service are so plainly prescribed by prudence that I should be excused for omitting their mention sooner than for enlarging on their importance. But the bulwark of our defense is the national militia, which in the present state of our intelligence and population must render us invincible. As long as our Government is administered for the good of the people and is regulated by their will; as long as it secures to us the rights of person and of property, liberty of conscience and of the press, it will be worth defending; and so long as it is worth defending a patriotic militia will cover it with an impenetrable ægis. Partial injuries and occasional mortifications we may be subject to, but a million of armed freemen, possessed of the means of war, can never be conquered by a foreign foe. To any just system, therefore, calculated to strengthen this natural safeguard of the country I shall cheerfully lend all the aid in my power.

In his fourth annual message, December 4, 1832, Andrew Jackson, after describing the defeat of the incursions of the Sac and Fox Indians, said of the militia:

Our fellow citizens upon the frontiers were ready, as they always are, in the tender of their services in the hour of danger. But a more efficient organization of our militia system is essential to that security which is one of the principal objects of all Governments. Neither our situation nor our institution require or permit the maintenance of a large regular force. History offers too many lessons of the fatal result of such a measure not to warn us against its adoption here. The expense which attends it, the obvious tendency to employ it because it exists, and thus to engage it in unnecessary wars, and its ultimate danger to public liberty will lead us, I trust, to place our principal dependence for protection upon the great body of the citizens of the Republic. If in asserting rights or in repelling wrongs wars should come upon us, our regular force should be increased to an extent proportioned to the emergency, and our present small Army is a nucleus around which such force could be formed and embodied. But for the purpose of defense under ordinary circumstances we must rely upon the electors of the country. Those by whom and for whom the Government was instituted and is supported will constitute its protection in the hour of danger as they do its check in the hour of safety. But it is obvious that the militia system is imperfect. Much time is lost, much unnecessary expense incurred, and much public property wasted under the present arrangement. Little useful knowledge is gained by the musters and drills as now established, and the whole subject evidently requires a thorough examination. Whether a plan of classification remedying these defects and providing for a system of instruction might not be adopted is submitted to the consideration of Congress. The Constitution has vested in the General Government an independent authority upon the subject of the militia which renders its action essential to the establishment or improvement of the system, and I recommend the matter to your consideration in the conviction that the state of this important arm of the public defense requires your attention (pp. 1116–1117).

In his seventh annual message, December 7, 1835, Jackson said:

Occurrences to which we as well as all other nations are liable, both in our internal and external relations, point to the necessity of an efficient organization of the militia. I am again induced by the importance of the subject to bring it to your attention. To suppress domestic violence and to repel foreign invasion, should these calamities overtake us, we must rely in the first instance upon the great body of the community, whose will has instituted and whose power must support the Government.

A large standing military force is not consonant to the spirit of our institutions nor to the feelings of our countrymen, and the lessons of former days and those also of our own times show the danger as well as the enormous expense of these permanent and extensive military organizations. That just medium which avoids an inadequate preparation on the one hand and the danger and expense of a large force on the other is what our constituents have a right to expect from their Government. This object can be attained only by the maintenance of a small military force and by such an organization of the physical strength of the country as may bring this power into operation whenever its services are required.

A classification of the population offers the most obvious means of effecting this organization. Such a division may be made as will be just to all by transferring each at a proper period of life from one class to another and by calling, first, for the services of that class, whether for instruction or action, which from age is qualified for the duty and may be called to perform it with least injury to themselves or to the public. Should the danger ever become so imminent as to require additional force, the other classes in succession would be ready for the call. And if, in addition to this organization, voluntary associations were encouraged and inducements held out for their formation, our militia would be in a state of efficient service. Now, when we are at peace, is the proper time to digest and establish a practical system. The object is certainly worth the experience and worth the expense. No one appreciating the blessings of a republican government can object to his share of the burden which such a plan may impose. Indeed, a moderate portion of the national funds could scarcely be better applied than in carrying into effect and continuing such an arrangement and in giving the necessary elementary instruction. We are happily at peace with the world. A sincere desire to continue so and a fixed determination to give no just cause of offense to other nations, unfortunately, affords no certain grounds of expectation that this relation will be interrupted. With this determination to give no offense is associated a resolution equally decided, tamely to submit to none. The armor and attitude of defense afford the best security against those collisions which the ambitions or interests or some other passion of nations not more justifiable is liable to produce. In many countries it is considered unsafe to put arms into the hands of the people and to instruct them in the elements of military knowledge; that fear can have no place here when it is recollected that the people are the sovereign power. Our Government was instituted and is supported by the ballot box, not by the musket. Whatever changes await us, still greater changes must be made in our social institutions before our political system can yield to physical force. In every aspect, therefore, in which I can view the subject I am impressed with the importance of a prompt and efficient organization of the militia. (Pp. 1389 and 1380.)

In his eighth annual message, December 5, 1836, Jackson said:

It appears from the reports of the officers charged with mustering into service the volunteers called for under the act of Congress of the last session that more presented themselves at the place of rendezvous in Tennessee than were sufficient to meet the requisition which had been made by the Secretary of War upon the governor of that State. This was occasioned by the omission of the governor to apportion the requisition to the different regiments of militia so as to obtain the proper numbers of troops and no more. It seems but just to the patriotic citizens who repaired to the general rendezvous under the circumstances, authorizing them to believe that their services were needed and would be accepted, that the expenses incurred by them while absent from their homes should be paid by the Government. I accordingly recommend that a law to this effect be passed by Congress, giving them compensation which will cover their expenses on the march to and from the place of rendezvous and while there; in connection with which it will also be proper to make provisions for such other equitable claims growing out of the service of the militia as may not be embraced in the existing laws. (P. 1474.)

In his third annual message, December 2, 1839, Van Buren said:

I can not recommend too strongly the plan submitted by the Secretary of War for the organization of the militia of the United States. Page 1754.

On January 8, 1838, Van Buren sent a special message to Congress with evidence showing the invasions of the United States by armed men from Canada, the seizure of the steamboat Caroline, killing of her crew and passengers, and sending her over Niagara Falls. The governors of New York and Vermont were requested to call out sufficient militia to repel the invaders.

In a special message, June 1, 1841, John Tyler said:

For the defense of our extended maritime coast our chief reliance should be placed on our Navy, aided by those inventions which are destined to recommend themselves to public adoption, but no time should be lost in placing our principal cities on the seaboard and the lakes in a state of entire security from foreign assault. Separated as we are from the countries of the Old World, and in much unaffected by their policy, we are happily relieved from the necessity of maintaining large standing armies in times of peace. The policy which was adopted by Mr. Munroe, shortly after the conclusion of the late war with Great Britain of preserving a regularly organized staff sufficient for the command of a large military force, should a necessity for one arise, is founded as well in economy as in true wisdom. Provision is thus made, upon filling up the rank and file, for the introduction of a system of discipline, both promptly and efficiently. All that is required in time of peace is to maintain a sufficient number of men to guard our fortifications, to meet any sudden contingency, and to encounter the first shock of war. Our chief reliance must be placed on the militia; they constitute the great body of National Guards, and inspired by an ardent love of country, will be found ready at all times and at all seasons to repair with alacrity to its defense. It will be regarded by Congress, I doubt not, at a suitable time as one of its highest duties to attend to their complete organization and discipline. (Pp. 1901 and 1902.)

In his fourth annual message, December 5, 1848, Polk said:

One of the most important results of the war into which we were recently forced with a neighboring nation is the demonstration it has afforded of the military strength of our country. Before the War with Mexico, European and other foreign powers entertained imperfect and erroneous views of our physical strength as a nation and of our ability to prosecute war, and especially a war waged out of our own country. They saw our standing army on the peace establishment did not exceed 10,000 men. Accustomed themselves to maintain in peace large standing armies for the protection of thrones against their own subjects, as well as against foreign enemies they had not conceived that it was possible for a nation without such an army, well disciplined and of long service to wage war successfully. They held in low repute our militia and were far from regarding them as an effective force, unless it might be for temporary defensive operations when invaded on our own soil. The events of the late War with Mexico have not only undeceived them, but have removed erroneous impressions which prevailed to some extent even among a portion of our own countrymen. That war had demonstrated that upon the breaking out of hostilities not anticipated, and for which no previous preparation had been made, a volunteer army of citizen soldiers equal to veteran troops, and in numbers equal to any emergency, can in a short period be brought into the field. Unlike what would have occurred in any other country, we were under no necessity of resorting to drafts or conscriptions. On the contrary such was the number of volunteers who patriotically tendered their services that the chief difficulty was in making selections and determining who must be disappointed and compelled to remain at home. Our citizen soldiers are unlike those drawn from the population of any other country. They are composed indiscriminately of all professions and pursuits—of farmers, lawyers, physicians, merchants, manufacturers, mechanics, and laborers, and this not only among the officers but private soldiers in the ranks.

Our citizen soldiers are unlike those of any other country in other respects. They are armed, and have been accustomed from their youth up to handle firearms, and a large proportion of them, especially in the western and more newly settled States, are expert marksmen. They are men who have a reputation to maintain at home by their good conduct in the field. They are intelligent, and there is an individuality of character which is found in the ranks of no other army. In battle each private man, as well as every officer, fights not only for his country, but for the glory and distinction among his fellow citizens when he shall return to civil life. The War with Mexico has demonstrated not only the ability of the Government to organize a numerous Army upon a sudden call, but also to provide it with all the munitions and necessary supplies with dispatch, convenience, and ease, and to direct its operations with efficiency. The strength of our institution has not only been displayed in the valor and skill of our troops engaged in active service in the field, but in the organization of those executive branches which were charged with the general direction and conduct of the war. Our noble Army in Mexico, Regulars and Volunteers, were victorious upon every battle field, however fearful the odds against them, etc. (Pp. 2481–2.)

On December 6, 1880, in his fourth annual message, R. B. Hayes said:

Attention is asked to the necessity of providing by legislation for organizing, arming, and disciplining the active militia of the country and liberal appropriations are recommended in this behalf. (P. 4570.)

On December 1, 1890, Benjamin Harrison said:

The encouragement that has been extended to the militia of the States, generally and most appropriately designated the National Guard, should be continued and enlarged. The military organizations constitute in a large sense the Army of the United States, while about five-sixths of the annual cost of their maintenance is defrayed by the States.

In his first annual message, December 4, 1893, Grover Cleveland said:

The total enrollment of the militia of the several States was, on the 31st of October of the current year, 112,597 officers and enlisted men. The officers of the Army detailed for the inspection and instruction of this reserve of our military force report that increased interest and marked progress are apparent in the discipline and efficiency of the organization. (P. 5877.)

In his second annual message, December 3, 1894, Grover Cleveland said:

The total enrollment of the militia of the several States is 117,333 officers and enlisted men, an increase of 5,343 over the number reported at the close of the previous year. The report of the militia inspectors by Regular Army officers show a marked increase in the interest and efficiency among the State organizations, and I strongly recommend a continuance of the policy of affording every practical encouragement possible to this important auxiliary of our military establishment. (P. 5968.)

In his fourth annual message, December 7, 1896, Cleveland said:

The Organized Militia numbers 112,897 men. The appropriations for its support by the several States approximate $2,800,000 annually, and $400,000 is contributed by the General Government. Investigation shows these troops to be unusually well drilled and inspired with much military interest, but in many instances they are so deficient in proper arms and equipment that a sudden call to active duty would find them inadequately prepared for field service. I therefore recommend that prompt measures be taken to remedy this condition and that encouragement be given to this deserving body of unpaid and volunteer citizen soldiers upon whose assistance we must largely rely in time of trouble.

During the past year rapid progress has been made toward the completion of the scheme adopted for the erection and armament of fortifications along our seacoast, while equal progress has been made in providing the material for submarine defense in connection with these works, etc. (Pp. 6159 and 6160.)

For the first time in the history of the country it is proposed in this bill to provide for the payment to the officers and men of the Organized Militia, or National Guard, a compensation sufficient to reimburse the officers for the money expended for uniforms and incidental expenses, and to the men sufficient to reimburse them for their car fare and other expenses incident to attendance upon the drill, discipline, and training prescribed. If it be contended that military service is a duty, devolving alike upon all citizens of a free country, it may well be replied that the history of the United States has shown that such a small proportion of our citizens volunteer for the performance of this public duty that it is no more than simple justice that the whole people should reimburse them for the expenses incurred in preparing themselves to adequately defend the country.

This bill was recommended to the House by the unanimous vote of the committee. It represents a consensus of the opinion of the entire membership of the committee, regardless of political affiliation, and we believe it fairly reflects the sober sentiment of the American people. We invoke the candid judgment and intelligent criticism of the House upon this the most important question that demands our consideration.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, it is a source of very great gratification to the Committee on Military Affairs that it was able to report to this House a bill which has the unanimous support of the members of that committee. [Applause.] It illustrates the feeling of the country to-day—that on a question of this character all American citizens should stand together. [Applause.] And that in endeavoring to present to this House a military policy for the country, that all men should be actuated by a desire to do what is best for all of us, and that no party lines should enter into the discussion of a question which is so close to the interests of our people. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, the bill which this committee has presented to the House for its approval is one which is made up of several component parts. It is a general preparedness bill. It deals with the Regular Army; it deals with the militia; it deals with the mobilization and utilization of the industrial forces of the country in time of war. It deals with a plan of providing the necessary officers which this country may need in time of war, and it undertakes, in a comprehensive way, to meet all of the different views which have been promulgated by those who are in favor of national defense. It also undertakes to deal with it from a reasonable standpoint, and we believe that we are presenting a bill which does not go to either extreme.

It perhaps will meet with opposition from those who are opposed to any addition to the present defense of the country, and it will perhaps meet with the opposition of those who think that we have not gone far enough in providing for a larger standing army. If that is the case, it would indicate that those who presented the bill have done so in a sane and safe way, not going to the extreme on either side. The House must remember that we have in this country a volunteer system, and in preparing this bill we had to deal with the conditions of this country and not with the conditions in other countries where the compulsory military system prevails.

It has been stated by a great many people that we ought to have a standing army of 250,000 men in time of peace. Gentlemen who advocate that plan do not stop to consider how we are going to get that many men to enlist in the Army in time of peace. The Adjutant General of the Army, in his statement before our committee, stated that it would be impossible under the volunteer system to keep an army at more than 140,000, and 140,000 is the number which the committee has presented in this bill for the line of the Army. Therefore we have gone as far as we can go toward having a standing army which will be efficient in time of peace and around which we can build up a larger army, if necessary, in time of war.

To have an army of 250,000 men would mean compulsory military service, which I do not believe the people of this country desire. I do not believe they would uphold any Member in this House in voting for a compulsory military system as obtains in countries in continental Europe. [Applause.] Therefore the other alternative is, and it was very frankly stated by officers of the War College, that in order to obtain an army of 250,000 men it would be necessary to double the pay of the present Army and pay the private soldiers $30 a month. They admitted that they would have to go into the market and compete with the employers of labor, and in order to get men in the Army they must pay more than they are paying now. In other words, an army of 250,000 men in this country under the volunteer system will cost the country not less than $500,000,000 a year if the pay is doubled; not for one year but for every year, and I do not believe that the people of this country or the Members of this House are ready to settle in time of peace upon the people of this country an expenditure annually of $500,000,000 to maintain a force of men, a very large number of whom could not be used in time of peace, and who would be idle and drawing money from the Treasury without returning any service for it.

Of course, if we had a war with any country, this Congress and the people would be ready to vote any amount of money in order that the American people should preserve their liberties. [Applause.] But, gentlemen, we are speaking now of a peace proposition and not of a war proposition. This is a military policy which we are laying down for a time of peace and not for war. It is a preparedness proposition, which is to be the military policy of the country, and which, if war comes, will meet the situation.

The first part of this bill deals with the Regular Army. It adds 10 regiments of Infantry to the present number of regiments of Infantry that we now have. We now have 30, and 10 more will make 40 regiments of Infantry. It adds 6 regiments of Artillery. We now have 6, and this addition will make 12 regiments of Field Artillery. We add 52 companies of Coast Artillery, an addition of about 6,000 enlisted men to that arm of the service. We add 15 companies of Engineers and 4 aero squadrons. That is in effect what we do to the Regular Army, and we provide that the strength of the line of the Army shall be 140,000 men. That means fighting men. It does not include the Quartermaster's Corps nor the Hospital Corps nor the Philippine Scouts. So that we are really providing for 168,000 enlisted men. But the Philippine Scouts, of course, are not a part of the defense of this country. The Quartermaster's Corps are not men who go into war; nor are the Hospital Corps men. They are what is known as noncombatants.

That is, in brief, what we do for the Regular Army. We increase the number of officers by 786 for the purpose of having them detailed to military colleges and schools of the country and for duty with the National Guard. We increase the officers in the Quartermaster's Corps and in the Ordnance Corps, two corps which have much to do with making efficient the fighting force of the country. We increase the Medical Corps of the Army by 251 officers, and the committee on yesterday evening voted to increase it still further by providing 7 medical men for every 1,000 enlisted men.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAY. Certainly.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I notice there is no increase in the officers of the Signal Corps. Was there any special reason for that?

Mr. HAY. There is no increase in the officers of the Signal Corps proper, but there is an increase of 76 officers in the aviation section of the Signal Corps.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. In the Signal Corps proper, was there some special reason for not increasing the officers?

Mr. HAY. The committee did not think it had sufficient reasons given to it for increasing the officers of the Signal Corps.

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAY. Certainly.

Mr. ANDERSON. As I understand the bill, it repeals the section which authorizes the present Medical Reserve Corps, and I would like to ask the gentleman what takes the place of that corps?

Mr. HAY. It repeals that particular section of the law providing for the Medical Reserve Corps, but it provides for an officers' reserve corps, into which medical men will volunteer, just as they do now in the Medical Reserve Corps, and it gives them a better opportunity because, under the present law they could only have the rank of first lieutenant, while under the provisions of this bill they can get as high as the rank of major, so that the Surgeon General of the Army preferred the provisions in this bill to the provisions in the law that now provides for a Medical Reserve Corps.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAY. Yes.

Mr. KAHN. The gentleman spoke of a total enlisted strength of 140,000 men in time of peace.

Mr. HAY. In the line of the Army.

Mr. KAHN. In the line of the Army. Under this bill, in case of the imminence of war, that force can be materially strengthened by action of the President, without any action of Congress.

Mr. HAY. When war is imminent, or in time of war, it can be increased to 207,000 men.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman state how, in that connection?

Mr. HAY. By filling up the organizations. I may say that the organizations of the Army are skeletonized; that is, instead of having full strength they are reduced to about one-half. Take an Infantry regiment, for example. A skeleton Infantry regiment is about 900 men under this bill and a full Infantry regiment would be 1,930 men, so that by increasing the organizations in the Infantry and Field Artillery and in the Cavalry and so on throughout the service there would be 207,000 men that could be added to the 140,000 in the event of war.

Mr. DILL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAY. Yes.

Mr. DILL. The gentleman stated there was an increase of 52 companies in the Coast Artillery?

Mr. HAY. Yes.

Mr. DILL. Will that be sufficient?

Mr. HAY. That is what was asked for by the War Department.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAY. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. The gentleman stated this bill would increase the number of officers by 786, in order to provide instruction to the National Guard and the schools throughout the country, and that they are to be detailed from those in the active list?

Mr. HAY. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. Why did not the committee compel the detail of those upon the retired list, many of whom are young and able and competent for that character of service?

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman, the committee had that question before it. Under the law as it is now officers on the retired list can not be ordered to duty except with their own consent, and the committee did not feel that it could frame a provision which would eliminate the possibility of having men on the retired list detailed for duty who possibly might not be fit for it; and we thought, moreover, that the active officer is much more efficient and much better fitted to perform these duties than the retired officer, and therefore we did not put in the bill any provision compelling retired officers to perform this duty.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAY. Yes.

Mr. FESS. Does this contemplate an increase simply on the continent or will part of them be detailed to the insular possessions?

Mr. HAY. A part of this force will, of course, be in the insular possessions. There are now 29,300 men in the Philippines, in Panama, and in Hawaii, and if this bill passes it is proposed to put a still larger number of men in those insular possessions. If this bill passes and becomes a law at the strength of 140,000, there will be at all times in the United States about 60,000 men. The balance of them will be in the insular possessions. Of course, the gentleman will understand that at no time since the act of 1901 was passed, providing for an enlisted strength of 100,000 men, have we had 100,000 enlisted men in the Army. The President fixes by Executive order every year the number of enlisted men that he thinks the country requires, and up to the present time he never has gone to the extent which the law allows him to go, because he did not think more men than he fixed were necessary to perform the duties of the Army in time of peace. On February 25 there were 86,628 men in the fighting strength of the Army, plus 5,900 and odd Philippine Scouts, which are not counted really as a part of the strength of the Army, and if this is fixed at 140,000 it is not likely that at any time there will be that many men in the service, because there will be no use for them in time of peace.

Mr. SMITH of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I hear the statement frequently made that the reason that the strength of the Army has never been increased to 100,000 is because enough volunteers could not be secured. I would like to ask the gentleman if that is true? Whether because of that a greater number has not been fixed by the President?

Mr. HAY. Well, that may have had something to do with it; but the ability to get volunteers for the Army depends very much upon conditions in the country. When conditions are prosperous in the country it is very difficult to get men for the Army. When conditions are not prosperous they do not have the same trouble.

Now, I understand that last month recruiting slumped very much, and recruiting officers have found it difficult for the last month to obtain recruits for the Army, and The Adjutant General, as I stated a moment ago, stated that the best he could possibly obtain under the working of the volunteer system was 140,000 men, as large an army as could be kept full. Some gentlemen believe we ought to have a short enlistment——

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAY. I will.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. I want to ask the gentleman what is the average cost of recruiting a man in the Regular Army?

Mr. HAY. I think the average cost of recruiting a man is about $180. That is the cost of recruiting, not pay.

Mr. SLOAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAY. I yield to the gentleman from Nebraska.

Mr. SLOAN. What, if any, inducement does the bill carry for the stimulation of enlistment—increased compensation or anything of that kind?

Mr. HAY. It does not carry any increased compensation. The pay of the Army now is larger than that of any other country in the world, twice as much; and, of course, the pay of the Army is the main item in the Army appropriation bill. The appropriation bill last year carried $101,000,000 and $49,800,000 of that was for pay alone, so you can see that the pay is really a very important part of the appropriation bill and that if we raise the pay of the Army we are running into a very great expense.

Mr. SLOAN. What does he get now per month?

Mr. HAY. A private is paid $15 per month; a corporal and sergeant and first sergeant and quartermaster sergeant get more, of course.

Mr. HELM. Within comparatively recent years the compensation of the private soldier was increased from $13 and something to $15 with a view of stimulating enlistment.

Mr. HAY. Yes, sir.

Mr. HELM. What effect has that had?

Mr. HAY. Well, I presume it has had some effect, of course. That is in the act of 1908, which increased the pay of the Army.

Mr. BENNET. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAY. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. BENNET. In time of peace what is the pay of a private soldier in an army like the Italian, the Russian, the French, the German, or British Army?

Mr. HAY. I have not those figures exactly, but they can be obtained; but I understand that in the German Army they pay enlisted men 2 cents a day, and that is about the price that is paid throughout continental Europe, where they have in all those countries compulsory military service.

Mr. BENNET. That is the information I had six or seven years ago and I wanted to know if there had been any change.

Mr. HAY. There has been no change.

Mr. BENNET. So people who criticize the apparently great cost of our Army in time of peace apparently fail to take into account the fact that we pay $15 a month, whereas the German Government, for instance, pays 60 cents a month?

Mr. HAY. Yes.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman state how these 86,500 soldiers are distributed, approximately?

Mr. HAY. I will try to do it, sir.

Mr. HILL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAY. I will answer the gentleman from Michigan first. There are now stationed at the Panama Canal Zone 7,300 men; in the Philippine Islands there are now 13,000; in Hawaii there are 9,000, about 800 in Porto Rico, about 800 in China, and 800 in Alaska, and the balance are in the United States. I now yield to the gentleman from Connecticut.

Mr. HILL. Some weeks ago I had occasion to look up the figures on precisely the basis given by Mr. BENNET, of New York, and if the gentleman from Virginia desires I will give him those figures relating to the pay in the various nations.

Mr. HAY. I will be glad for the gentleman to do so.

Mr. HILL. This is computed on the basis of 300 days in the year, not 365 days. The United States pays 60 cents a day, Germany 12⅝ cents, Great Britain 30 cents, France 6⅝ cents—remember, this is prior to existing war, in the year 1913—Italy pays 23½ cents, Russia 1½ cents, Austria 2⅝ and Japan 2⅝ cents. This was the condition prior to the existing war.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. I know the chairman quoted from memory the cost of the enlisted man. I have here the testimony of Gen. McCain before the committee and he testified that the entire cost per man was $87 last year. This includes all overhead charges, and he goes on further to say that the charge for the actual enlistment of the man would cost about $19.

Mr. DILLON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAY. I will yield.

Mr. DILLON. What are these soldiers in China doing? For what purpose are they there?

Mr. HAY. The soldiers in China are a part of the force kept there by England, Germany, France, and, perhaps, Italy for the purpose of protecting the embassies of those nations.

Mr. DILLON. How many of them are there?

Mr. HAY. About 800.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAY. I will.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. May I ask the gentleman to state a little more fully what this cost of recruiting includes? Does it include equipment or anything of that kind?

Mr. HAY. Oh, no; it does not include that. It only includes cost——

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Of maintaining the recruiting stations and getting the men to sign up?

Mr. HAY. Yes.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. May I ask the gentleman: When the two companies in the Coast Artillery Service provided for in this bill are furnished, what percentage of the guns of our fortifications will then be manned?

Mr. HAY. I can only state to the gentleman this—that the Committee on Military Affairs does not deal with guns in the coast defense. That is a question which is in the jurisdiction of the Committee on Appropriations and all we have is the private personnel. Now, in 1907, when the Coast Artillery Corps was formed, there were provided for that corps 19,000 men, which it was then stated would be sufficient to man our coast defenses.

Since that time they have sent out from this country, and away from our coast defenses, to Panama and Hawaii and the Philippines, about 52 companies of Coast Artillery, and they are asking us now to add these 52 companies of Coast Artillery to take the place of those which were sent out of the country to man the fortifications in the insular possessions.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Does the gentleman recall whether or not, if the 52 companies were provided, we would still be 800 men short of the force originally intended to man the defenses of this country, as was testified before the committee?

Mr. HAY. I do not recall that distinctly, but if we are only 800 men short we are pretty well up to what we ought to have.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Will the gentleman tell me this? He stated that 52 companies were the number of men asked for by the War Department. Have you any information as to the recommendation of the War College?

Mr. HAY. I have information as to the recommendation of the War College.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. What was the recommendation?

Mr. HAY. They recommended a standing army of 281,000 men, and for the Coast Artillery they recommended something like 60,000 men. I am not sure of the exact number, but it was something like that.

Mr. SANFORD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAY. I will.

Mr. SANFORD. I want to understand the chairman's position. The gentleman who preceded you stated that we have had a law in this country ever since it was organized, which placed universal obligation of service on all men between 18 and 45 years of age in case of war. Is that correct?

Mr. HAY. I think that is correct.

Mr. SANFORD. Of course, there is a universal obligation of citizens to serve in time of war. So that the difference between this country and all other countries in the world to-day is with reference to the obligations to train and not serve, is it not?

Mr. HAY. That may be. But I can not yield to the gentleman for a speech.

Mr. SANFORD. I just wanted to ask you what the difference was. You have compared here the difference in the pay. Now, foreign countries do not pay their soldiers, do they?

Mr. HAY. They do not.

Mr. SANFORD. They compel them to learn to be soldiers?

Mr. HAY. But you can not train the entire population of this country of military age except by passing some law which will put them into training. You have to have some legislation for that purpose.

Mr. SANFORD. I am not antagonistic. But when you spoke everyone applauded when you said that we would never stand for universal compulsory service. We have always stood for it, and we have it.

Mr. HAY. We have it if we choose to put it into effect.

Mr. SANFORD. We always have had it in every war.

Mr. HAY. We did not have it in the Mexican War and we did not have it in the War of 1812 and we did not have it in the Spanish War, but we did have it in the Civil War.

Mr. FIELDS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAY. Yes.

Mr. FIELDS. The country has never exercised universal compulsory service?

Mr. HAY. Of course not. Congress has the power to compel every man of military age in the country to render military service, but Congress has never seen fit to exercise that power; and I do not believe that Congress will see fit to exercise it now.

Mr. SANFORD. Did we not exercise it in the Civil War?

Mr. HAY. Yes; but I am talking about in time of peace and not in time of war. I will state to the gentleman that I have an amendment, which is not a committee amendment, to propose, that the President be given power in time of war to draft every man between the age of 18 and 45 in this country, and I hope that the House will vote for that amendment.

Mr. SANFORD. That is compulsory service; that is all.

Mr. HOWARD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAY. I will.

Mr. HOWARD. I wanted to ask the chairman of the committee if he could give the House, after his long service on the Military Affairs Committee, in view of the fact that we have just increased the organization of the Regular Army, what, in his opinion, is the cause for the reluctance, in view of the pay that the privates get in this country as compared with other countries, on the part of the young men in the United States to enlist in the Regular Establishment?

Mr. HAY. I can only say to the gentleman that in prosperous times men can get great deal better jobs on the outside than they can by going into the Army, and for the last 10 or 15 years the War Department has been very rigid in its requirements from a recruit. It is the popular idea that the Army is a refuge for criminals and all kinds of bad characters. That is not true. The fact of the business is that a man who offers himself as a recruit for the Army has to show good moral character, physical fitness, and altogether prove himself to be worthy of being a soldier of the United States. And the Army to-day is composed of as fine material as to young men as you will find anywhere. [Applause.]

Mr. HOWARD. I would like to ask the gentleman one other question: Do you not think that a great deal of this reluctance on the part of young men to enlist in the Army is the indefiniteness of where they are to be located? That is to say, the monotony of being sent miles and miles away from home to do garrison duty at some post where they have no ties of any sort? And is not that responsible, in your judgment, for a good many of the desertions that occur in the Regular Army?

Mr. HAY. That may be. But a man, in joining an army, has to submit himself to orders. He can not join the Army and say, I want to go to this place or that place or the other place. It would be impossible to build up an army upon that idea, because you never know when you will need a man or where you will need him. When he joins the Army he joins it with the idea that he must be subject to the orders of his superiors and go wherever they choose to send him; and that may deter some young men from joining the Army.

Mr. HENSLEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAY. Yes.

Mr. HENSLEY. I notice that you are adding 786 officers for the purpose of providing training for militia and students in colleges. Has the gentleman any information as to how many institutions of learning are now supplied with military men for instruction purposes?

Mr. HAY. Yes. About 100 schools and colleges are now supplied.

Mr. HENSLEY. This is in addition to that?

Mr. HAY. Yes; but we have a large number of organizations in the National Guard. We have, for instance, in the National Guard 64 regiments of Infantry alone—I think it is—and we want to provide, out of these 786 officers, officers for the instruction of the National Guard as well as for the schools and colleges.

Mr. HENSLEY. Then, I understand that there are 100 institutions that are now provided with officers detailed for instruction?

Mr. HAY. Yes; either active or retired officers.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. HAY. Certainly.

Mr. KAHN. I wish to call my colleague's attention to the fact that there are institutions having 2,500 members in the cadet corps that have only one officer, and this bill will allow one officer to every 400 men?

Mr. HAY. Yes.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. HAY. Yes.

Mr. BUTLER. Where do you contemplate finding these officers? What are the means you intend to employ to get all these extra officers? It has been a matter of great concern to us in the Committee on Naval Affairs to provide officers sufficient for the service.

Mr. HAY. Of course all the vacancies will be in the rank of second lieutenant, which is the lowest rank. They will be filled up from the bottom.

Mr. BUTLER. Will they be appointed from civil life?

Mr. HAY. From West Point and from officers of the National Guard, graduates from the military schools and colleges, from enlisted men of the Army, and from civil life. We think we can get the extra officers without much trouble.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAY. Yes.

Mr. FESS. The chairman spoke about military schools. Would that include a State university that has a military department?

Mr. HAY. Yes.

Mr. FESS. Let me ask the gentleman this question: Is the idea of a soldier doing constructive work entirely irreconcilable with a standing army?

Mr. HAY. The gentleman means in time of peace, building roads?

Mr. FESS. Yes.

Mr. HAY. I do not think it would be possible to get men in the Army to build roads.

Mr. FESS. Even if you paid higher wages?

Mr. HAY. I do not think even then you could do so.

Mr. FESS. Those two ideas are irreconcilable?

Mr. HAY. Yes, sir.

Mr. GUERNSEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. HAY. Yes.

Mr. GUERNSEY. If I understand the provisions of this bill correctly, when war is imminent the President can increase the Army by 207,000 men. Is that in addition to the present strength?

Mr. HAY. No.

Mr. GUERNSEY. What provision is there in this bill that would encourage enlistment up to 207,000 men?

Mr. HAY. The gentleman means in time of war?

Mr. GUERNSEY. Yes.

Mr. HAY. In time of war it is always easier to get men to enlist in the Army than in time of peace. There is a very large number of young men in the country who in time of war volunteer, and are anxious to volunteer, but who do not want to go in the Army in time of peace. I do not think there would be any trouble in getting the men.

Mr. BRITTEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAY. Certainly.

Mr. BRITTEN. Would there be any difference in the status of officers in the line between those taken from citizens and those who were graduated from West Point?

Mr. HAY. None at all. When a man is second lieutenant it does not make any difference where he comes from, whether from West Point or from civil life, after he gets in.

Mr. BRITTEN. He could go right up the line?

Mr. HAY. Yes, sir.

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAY. With pleasure.

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. Do you contemplate giving any preference, in providing for these additional officers, to officers who served in the Volunteer Army during the Philippine insurrection?

Mr. HAY. It is not so contemplated. The age limit for a second lieutenant is from 21 to 27 years, and those men who served in the Philippine insurrection are beyond that age, and we did not think it would be wise to raise the age limit in order to get a few people in who could not have time to render the service as long as it ought to be, and who besides would be second lieutenants at the age of 40 or 45 or 50, and be commanded by young men of 25 or 30 or 35 years of age.

Mr. OLIVER. Mr. Chairman, may I ask a question?

Mr. HAY. Yes.

Mr. OLIVER. The gentleman spoke of recruiting officers from graduates of West Point and from the State militia and from graduates from military schools. Is not the preference given to those sources in the bill?

Mr. HAY. Yes, sir.

Mr. OLIVER. Will the gentleman state briefly just what that is?

Mr. HAY. If the gentleman will look in the bill he will find it there. I have so little time that I can not go into it in detail now, but if the gentleman will look at page 29 of the bill, beginning with line 3, he will find it there.

Mr. DILL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield to a question?

Mr. HAY. Yes.

Mr. DILL. This bill provides for 786 officers to be used in colleges and other places for training cadets. Is there provision whereby the War Department will keep in touch as to the names and addresses of young men who are trained in those institutions?

Mr. HAY. Yes. There is a provision for that.

Mr. DILL. That is being done at the present time?

Mr. HAY. Yes; it is. The War Department has now a list, and keeps a list of all graduates of military schools and colleges.

Mr. DILL. And ordinary State institutions and State colleges?

Mr. HAY. Yes; every military school.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAY. Yes.

Mr. LINTHICUM. I notice, on page 81, a captain is allowed $500 a year, and when it comes to the medical officer he is limited to not to exceed one-half of that.

Mr. HAY. I will explain that later. Some medical officers get $500 if in command of field hospitals.

Mr. LINTHICUM. But other medical officers have a great deal of office work——

Mr. HAY. They are officers of the National Guard. They do not do very much in that way.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HAY] be permitted to complete his statement without interruption.

Mr. HAY. I am very glad to be interrupted, because I believe in that way I can serve the House better than by making a set speech.

Mr. BUTLER. That is what you are doing now. [Applause.]

Mr. BARKLEY. I thought I would be helping the gentleman by making the request.

Mr. HAY. I am very much obliged to the gentleman from Kentucky, but I am glad to be interrupted. I am anxious to give all the information I have.

Mr. KINKAID. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAY. I yield to the gentleman from Nebraska.

Mr. KINKAID. Does this bill increase or decrease the proportion of officers to the number of privates?

Mr. HAY. It increases them very largely.

Mr. KINKAID. Is it contemplated that that is for the purpose of using more officers than the present law provides for, or is it in order to have a reserve, on account of the possible greater mortality of officers than of privates under the new mode of trench warfare?

Mr. HAY. I will say to the gentleman that that was done for both purposes. It was done for the purpose of having officers enough to train the young men in these military schools and colleges and to be detailed for duty with the National Guard and to have as many officers as we could possibly carry for the purpose of using them in time of war. And I will say to the gentleman on this subject of officers, about which we have heard so much, that this bill provides for 7,450 officers. There are in the National Guard to-day about 9,000 officers. There are in the country to-day not less than 10,000 graduates of military schools who are fit to become officers. So that if we should ever have any trouble we should certainly have quite a good nucleus to whom we could look for our officers, and I do not think there is as much danger of our not getting officers as some people seem to think. What we are providing for in this bill in connection with the National Guard and the schools will give us officers every year upon whom we can call if the necessity arises, which I hope never will.

Mr. KINKAID. I heartily agree with the idea of having a good reserve, but I want to ask a further question. Are not a good many military men of the opinion that fewer officers are required in proportion to the number of privates than the law now provides?

Mr. HAY. I do not exactly understand the gentleman's question.

Mr. KINKAID. Is it not the opinion of a good many experienced military men that fewer officers are really needed than the law now provides, in proportion to the number of privates to be controlled by them?

Mr. HAY. I will say to the gentleman from Nebraska that I have never yet seen a military man who thought there were fewer officers needed than had been provided in this or any other bill. The trouble the committee has had has been that the officers have all the time wanted more officers. They always want more. I do not say that by way of criticizing these gentlemen, because the more officers there are the more promotions there will be and the more money they get, and they are human like the rest of us.

Mr. KINCHELOE. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. HAY. Yes.

Mr. KINCHELOE. How many members are there now in the regular enlisted State guards of this country?

Mr. HAY. There are now of enlisted men about 120,000.

Mr. KINCHELOE. In the State guards?

Mr. HAY. Yes.

Mr. BRITTEN. Does this bill provide an age limit at which lieutenants of the second grade are taken into the service?

Mr. HAY. This bill does not provide it, but the law provides that they shall be from 21 to 27 years of age.

Mr. BRITTEN. Not under 21?

Mr. HAY. Not under 21.

Mr. CANDLER of Mississippi. The gentleman a moment ago started to discuss the question of the term of enlistment, but was carried away from that subject by other questions.

Mr. HAY. I propose to discuss that as soon as I can get the opportunity.

Mr. CANDLER of Mississippi. What is the present term of enlistment?

Mr. HAY. The present term of enlistment is four years with the colors and three years in the reserves. This bill provides three years with the colors and four years in the reserves.

Mr. BRITTEN. The committee, then, were of opinion that the shorter term of enlistment would probably secure more soldiers?

Mr. HAY. That is the opinion of the committee, generally speaking. That is not my opinion, however.

Mr. PLATT. Will the gentleman explain section 79, which refers to West Point?

Mr. HAY. Section 79 provides that the number of cadets at West Point shall be doubled, and that each Member of the House and each Member of the Senate shall have one more appointment than at present. That is to be provided for in such a way as the President may determine. If they were all appointed at once, there is no room at West Point to receive them all, and we have to put up some buildings there before we can do it.

Mr. BRUMBAUGH. Can the gentleman tell us about what per cent of the graduates of West Point and other military schools stay with the Army after graduation during their lives and what per cent go into business?

Mr. HAY. So far as West Point is concerned, possibly 95 per cent remain in the Army. The graduates of other military schools and colleges do not go into the Army at all unless they are appointed from civil life, and therefore I have no means of knowing about that?

Mr. BRUMBAUGH. Another question. What claim has the Government upon the graduates of West Point and other military schools?

Mr. HAY. The Government has no claim on the graduates of any other school than West Point.

Mr. BRUMBAUGH. What power has the Government to call back into the service West Point graduates, in whose education the Government has spent considerable money? If they resign and go into business, can the Government call them back?

Mr. HAY. If they resign and leave the Army, the Government has no more control over them than it has over anybody else.

Mr. FOCHT. Mr. Chairman, in Pennsylvania State College, where the attendance is 2,800, they now have one full regiment, officered by an assigned officer of the United States Army. They desire to recruit two full regiments. How many officers will be assigned in that case?

Mr. HAY. How many will there be in the two full regiments?

Mr. FOCHT. I should judge a thousand in each regiment.

Mr. HAY. Then you would have four United States Army officers under this bill.

Mr. SLEMP. The gentleman says that the Regular Army has 83,000 men.

Mr. HAY. They had on February 26, 86,000.

Mr. SLEMP. That does not include the 20,000 that has been provided for.

Mr. HAY. No; not as yet.

Mr. SLEMP. So that, with the 20,000 and the number provided for here in this bill, makes 160,000.

Mr. HAY. No; the resolution that we passed only permits the organization to be recruited up to their full strength.

Mr. REAVIS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAY. Certainly.

Mr. REAVIS. The gentleman spoke of a provision of the bill making the terms of enlistment three years in the colors and four years in the reserve; are members of the Regular Army in the reserve under salary?

Mr. HAY. No; they are not paid.

Mr. REAVIS. They go back into civil life?

Mr. HAY. Yes.

Mr. REAVIS. Has the Government authority under law to call the men back to the colors while they remain in the reserve?

Mr. HAY. If they need them in time of war.

Mr. REAVIS. They occupy a different relation to the Government, then, than ordinary citizens during the four years?

Mr. HAY. Yes.

Mr. RAGSDALE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAY. Certainly.

Mr. RAGSDALE. On page 68, section 61 provides that officers, now employees of the Government in the District of Columbia who are members of the National Guard, shall be entitled to leave of absence from their respective duties without loss of pay, time, or efficiency in rating on all days engaged in field training under the provisions of this act. As I understand it, they not only get a salary in Washington, they not only get the time they are entitled to by sick leave and leave of absence, but they get this time and pay for any training while in camp.

Mr. HAY. That is true.

Mr. RAGSDALE. Without regard to the period of time they remain in camp. In other words, if under a certain condition of affairs the President of the United States saw fit to order them into camp for six months, during all that time they would draw their salary in the District and their pay in camp.

Mr. HAY. I hardly think that is a fair statement, because the bill provides for 15 days of training.

Mr. RAGSDALE. It requires that, but it permits as much time as the President might see fit to order.

Mr. HAY. He could do it, but I do not think the President would. However, this is a very small detail, and I have quite a number of other matters to consider.

Mr. RAGSDALE. But this might amount to a great deal.

Mr. HAY. Very few people in the Government departments are in the National Guard.

Mr. RAGSDALE. They could all enter the National Guard, could they not?

Mr. HAY. They could, but they are not apt to. But it was thought that if these men in the Government employ were patriotic enough to go into this organization, that they ought not to be penalized if they were called out for training. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, I started to speak of the term of enlistment. I said some gentlemen believe in a short enlistment, in a two-year enlistment. I do not believe that you can maintain the efficiency of the Army with a two-year enlistment, because the average service of men in the Army would only be about one year, and if the Army was called upon in an emergency you would have an Army composed of half-baked recruits, men who had only been in the Army one year, and we all know that during the present war in Europe it has taken England one year to train a soldier sufficiently to justify her in sending him to the field. That is one reason why I do not believe that the enlistment period should be reduced below that of three years.

Another reason is that if you have a man trained for a soldier in two years he is just beginning to render service for the money which you have paid him. Another reason is that if you have two years' enlistment it will be that much more difficult to keep the Army full, because instead of getting them one-third, you would have one-half every year. If you had an army of 140,000 men you would have to have 70,000 recruited every year. Another reason which perhaps does not weigh with us much now is that it costs a great deal more to have a short enlistment than to have a long one.

Mr. BRITTEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAY. Yes.

Mr. BRITTEN. How does the gentleman conclude that with a two years' enlistment you would only get one year's service?

Mr. HAY. Because in the course of two years one-half would go out, and that would leave in the Army men who had only been in one year, and you would be taking in men who had no service at all.

Mr. BRITTEN. But the man who enlists would stay in two years?

Mr. HAY. Yes; he gets two years' service; but in the Army generally you would have men who had had but one year's service. Now, more than that, if you have a short-term enlistment you are going to find it extremely difficult to get men to enlist. Those who advocate the short-term enlistment insist there shall be no reenlistments. If there is no reenlistment you can not get men in the Army, because there will be no future for them. The backbone of the Army to-day is the noncommissioned officer, who is an enlistment man, and if a man only goes in for two years and is not allowed to reenlist, there will be no inducement whatever for a man to go into the Army.

I think I have said enough and answered questions enough with regard to the Regular Army, and I want to say a word about the National Guard.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAY. Yes.

Mr. FESS. Before the gentleman goes on, is the Aviation Service in this bill the only Aviation Service we have, or does the Navy Department have an Aviation Service?

Mr. HAY. The Navy Department has an Aviation Service.

Mr. FESS. How much do we have in the Army?

Mr. HAY. We provide in this bill for 133 officers and 720 enlisted men.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, before the gentleman leaves the Regular Army, I hope he will explain to the House that the increase is in four increments.

Mr. HAY. Yes; in four annual increments. By that we get one-fourth each year for four years, and that applies to the officers, except these 786 officers whom we want to get at once, because we want to use them in training at once. It has been stated by some people that it is impossible for Congress to federalize the National Guard or to federalize what is known as the Organized Militia. It is true that not for many years, since the beginning of the Government almost, has any attempt been made to really federalize the National Guard. Congress has never undertaken to exercise the powers which are conferred upon it in the Constitution, and therefore gentlemen have assumed that Congress could not do what it has not chosen to do. It is not denied that the Constitution provides for the organization for the militia and for the disciplining and training for the National Guard or the Organized Militia in accordance with the discipline prescribed by Congress. If Congress has those powers, Congress can exercise them.

The Constitution never contemplated conferring upon Congress a power which Congress could not exercise, and, therefore, in this bill this committee has undertaken to exercise the powers which the Constitution has conferred upon Congress, and we believe we have federalized the militia in such a way as to bring it under the control of the President and of the War Department so that it will be trained in time of peace in such a way as to be fit for service in time of war. We provide that it shall go into the service of the United States immediately upon a declaration of war or when war is imminent, and that it can be mobilized at once without the delays and without the confusion which took place at the time of the Spanish War. I have not time to go into the details, but I would be very glad to answer any question upon any section of this bill dealing with the National Guard, because I believe I can convince any fair-minded man that there is not a section in this bill which is not constitutional, and which will not stand the test of the court. For myself, I do not believe that there will ever be any question raised as to the constitutionality of it, but if it were raised, these provisions in this bill will stand the test in my judgment; will be declared constitutional by the Supreme Court of the country. We have a provision in the bill for a mobilization of industries in time of war.

Mr. STEENERSON. Mr. Chairman, before the gentleman leaves the militia, is it the opinion of the committee that when the militia is called forth under this proposed law into the service of the United States, the United States will then have the same authority over it as it has over the Regular Army, so far as any expedition beyond the boundaries of the country is concerned?

Mr. HAY. This bill provides that in time of war or when war is imminent the President shall draft into the service of the United States the National Guard and when they come into the service of the United States they cease to be militia and become United States troops. In other words, they become a part of the Army of the United States, and the President can send them from Dan to Bersheba, if he wants to.

Mr. STEENERSON. He can send them anywhere that he can send the Regular Army?

Mr. HAY. Yes.

Mr. FESS. The right to appoint the officers is still reserved in the State?

Mr. HAY. Yes; but we provide that they shall qualify themselves by an examination which shall be determined by the Secretary of War.

Mr. FESS. Then they are not volunteers—the governors of the States are not called upon?

Mr. HAY. No; Congress has the right to confer upon the President the power to draft anybody, and this bill confers upon him the right to draft the members of the National Guard, and provides that when they are so drafted they shall cease to be militia.

Mr. FESS. Then he does not call for them through the governor at all?

Mr. HAY. Not at all. He calls them through his own orders.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAY. Yes.

Mr. SIMS. That is the very subject that I desire to ask about. If the State of Tennessee or the State of Virginia sends a regiment of National Guard upon the call of the President, the officers have already been appointed, and they do not cease to be officers of the organization because of being drafted by the President?

Mr. HAY. This law provides that the President shall appoint all of these officers when they are drafted. It provides that for two reasons. First, that the President is the Commander in Chief of the Armies of the United States, and when soldiers come into the service of the United States the officers who are to command those troops ought to be appointed by the President. As a matter of practice, however, if he drafted the National Guard, he would necessarily have to appoint the officers that were then in command of the different troops, companies, and batteries and regiments in the National Guard, because he has nowhere else to go to get officers, and because those officers under this bill would have taken the examinations and would have qualified themselves to be officers in accordance with an examination prescribed by the Secretary of War.

Mr. SIMS. Would the President have the right to take the officers of a Tennessee regiment and appoint them in a Maine regiment, and from a Maine regiment appoint them in a Tennessee regiment?

Mr. HAY. He would; and he ought to have the power, the complete power, over these men in time of war, when the responsibility rests upon him who shall command the soldiers of the country.

Mr. SIMS. But at no other time than in time of war or when war is actually imminent?

Mr. HAY. Oh, no. The draft is only a war provision.

Mr. SLOAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAY. Yes.

Mr. SLOAN. With the power of the President to draft the militia, does he draft the organization or the individual members of the organization?

Mr. HAY. He drafts the individual members, and undoubtedly when he drafts them he would keep the same organization that they had when he drafted them, but in order to meet the constitutional condition it is necessary to put it in that way.

Mr. HILL. May I ask the gentleman a practical question?

Mr. HAY. Yes, sir.

Mr. HILL. Last week I received a volunteer offer from a complete organization of an artillery regiment of men to go to Texas from the State of Connecticut. Is there anything in the present law by which that organization could be accepted and put in this service?

Mr. HAY. Yes, sir. In the volunteer law passed in 1914 if the President chooses to do so he could call upon that regiment.

Mr. HILL. And take it as an organization?

Mr. HAY. And take it as an organization. That law provides that when three-fourths of a National Guard organization volunteers it shall be taken in as an organization.

Mr. HILL. That was not true during the Spanish-American War.

Mr. HAY. It was not.

Mr. HILL. But it is true now.

Mr. HAY. It is true now.

Mr. FESS. Could the President call upon an individual member of a regiment without calling upon the whole regiment?

Mr. HAY. He could.

Mr. FESS. Suppose he would not go?

Mr. MANN. Was the gentleman about to yield the floor?

Mr. HAY. Yes.

Mr. MANN. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. HAY. Certainly.

Mr. MANN. I understood the gentleman a while ago to say that if the Army were increased to 250,000 and the pay of the enlisted men was increased from $15 to $30 a month the cost would be $750,000,000 a year?

Mr. HAY. Yes; just about.

Mr. MANN. I confess I can not see how the gentleman can figure that out. The present cost of the Army is about $1,000 a man, maybe a little more than that.

Mr. HAY. Of course, I was figuring in that not only the pay and the equipment, but I was figuring ammunition and everything that is necessary to go with the Army. Now, at present in the Army bill of last year the ordnance part of that bill carried about $9,000,000. Now, this year we are asked to appropriate three times that much for the ordnance alone.

Mr. MANN. That is for reserve, I take it.

Mr. HAY. Of course, and some of that we are appropriating now is for reserve.

Mr. MANN. That is not chargeable to the maintenance of the Army?

Mr. HAY. Yes. I say we are charging everything. You do not figure that in, though, when you say that the soldier costs $1,000 a year.

Mr. MANN. Of course, when we say a soldier costs $1,000 a year we do not mean that. The soldier does not cost $1,000 a year—the enlisted man does not cost $1,000 a year; and how can you figure out, if you add $180 a year to the pay, increasing from $15 to $30 a month to the pay of the enlisted man, that you can add a half a million dollars more than the estimated cost to have an army of 250,000?

Mr. HAY. Well, while it is true you pay $180 a year for the private, the corporal gets $18 a month, and therefore he would get $36.

Mr. MANN. Well, not necessarily.

Mr. HAY. Well, that was thought to be the fair thing—to give the man that has a little more rank more than a private soldier.

Mr. MANN. Oh, it is perfectly evident if you increase the pay of the private enlisted man from $15 to $30 you would have to make some increase——

Mr. HAY. Undoubtedly.

Mr. MANN. In some of the lower officers. Of course that would not apply, though, I take it, to the commissioned officers.

Mr. HAY. It would not increase the pay of the commissioned officers, but you would increase the number.

Mr. MANN. You increase the number by the increase of the Army, but that would have no relation whatever to the increase of the pay of the enlisted man. I understood the gentleman to say that the basis of the large increase in the cost was upon the increase in the pay of the enlisted man. I could not figure it out. We pay now for the enlisted men in the present Army less than $25,000,000 a year, I think; certainly less than that for the line of the Army, including retired pay and increase or fogy pay.

Mr. HAY. I think last year the appropriation was something like $21,000,000 for the enlisted men, but I want to say to the gentleman——

Mr. MANN. The increase for the enlisted men of the line of the Army for this year is $18,200,000; $2,300,000 for length of service and $2,850,000 for the retired pay.

Mr. HAY. Yes.

Mr. MANN. Now, that is the line of the Army, and that is a very small proportion of the total cost of the maintenance of the Army.

Mr. HAY. If the gentleman will let me say, in stating 250,000 I ought to have said 500,000. That is what I ought to have said.

Mr. MANN. That puts a different face upon the subject.

Mr. HAY. The 250,000 would cost somewhere in the neighborhood of a half a million dollars—mighty near it.

Mr. MANN. I can not see how the gentleman can figure it out.

Mr. HAY. I can show the gentleman. Take, for example, the Quartermaster's Corps. It is now 7,000 men. Now, if you had an army of 250,000 you would have to double that at least. Now, take the Hospital Corps, and you would have to double that. That is 7,000 under this bill. You would have to double that, and that would be 14,000. And you have got to double all along the pay not only of the private soldier but that of the corporal, the sergeant, the first sergeant, and the quartermaster sergeant; and you will find that, taken together with the men, the subsistence, the transportation, and the one hundred and one things that go toward the expense of the Army, it would be at least more than treble what we have now if we have an Army of 500,000 men and keep them on foot.

Mr. MANN. Including the pay of the officers, the pay of the Army is now less than one-half the total appropriation for the maintenance or support of the Army?

Mr. HAY. It is a little less than one-half, but of course the other part of the appropriation is a part of what we have to pay to sustain the Army.

Mr. MANN. True enough; but there would be no greater cost for the maintenance of the Army, no greater cost for the transportation of the Army, whatever pay you allowed the Army? That will be practically the same?

Mr. HAY. The cost would be much greater to have to furnish transportation facilities for an army of 250,000 men.

Mr. MANN. I say, whatever the pay, the cost of the equipment, the cost of the uniforms, the cost of all the quartermaster stores, the cost of all subsistence and transportation, would be the same, whatever the pay?

Mr. HAY. But, of course, that subsistence and that transportation would go up relatively with the size of the Army.

Mr. MANN. With the size of the Army?

Mr. HAY. Yes.

Mr. MANN. Of course. Now, the present cost is in the neighborhood of $1,000 each for the number of soldiers in the Army, per year?

Mr. HAY. Yes.

Mr. MANN. Why would it go up in proportion if we increased the Army?

Mr. HAY. I do not mean to say it would cost any more to keep a soldier on foot, but I do mean to say that the larger you make the Army the relatively larger is the expense of maintaining the Army.

Mr. MANN. Undoubtedly, and if the present Army is supposed to cost $100,000,000 a year on the basis of about 100,000 men, why would not an army of 250,000 men cost about $250,000,000 a year if you keep the present pay?

Mr. HAY. I will tell you what I will do. I will get the War Department to make a table to show the cost of keeping an army of 250,000 men a year, and have it before this bill passes, taking into consideration everything. Of course, I can not keep those figures in my head, and if we could have it tabulated it would show just what it would cost; and that is information which probably the House ought to have.

Mr. MANN. Well, I have so much confidence in the fact that the gentleman from Virginia does carry figures in his head so exceedingly well, that I called his attention to the fact. I thought he said an army of 250,000 men, and therefore I called his attention to it.

Mr. HAY. And I did. And what I wanted to say at the time was that if we wanted to keep the country on a war footing it would take 500,000 men to do it; but what this committee wanted to do was to supply what would be necessary in time of peace.

Mr. Chairman, I have consumed much more time than I had any intention of doing, and I will yield the floor with this statement, that I trust very much that the Members of this House will study this bill and look into the real merits of it. I think they will find it presents a reasonable plan of preparedness to be put into operation in time of peace and which everybody can support and which, when it gets into operation, will have accomplished the purpose of all those who are in favor of bringing about a proper national defense. [Applause.]

Mr. HARDY. Will the gentleman yield just for a question? I wish to ask the gentleman, Mr. Chairman, if he did not omit largely what he desired to say on industrial preparedness?

Mr. HAY. I did; but I did not get the time.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. McKENZIE]. [Applause.]

Mr. McKENZIE. Mr. Chairman, the Constitution of the United States prescribes that Congress shall provide for the common defense and is given power under the Constitution—

To raise and support armies.

To provide and maintain a Navy.

To provide for calling forth the militia and to execute the laws of the Union, suppress insurrection and repel invasions, and to provide for the organizing, arming, and disciplining the militia, and for governing such part of them as may be employed in the service of the United States, reserving to the States, respectively, the appointment of the officers and the authority of training the militia according to the discipline prescribed by Congress.

Congress in the performance of this duty heretofore has provided for a small Regular Army and the Organized Militia of the several States as the Military Establishment in times of peace, relying principally upon volunteer forces in time of war.

The Regular Army has been increased from time to time, as provided by Congress, with the present maximum fixed at 100,000; but at no time has the full maximum strength been appropriated for by Congress.

The Organized Militia received practically no consideration from the Federal Government in a financial way until within recent years; in fact it has never been considered by some of our military men as a force to be dependent upon in time of war.

I am prompted to say at this point that whatever critics may be constrained to say reflecting upon the policy pursued by Congress in the past relating to national defense, it has evidently been approved by the people.

In addition to what Congress has done by way of appropriating money for the Regular Army and the Organized Militia, it has been making appropriations for the gradual building up of a reserve in all things necessary to equip an army. But notwithstanding these facts, many of our people, from one cause or another, have awakened to the fact that, in their judgment, our Nation is in a helpless position and wholly unprepared for defense in case of an attack by a first-class power.

The fact that our Nation has grown from a population of over 3,000,000 to 100,000,000; from a condition of poverty to that of wealth; from a condition of weakness in all the potential elements of national defense to that of matchless strength, enjoying the distinction of being the richest, the strongest, and in every sense the most independent and powerful nation on earth, except in the matter of military and naval preparedness, gives no comforting assurance to those of our citizens who see danger and ultimate disaster to all our hopes and aspirations as a nation unless we immediately provide for very large military and naval establishments.

The historic fact that for more than 100 years covering the period of our growth and development we escaped invasion by the warring nations of the earth, that oceans still separate us from them, and that we have never been engaged in war in all that time, except of our own making, furnishes no evidence of security to the advocates of a large Army and Navy.

Much has been written and published in the past few months demanding that Congress provide for adequate national defense.

Numerous orators have grown eloquent in portraying our helplessness as a nation and dramatically demanding action by Congress. Even Members of Congress and politicians have earnestly declaimed along the same line. Leagues and organizations, some old, some of mushroom growth, have put forth high-sounding resolutions demanding adequate national defense.

The effect of this propaganda has been to inflame the fears of the timid and arouse the indignation of those aware of the misleading statements contained in many of the articles, speeches, and resolutions. However, all this has been of little value to the members of the Committee on Military Affairs charged with the grave responsibility of preparing and presenting to this House a plan for the reorganization and strengthening of our Military Establishment along reasonable lines.

The members of the committee approached the consideration of this important subject with open minds, and I am satisfied that it was the patriotic desire of every member of the committee to recommend what he believed would be best for his country. The committee is composed of men from every section of our land. The chairman, Hon. JAMES HAY, hails from the Old Dominion; Hon. JULIUS KAHN, the ranking member of the minority, is a resident of California. The Atlantic States are represented by FARLEY and CALDWELL, of New York; OLNEY, of Massachusetts; NICHOLLS, of South Carolina; TILSON, of Connecticut, and GREENE, of Vermont. The Southern and Middle States by DENT, of Alabama; WISE, of Georgia; QUIN, of Mississippi; FIELDS, of Kentucky; MCKELLAR, of Tennessee; LITTLEPAGE, of West Virginia; GORDON, of Ohio, and CRAGO and MORIN, of Pennsylvania. The Western Plains by ANTHONY, of Kansas, and SHALLENBERGER, of Nebraska. The upper Mississippi Valley by HULL, of Iowa, and MCKENZIE, of Illinois.

Surely it can not be said the committee is provincial in its membership and therefore not representative of the whole country. The people of both coasts, the sections of our country which will be called upon to meet the first onset of the invader in case of war, are ably represented on the committee. And the great central portion of our country is represented by men whose patriotism I am satisfied extends beyond the confines of their respective States and, I trust, to whom Bunker Hill and the Golden Gate are as dear as they are to the citizens of Massachusetts and California. I feel, however, it is but fair to state to the House and to the country that the present Committee on Military Affairs is composed of men who give but little heed to impassioned harangues and glittering generalities, whether coming from the lips or pen of the extreme pacifist who opposes all military preparedness, or the wild-eyed jingo who would bankrupt our Nation in preparation for war with an enemy who may never appear.

After a careful investigation of a number of plans submitted to us, and after exhaustive hearings in which persons representing every phase of the subject appeared before the committee and presented their views, the committee agreed to report the pending bill.

At this point I might properly say that the committee in approving and reporting the bill did it with the full understanding that it was a measure intended to provide for national defense and not for any war of conquest. In other words, to provide a military establishment sufficient to defend our country in case of an attempted invasion by a first-class power. Such an establishment, we believed, could be provided under the operation of the bill now before the House.

In the preparation of this bill we were not unmindful of the oft-reiterated statement that in the matter of providing a sufficient military establishment for the proper defense of our country that Congress should be guided exclusively by the advice of military experts. We were fully persuaded that in all matters pertaining to the tactical organization of the Army and the different units of the same the advice of experts should be followed. But when it comes to the matter of determining whether or not we shall maintain a large Regular Army in time of peace, having in mind the enormous expense of the same, that the people, through their representatives and not military experts, should be consulted.

A number of concrete plans were submitted for our consideration. The plan submitted by Secretary of War Garrison provided for increasing the Regular Army approximately to 141,000 officers and men, and also provided for the organizing of a volunteer force of 400,000 men to be known as the continental army, or by any other name which Congress deemed appropriate. His plan also provided for a reserve in both the regular and volunteer forces.

The War College plan, as it is known, provided for a Regular Army of approximately 281,000, and a volunteer force such as was recommended by the Secretary of War. The estimated cost of the War College plan would be, as stated by one officer, about $1,000,000 a day.

Gen. Wood also submitted a plan recommending a regular force of 220,000 and a like volunteer organization. All of these plans provided for a volunteer force in time of peace had in view the enlistment of the men for a period of three years with the colors, after which they were to pass into the volunteer reserve for a term of three years. The officers in this proposed volunteer force were to be appointed by the President from the Regular Army, and the men were to be drilled from one to two months annually for three years, and paid for their services while on duty.

In none of the aforementioned plans for the reorganization of the Military Establishment was the Organized Militia, known as the National Guard, taken into consideration as an effective or dependable military force.

The committee, after a full investigation, was convinced that the plan for the proposed volunteer force commonly referred to as the continental army was impractical and could never be successfully carried out without compulsory service, a policy which, in the judgment of the committee, would be abhorrent to the people of our country in time of peace. For this and other reasons we decided not to incorporate any such scheme in the Military Establishment of our country at this time. I might add that it was the judgment of the committee that any attempt to organize and maintain such a force would be destructive to the National Guard, an organization which is now composed of approximately 130,000 officers and men, and which force we believe is a far more dependable and effective military organization than any such volunteer force could be made, notwithstanding the fact that the officers of the Organized Militia are not appointed by the President nor under the direct and exclusive control of the Secretary of War.

We propose to increase the Regular Army by the addition of 10 regiments of Infantry, 6 regiments of Field Artillery, 52 companies of Coast Artillery, 15 companies of Engineers, and 4 aero squadrons, and also by the addition of the necessary officers to the Quartermaster Corps, Medical Corps, Ordnance Department, and the Veterinary Corps, in order to enable the several corps and departments to perform the duties imposed upon them. We have also provided for the addition of 786 extra officers to aid in training the militia and for service in the schools and colleges where military training is taught, and have increased the aviation section of the Signal Corps by adding 73 officers and 720 enlisted men.

We have changed the enlistment period in the Regular Army from four to three years with the colors, after which service the enlisted men may be furloughed into the reserve. And we provide that the peace strength of this army shall be fixed at 140,000 men of the line and give the President the power to expand the same in time of war to full strength, amounting to at least 170,000 of the line.

In addition to the foregoing increase in the Regular Army, we have provided for what we believe to be the complete federalization of the Organized Militia under the name of the National Guard.

In doing this we were not unmindful of the factious criticism that will be directed against this section of the bill by those who pin their faith for security solely upon a large Regular Army. It has been said and will be repeatedly reiterated that a man can not serve two masters. That it is impossible to conceive how any man a resident of one of the States, a member of the Organized Militia, subject to the authority of his State, and who has sworn allegiance to the same, and also at the same time has sworn to support the Constitution of the United States, and that he will obey all lawful orders of the President of the United States, can be an effective soldier subject to such dual authority.

After hearing all of the gentlemen, after discussing the matter for a long time in the committee, we came to the conclusion that we would accept practically the proposition recommended by the Secretary of War to increase the Regular Army to 140,000 men of the line in time of peace. We believed that his judgment was sound on that matter, and the only feature where we differed with him was on the question of attempting at this time to organize a great volunteer force of 400,000 or 500,000 men to take the place of the Organized Militia of the several States. We believed that to attempt such an organization would be destructive to the National Guard.

Mr. QUIN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield there?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. McKENZIE. Yes.

Mr. QUIN. In addition to the Secretary of War, did not the Chief of Staff think that 125,000 or 140,000 men were all that we could use in time of peace?

Mr. McKENZIE. Yes. I was going to state that. We believed it would be destructive to the National Guard, and the committee did not feel that we were warranted in ignoring this organization that is as old as the country, that has got now about 130,000 officers and men, at the behest of technical critics and military experts. We were thoroughly convinced that whatever may be said of the Organized Militia of this country, it would be a far more dependable force in time of danger than a volunteer force that is drilled only one or two months in each year. Therefore we discarded the idea of the continental army, and have, as the chairman said, absolutely federalized the National Guard and made it a part of our military organization.

Now, gentlemen, I know that there has been much criticism of the National Guard.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McKENZIE. Certainly.

Mr. FESS. Does the gentleman think that there is any force in the argument that our State militia, even under the new bill, with the officers selected by the State, would be 48 separate units, out of which you could not get any unity? Would there be any force in that?

Mr. McKENZIE. Absolutely none; because the officers of the National Guard who appeared before our committee—and I believe it is also the universal sentiment of the country—stated that they are now soldiers of the United States and not of the respective States in which they live, and that they would be ready and willing to go in response to the call of the President of the United States.

Mr. CALLAWAY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McKENZIE. Yes.

Mr. CALLAWAY. Is it not a fact that all the men associated with the Regular Army discounted the value of the militia, and the backing of the militia rested on the testimony of the militia alone?

Mr. McKENZIE. Well, there is probably some truth in that, but I do not want to enter into that discussion because we are going to put them all together and make of the two elements an army for the United States.

Mr. DENT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McKENZIE. Yes.

Mr. DENT. I do not want to take up the gentleman's time, but along the line of the question that the gentleman from Texas [Mr. CALLAWAY] asked, did not those officers of the Army who had been detailed with the National Guard, and had been with them, testify in the hearings had before the committee in favor of the National Guard, and those who had not had that experience did not?

Mr. McKENZIE. That is true.

I wish to state in this connection that the members of the committee were not disposed to ignore a military organization as old as our country and capable of being molded into a powerful and effective organization at the behest of technical critics and hair-splitting military experts. Fortunately for us, and I think for our country, the Constitution is very plain on this matter, and it was thoroughly understood by those living at the time of the adoption of the Constitution, that Congress had supreme power over the Organized Militia as will appear by statements of such great Americans as Patrick Henry, George Washington, James Madison, and James Monroe, quotations from whom will be found in the report on this bill. The committee stood squarely on the Constitution and has provided for the organization of the National Guard in every detail.

We have provided for its armament and for the disciplining of the guard in accordance with the rules and regulations governing the Regular Army.

We have provided for the training of the National Guard by officers detailed from the Regular Army in accordance with the prescribed discipline, reserving to the States their right under the Constitution to appoint the officers, but we have prescribed the qualifications of such officers.

We have provided a small scale of pay for the officers and men of the National Guard, believing that it is unjust to ask men to give their time and energy to this service of the country without compensation.

We provide further in this bill that the term of enlistment shall be three years with the colors and three years in the reserve; that all applicants for enlistment are required to take a physical examination prescribed by the Secretary of War. We further provide, in order to forever put at rest the criticism that the Organized Militia, or National Guard, is not subject to the call of the President, except in the cases cited in the Constitution, that he, in time of war or imminent danger, may not only order out the Organized Militia but shall have power to immediately draft all or any portion of the same into the service of the United States.

Under the provisions of this bill the National Guard may be expanded in time of peace to approximately 425,000.

I am aware that there are many critics of the National Guard, men who place no dependence in the same as an element of national defense to be relied upon in time of danger. And such men take particular delight in reciting the story of the inglorious conduct of some of the poorly organized and badly drilled militia organizations of Revolutionary times, and also of the War of 1812. Such critics relate the story of the capture of the Capital of our country by a British force inferior in number to the militia assembled on that occasion, and it seems to give some of them great pleasure. Every student of American history has read that story, and also the story of the disgraceful conduct of a few other Americans in the War of 1812. However, in my judgment, to compare those motley organizations to the well-organized, well-drilled regiments in the National Guard of to-day is far-fetched, and is just as unreasonable as it would be for a friend of the National Guard to claim that a band of riflemen behind cotton bales, such as Gen. Jackson had at New Orleans when he defeated the British, could successfully compete with a highly trained modern army, armed with the most improved implements of warfare.

It has been said, as I remarked before, by those arguing for a large Regular Army that the National Guard can not be depended upon to volunteer, and that such statements are warranted in the light of history. To controvert this statement I shall include as a part of my remarks a report of The Adjutant General showing the quota assigned to each State in the call for volunteers in the Spanish-American War and the response by States.

Table showing quotas originally assigned to and troops furnished by the several States and Territories during the War with Spain.

[1] This does not include general officers and staff and United States Volunteers.

And in connection with the above report I desire to call attention to the fact that the quota allotted to Illinois, 12,877, was filled by 13,647, and in addition to that Adjt. Gen. Frank Dickson, of the State of Illinois, stated before the committee that Illinois not only furnished its quota but that the National Guard volunteered as organizations. And in addition to the number taken into service, in three months after war was declared there were organized and officered in full 27 regiments of Illinois volunteers, which were never called. I merely cite these instances to show that the National Guard is composed of men ready for service, and that the spirit of patriotism is still alive in our country. The officers of the National Guard who appeared before the committee asserted that they considered themselves soldiers of the United States and ready to go at a moment's notice when called in the defense of their country. So far as I am personally concerned, I deem it an insult to the patriotic men who meet week after week in their armories to drill and learn to be soldiers, for some critic, who, perhaps, spends his evenings at the card table, the bowling alley, or at some social function, who never spent a moment in his life, or spent a dollar of his money in preparing himself to defend the rights of others, to speak slightingly of the National Guard by saying that they would not enlist in time of war, and, if so, would not be a dependable military asset.

I am fully convinced that the National Guard under this bill will become a powerful and potent factor in our Military Establishment. The companies being composed of men who are neighbors and friends and when brought together as an army will need but little training in order to become a force in whose hands the flag of our country will never be sullied by craven conduct, and the enemy who undertakes to invade our land will find in these sons of America a foe worthy of his steel.

It is also provided in this bill for an officers' reserve corps, for the training of cadet companies, volunteer summer training camps, and also that the Government shall furnish equipment and detail officers as instructors in schools and colleges having, at least, 100 physically fit boys over the age of 14 years.

I am fully convinced that the bill is a wise and conservative measure. I do not claim that it is perfect. There are a few things in the bill I do not approve of in full, but necessarily any such bill must, to a certain extent, be a matter of compromise. It will be subject to the criticism of extremists, but I am inclined to feel that it will have the approval of the great mass of the American people.

The Regular Army at peace strength of 140,000 men of the line will furnish a reasonable garrison for the Philippine Islands, Hawaii, the Panama Canal, Alaska, and China, man our harbor defenses, and give us a mobile force in the United States of approximately 50,000. For one I was influenced to some extent in fixing this number of regular troops in time of peace by the statement of Gen. Scott, Chief of Staff, that an Army of 135,000 was sufficient to perform all the functions of the Regular Army in time of peace; and also by statements of other military men, that a Regular Army of 250,000, or even 500,000, would be wholly insufficient in case of war; and also by the statement of Gen. McCain, that 50,000 men was the maximum number that could be enlisted annually. I also agree with the statement made a short time ago in the editorial columns of the Chicago Tribune, that "Any nation that takes refuge behind a large paid regular army is doomed to rot." I may not have this quotation verbatim, as I quote from memory, but at any rate, the foregoing is the substance of the statement.

It goes without saying that if an army of 135,000 is sufficient to perform all the functions required of the Regular Army in time of peace that all the force added above that number would be in the nature of a luxury and could correctly be termed the "standing" army.

Under this bill we could mobilize in a short time an army of not less than 500,000 as an effective fighting force to hold the line until reserves and volunteers could be supplied.

Is this force enough?

The advocates of a Regular Army of 250,000 or 500,000, of course, will ridicule such a force and undoubtedly will heap ridicule and abuse upon every man who differs from them and especially any man who stands for the enactment of the present bill into law.

But, Mr. Chairman, do the advocates of a Regular Army of 500,000 comprehend what it would mean to this country; and if so, do they take their countrymen into their confidence? Why should they not be frank and honest in their contentions and say to the people what they know, if they know anything about the subject, that such an army in time of peace could only be raised by conscription or compulsory military service? Why not tell the people frankly that such an army would cost annually $500,000,000? Why do not these advocates of a large Army come out boldly and go the full length of what their plan would mean, namely, conscription of Americans to serve in time of peace without pay? If they will do this I will have some respect for their courage and consistency. So far as I am personally concerned I am opposed to a reversal of all the traditions of our country by establishing military conscription in time of peace. I am also opposed to men serving in the Regular Army without reasonable compensation in time of peace. And I am opposed to any military program that will place a burden upon the people of this country in time of peace of $500,000,000 annually or any like sum.

Mr. Chairman, I wonder if these advocates of an enormous military establishment ever stop to think of the effect of such a program on our people. We as a Nation are looking to an extension of our trade in foreign lands; in other words, an export trade. If we are to pile the burden of taxation higher and higher upon the people it will mean increased cost of living; increased cost of living necessarily means higher wages; higher wages means added cost to the products of our great industrial establishments, thereby making it more difficult for the American producer to compete with his foreign competitor in the markets of the world; loss of market means business stagnation; business stagnation means idleness; idleness means want. With such a condition in our country, do you imagine that the people would not murmur at a great standing Army, quartered in every section of our country, waiting for an invasion of some foe? This Army, well paid, well clothed, and well fed, while, perchance, many of our citizens and their families suffered from hunger! But their murmurs, according to the theory of the large-army advocate, ought to be easily stilled when told that they are safe from danger of invasion; that they would be protected by this large standing army, and even though it cost them annually a considerable portion of their hard earnings the insurance would be worth the money. Ah, Mr. Chairman, has this great Nation of freemen come to the point that it is willing to endure this burdensome expense in order to be protected from the assaults of some foreign enemy? Is the spirit of patriotism and self-reliance of the citizen dead? Surely not.

And if I am not mistaken, Mr. Chairman, if we ever fasten such a burden as this upon the American people, the time will come when the clouds of war will hang ominously around our flag, but it will not be the war clouds from afar, but it will be those more dangerous clouds of angry revolution. For, Mr. Chairman, if I have any conception of the spirit of the American citizen, he will never submit to a despotic system of taxation for the maintenance of an unnecessary and useless military establishment in time of peace.

Mr. Chairman, I ask again, Is the force provided for in this bill sufficient?

I can hear the man who wants an army of 250,000 to 500,000 in time of peace and the man who says that Germany could in a few days after we lose control of the sea land a force of 387,000 men on our shore say no. However, this estimate of an expeditionary force put out by the War College has no terrors for me. I respect the wonderful efficiency and power of the German military machine, but I know of no reason why one should designate Germany as a possible enemy. Surely the history of the past will not justify any such assumption. But be that as it may, let us assume for the sake of argument that such an attempt is to be made by some foreign country.

The first thing to be accomplished by an enemy before attempting to bring an expeditionary force to our shores would be to drive our Navy from the seas. Is there a man in this Chamber who believes that the navy of any nation on earth, except England—and I doubt her ability—could sweep our Navy from the seas and make it a thoroughfare over which transports carrying men could safely pass in less time than several months?

I do not. I am convinced that the $500,000,000 we have expended in the construction of naval vessels in recent years, such vessels being manned with men whom I believe have the courage of a Lawrence or a Perry, would safely guard our shores for a number of months, if not for all time.

Again, Gen. Wood stated before the committee that a man could be trained to be a good fighter in six months. It would require less time to bring our Regular Army up to its maximum and put the National Guard into shape as a potent defensive force. With our Regular Army at its maximum, 170,000, as provided in this bill, supplemented by the National Guard at peace strength, 425,000, we would have a force larger than the estimated maximum number of supposed invaders. I am willing to concede that any nation attempting to invade our shores would employ in the service the very flower of its Army, and I am willing further to concede with such a highly skilled force of men we perhaps would not be prepared to combat such a force man for man on equal terms. However, we would have the advantage of fighting on the defensive, which is no small advantage in case of an attempted invasion, and I am not ready to subscribe to the views of some people in discussing this matter that it would require a force of Americans perhaps two or three times as large as that of the invaders to successfully cope with them.

Taking into consideration the strength of our Nation, our harbor defenses, our Field Artillery, our reserve of ammunition, I have no hesitancy in saying that unless our Navy, fearful of defeat, sought refuge in the shelter of our harbor defenses, we would have ample time to mobilize a sufficient force with which to repel such an invasion.

I can understand the necessity of European nations maintaining large standing armies ever ready for a conflict, especially on the Continent, where mere boundary lines with such fortifications as may be erected thereon are all that separate them from each other, and with their railroad systems so constructed that it is possible to mobilize their armies on an enemy frontier within a few hours and to immediately begin the invasion.

Whatever may be said of our military preparedness, our country is so situated geographically that it can not be immediately attacked by the army of any foreign power save that of Mexico and Great Britain and these two countries are never taken into consideration by the average advocate of a large military establishment, dismissing Mexico on the ground of weakness and Great Britain on the theory that we will never have war with this Anglo-Saxon people. The point I am endeavoring to make, Mr. Chairman, is that in the event of war with any of the other foreign powers, we will have, at least, a reasonable time in which to prepare to meet the invaders. All this talk that our country is liable to be invaded in a few hours after declaration of war is to my mind the veriest nonsense.

I wish to submit at this point a few facts to controvert statements I have seen in print to the effect that Congress in the past has been guilty of gross negligence in failing to make appropriations for the building up of a reserve of the articles necessary to equip an army in time of war. The truth is, Mr. Chairman, that Congress for a number of years has been making annual appropriations to carry out the recommendations of the Department of War in the matter of reserve in good faith.

The fact that certain Army officers have changed their minds and now recommend a different plan on a very much larger scale is no reflection on Congress, as will appear from the statement made by the Chief of Ordnance that we now have on hand nearly enough equipment for an army of between 400,000 and 500,000 men—I am now speaking of reserves. He also stated that we have over 1,000,000 rifles on hand and 200,000,000 rounds of small-arms ammunition. That there are also built and under construction 1,077 machine guns and 900 field artillery guns; also 750,000 rounds of field artillery ammunition. The Quartermaster General stated that there is on hand such equipment as his department must supply to an army sufficient for the Regular Army, the National Guard, and 250,000 additional men, and that in 90 days there could easily be provided equipment for 600,000 to 700,000 men.

The Chief of Engineers informed the committee that we have on hand heavy intrenching tools for nine Infantry divisions, and that these tools can be supplied in 15 days; and also we have pontoon equipage for 500,000 men. Gen. Gorgas, the Surgeon General of the Army, stated that there is in store supplies for about 250,000 to 300,000 men in addition to the supply of the Regular Army.

I do not contend that such a reserve is sufficient to carry on a great war. We all know better. I do contend, however, that it demonstrates that Congress has not been derelict in its duty in this matter, and that it is a sufficient reserve to equip a force necessary to meet the first expeditionary force that any nation can possibly bring to our shores at any one time, and that it is sufficient to enable our Government to defend itself for such a period of time as will make it possible to coordinate and mobilize the great resources of our country in such a manner as to supply the men for any sized army necessary to be called into service.

This, Mr. Chairman, practically covers the main provisions of the plan proposed by the committee for national defense and prescribes the size of the Army to be maintained in time of peace.

I am persuaded that the plan proposed in this bill will give the Nation adequate defense and that to add to the burdens of the people by recommending the maintenance of an unnecessary military force in time of peace would not only be unwise but un-American, for it is conceded by all that in any great war in which our country may become engaged it must rely upon volunteer forces; and it is conceded by military men that with our scale of pay a large Regular Army is prohibitive. And further to attempt conscription of men to serve in the Army without pay in time of peace, such as is the custom in European countries, is not possible at this time, nor do I feel that it is desirable.

I ask again, Will such a military establishment as is proposed in this bill be large enough? My own answer is, that all depends on the future policy of our country. If our Nation is to pursue the same wise, conservative, and just policy in the future which has made the name of the great American Republic an honored and distinguished one among the nations of the earth, I say yes.

If we are to follow the wise counsel of the Father of Our Country and avoid entangling alliances with other nations and continue to pursue a course tempered with justice, fairness, and impartiality toward all the nations of the earth, being ever zealous of our honor, demanding that the rights of Americans shall be respected, but dealing justly with all nations and demanding only a square deal for ourselves, we need no great military establishment, and I would say that the force provided for in this bill will be sufficient.

However, Mr. Chairman, if we are to change our policy and, instead of continuing as a peace-loving people imbued with the ideal of dealing justly with all nations, and attending strictly to our own affairs, our Nation is to become an arrogant boaster, assuming a "holier than thou" attitude toward the other nations of the earth; if we are going to enter into alliances with other nations; if we are to assume the rôle of pretender, in saying what shall or shall not be done by the people of our sister Republics; if we are going to assume that the Monroe doctrine includes more than the maintenance inviolate of the sovereignty of the nations of the Western Continent from aggression by any European or oriental nation—that it shall include every possible contingency that may arise affecting the intercourse between the nations of this continent with other nations of the world, and that we shall insist that none of them can enter into a treaty or contract giving any advantage to any particular nation without having first obtained our consent—if we are going to assume that we have a right to dictate to Japan just what she shall or shall not do in China or elsewhere; if we are going to permit American bankers and speculators to go into other countries, as the French went into Morocco and the English into Egypt, and then we are to follow these gentlemen up with diplomacy and cannon to protect what they are pleased to assert are their rights as American citizens in foreign lands, it will be necessary for us to have an Army of at least 1,000,000 men ready with gun in hand.

But, Mr. Chairman, let us hope that we will continue to be true to our traditions and that we will not change a policy which has been the pride and glory of American citizenship.

In conclusion, Mr. Chairman, I wish to say that I am not a peace-at-any-price advocate. I believe in maintaining our national honor inviolate, but I want that national honor to continue to be grounded in the principle of justice and equity. I am aware, as every thinking man is, that it is idle to argue that we have reached a period in our history where we are immune from war.

Just so long, Mr. Chairman, as nations are governed and controlled by crowned heads there is ever present the menace that some king, in order to maintain his place on the throne, or obsessed with the ambition of writing his name on the pages of history as a great warrior, utterly disregarding the rights of humanity, may seek to provoke war with our Nation. And, again, our own statesmen are not all perfect and by error, or, perchance, to gratify selfish ambitions, might involve us in war.

Knowing these things, I am in favor of reasonable preparedness. In case our country should unfortunately become involved in war, I desire a small regular force as a nucleus, supplemented by a large and well-drilled National Guard, and by the reserve of both the Regular Army and the National Guard, and also the trained citizenry from our summer camps and military schools. I am also in favor of a large reserve of all kinds of equipment necessary to fit an army for service, in order that we may have the same with which to equip the volunteer forces immediately upon being called to defend the country.

Mr. Chairman, in addition to this, and pertaining to national defense, I would have the children of our country taught in the homes and in the schools of the land something about the sacrifices made in order to establish this Government. I would teach them the significance of the American flag and the noble principles it represents. I would have them taught the meaning of American citizenship, and that it is a sacred privilege, much greater than the boast of the ancient Roman, to be able to say, "I am an American citizen." And, Mr. Chairman, I would have our Government enact wise and just laws for the protection of our citizens at home, in order that they might feel that they owed a debt of gratitude to their Government and would be ever ready to respond to a call in its defense. And, Mr. Chairman, I would do another thing. I would protect our country by a careful regulation of immigration into our land. It may be astounding to know that there are several millions of aliens in our country over 21 years of age who have never signified their intentions of becoming American citizens.

I feel, Mr. Chairman, that we would be within our rights when an immigrant comes to our shores to require him to swear allegiance to the Constitution of our country. If he refused, I would deport him. For, Mr. Chairman, I think the time has arrived when we should see to it that, enjoying the privileges and opportunities here afforded him, he should not be subject to the call of any foreign sovereign, and at whose order be required to return to his native land to aid such sovereign in maintaining his crown.

Let it be understood we welcome all men capable of making good American citizens, but that we are going to insist that all living under our flag and enjoying the blessings of American liberty must under all circumstances stand for America first. [Applause.]

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. GARNER having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the Senate, by Mr. Waldorf, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed bills of the following titles, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

S. 4505. An act appropriating money to equip Puget Sound Navy Yard for battleship construction;

S. 5016. An act to authorize the reconstruction of an existing bridge across the Wabash River at Silverwood, in the State of Indiana; and Senate concurrent resolution 16.

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That there be printed and bound, under the direction of the Joint Committee on Printing, the proceedings in Congress, together with the proceedings at the unveiling in Statuary Hall, upon the acceptance of the statue of Henry Mower Rice presented by the State of Minnesota, 16,500 copies, with suitable illustration, of which 5,000 shall be for the use of the Senate and 10,000 for the use of the House of Representatives, and the remaining 1,500 copies shall be for the use and distribution of the Senators and Representatives in Congress from the State of Minnesota.

The message also announced that the President had, on March 16, 1916, approved and signed bill of the following title:

S. 3518. An act granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent relatives of such soldiers and sailors.

THE MILITARY ESTABLISHMENT.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. KAHN. I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. ANDERSON].

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. MONTAGUE). The gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. ANDERSON] is recognized for 10 minutes.

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Chairman, we are the richest Nation on earth. If this statement gratifies the pride, if it satisfies the vanity, it makes no appeal to the enthusiasm. It paints no picture on the canvas of the mind. It conveys no impression of the greater United States.

I wonder if you have in your mind's eye a picture of our part of the Western Hemisphere. In the center of the picture, the heart of the empire of the United States, with its 4,000 miles of coast line; to the north, Canada; to the south, Mexico.

To the northwest is Alaska, with its nearest open port 1,300 miles from San Francisco, and with no direct railroad communication with continental United States. Across the Bering Sea it almost touches hands with Russian Siberia, while the farthermost Aleutian Island extends some 2,500 miles toward Japan. It is a vast storehouse of mineral wealth; its agricultural possibilities have scarcely been touched. In less than 50 years it has produced $525,000,000 of wealth.

Some 2,500 miles south of Alaska, and 2,000 miles from San Francisco, are the Hawaiian Islands, with an area of 6,500 square miles and a population of 208,000, of which 100,000 are Japanese and Chinese.

West of Hawaii is our part of Samoa, the islands of Guam and Tutuila, and beyond them, and 7,000 miles from San Francisco, are the more than 3,000 islands that compose the Philippine Archipelago. These have an area of 40,000 square miles, and a population of 9,000,000, of which only 20,000 are Americans.

To the south, we own the Panama Canal, upon which we have expended some $400,000,000, and which we are obligated to operate in time of war as in time of peace.

In the Atlantic, we have Porto Rico, with an area of 3,600 square miles, and a population of upward of a million.

Next to Porto Rico is the island of Cuba, whose independence and integrity we are bound by treaties to preserve.

Still farther to the south of us are the Republics of Central and South America. Our own safety and security forbids our permitting foreign aggression there.

Suppose we go a step further. Alaska has a foreign commerce of $47,000,000 annually, the Hawaiian Islands of $80,000,000, the Philippines of $110,000,000, Porto Rico of $86,000,000, and Cuba of $308,000,000. All together the commerce of Alaska, Cuba, and our insular possessions amounts to more than $600,000,000 annually. Our noncontiguous territory and insular possessions are second in importance and extent only to those of Great Britain and possibly of France.

Since 1870 our foreign commerce has increased from less than one billion to over four billions. Our goods are sold in every country, Christian and barbarian, the world over, and are carried upon every sea.

In that 50 years we have lived easily, luxuriously. We have developed commercially and industrially. We are self-centered and content. We want peace. We wish only to be let alone. The world will not let us alone, because we can not let the world alone—our foreign interests are too numerous, our commerce too vast, and our possesions too valuable.

Civilization has moved westward. With laggard but compelling hand it has awakened Japan and aroused the sleeping giant. The commercial progress of Japan has been, if anything, more marvelous than our own, and the drama of her regeneration is about to be reenacted in China. We prohibit Chinese immigration, while we insist that Chinese ports shall be open to Americans and American goods. The coast States restrict the rights of Japanese in land ownership and otherwise, while we insist upon the full measure of our own in Japan. We are able to do this because we control the Pacific. How long will we be able to do it when the control of the Pacific is wrested from us?

As the tide of civilization has moved westward the commercial importance of the islands of the Pacific and of the countries bordering upon it have correspondingly increased. Already Japan is seriously challenging our commercial trade in the Pacific. The end of the European war will see the greatest struggle for commercial supremacy in the world's history, for the great debt of that conflict must be paid in large part from the undeveloped resources of comparatively new countries. It is inevitable that much of that battle for commercial supremacy should take place in the countries bordering upon the Pacific Ocean.

We are all of us pretty much in the same boat. It makes but little difference whether Servia, Germany, England, or Japan rocks the boat, the effect is dangerous for all of us. We can not avoid the logic of events abroad nor separate ourselves from their consequences.

In 1492 a Spanish queen financed a sailor by the name of Columbus, and Europe laid its hands on America.

In 1802 Spain ceded Louisiana to France. Of this event, President Jefferson wrote to Mr. Livingston, the then American minister to France:

> The cession of Louisiana and the Floridas works most sorely on the United States * * * it completely reverses all the political relations of the United States and will form a new epoch in our political course.

Again—

> In Europe nothing but Europe is seen or supposed to have any right in the affairs of nations; but this little event of France's possessing herself of Louisiana, which is thrown in as a nothing, as a mere make-weight in the general settlement of accounts—this speck which now appears as an almost invisible spot on the horizon—is the embryo of a tornado which will burst on the countries on both sides of the Atlantic and involve in its effects their highest destinies.

In 1898 a Spanish general by the name of Weyler attempted to impose upon the people of Cuba the savage and deathly policy of "reconcentration" of noncombatants. A flame of indignation spread across the country as a result of this barbarism, and when the war was over we came into possession of the Philippines and Hawaii, and the mastery of the Pacific.

In 1914 some Servians killed the heir of Austria. We had no part in the killing, but the whirlwind of calamity which followed it shook our "ship of state" from stem to stern.

On March 9 a man by the name of Villa, with a band of bandits, attacked the American town of Columbus, N. Mex., and to-day our troops are fighting in the neighboring Republic.

If anyone believes that peace or war is entirely of our own making, let him carefully consider these events.

Do you suppose that France would have consented to the purchase of Louisiana by the United States if we had not held the maritime supremacy of the Western Hemisphere, and with Great Britain, of the World? Do you think we could enforce the open door in China and our own exclusion acts at the same time if we did not control the Pacific? Ought we to have arbitrated the oppression of Cuba? Would we permit Great Britain to cede British Columbia to Japan in consideration of her aid in the present war? Let the pacifist answer these questions.

When the Appomattox of the world war has been fought the minds of all men will turn again to arbitration and the peaceful settlement of international disputes. International disputes which do not involve the surrender of the principles of humanity or the integrity and honor of our country may properly be sumbitted to judicial settlement, but let us not forget that civilization has advanced, the weak have been lifted up, and the oppressed succored, because some men have thought enough of the humanities of peace to fight for them; that democracy has been sustained because some men have thought enough of liberty to die for it.

It is the destiny of America to be the custodian of the humanities of peace and the guardian of the freedom of democracy. We shall fall short of that destiny unless we are sufficiently prepared to make our voice heard and respected in the councils of the world. The voice of America is, and will be, for peace, but it is the peace of Switzerland, not the peace of China.

I am not learned in the art of war nor skilled in the technique of national defense. I do not know the number or kind of guns that should be used, the location and nature of the fortifications, the kind and size of the Navy. Expert knowledge and technical skill are not requisite to an adequate conception of our unpreparedness in consideration of our geographical location, our foreign commerce, our insular possessions, and our international importance.

The Statesman's Yearbook contains the following statement with reference to our Army:

> The reserve, or unorganized, militia comprises, with certain exemptions, the whole of the manhood of the Nation between the age of 18 and 45 all being legally liable to serve in a national emergency for a period of two years. Their estimated number is 15,000,000, but they are untrained and of no present value, though encouragement is being given to rifle shooting.
> In event of war the United States could put into the field about 60,000 Regular troops and about 80,000 or 90,000 partially trained National Guard. The American Nation relies on being able to raise, in case of emergency, a great volunteer army. If sufficient numbers were not forthcoming, the reserve militia could be obliged to serve for two years; but this army, whether its ranks were filled by voluntary or compulsory recruitment, would practicably be a new creation.

It would be difficult to put into language a more severe indictment of our military unpreparedness than this unbiased and unpartisan statement.

National preparedness ought not to mean a mere race with the nations of the world in the effort to build the fastest ships, the largest guns, and create the biggest army; but a brief comparison of our military and naval equipment with those of other countries may be enlightening.

In battleships of the dreadnaught and superdreadnaught class we rank third; in battle cruisers, fifth; in cruisers, sixth; in light cruisers, fourth; in destroyers, fifth; in torpedo boats, eighth; and in submarines, third. When the ships now building are completed, in tonnage we will be fourth, Great Britain being first. Germany second, and France third. But the superiority of the British Navy does not rest on either number or tonnage of ships alone. Our largest dreadnaught has a tonnage of 27,500 tons and carries 14-inch guns. Its engines develop 35,000 horsepower, and it has a trial speed of 21 knots. Great Britain has at least six vessels of equal tonnage, carrying 15-inch guns, with 58,000 horsepower, and a speed of at least 25 knots per hour. Germany has at least three dreadnaughts with larger guns and greater speed. The 15-inch guns carried by the British dreadnaughts have a greater range than any of the guns in our coast defenses, with the exception of those at the Panama Canal. As far as I am able to determine, our Navy is excelled in every branch except marksmanship and courage.

France has 60 times as many aeroplanes as the United States, Germany 45 times as many, Russia 35, Great Britain and Austria each 18 times, and Belgium 4½ times as many. On the 1st of July last we had 23 aeroplanes, none of which were armored, and no dirigibles.

At that time France had 20 army corps of 33,000 men each, each corps had 30 batteries of 4 field guns each, or 2,400. In addition, each corps had 6 reenforcing batteries—a total of 2,880 guns. France had also 42 batteries of heavy artillery of 2 guns each.

We had 212 batteries of four guns each in the Regular Army and Organized Militia. We had no heavy artillery. There was a marked deficiency of enlisted men in every branch of the service.

No amount of elaboration of argument could make our deficiency in military preparedness more apparent than this statement.

It is said that we spend more on our Military and Naval Establishments than any other nation except Great Britain, and have less to show for it. I have no doubt the statement is true, but it is no more true than a like statement would be concerning any other of the departments of the Government. The remedy is better administration, not the abandonment of the policy of national preparedness.

If the cost of equipment alone is considered, if the cost of administration and of pay and allowances is eliminated, the comparison would be much less to our disadvantage.

But why should we not appropriate for national defense? We have no other more pressing national need. The children of America are educated as are the children of no other nation on earth. Our highways are fast being brought to a high state of efficiency and usefulness. Our commercial, industrial, agricultural, and political interests are amply provided for. We spend great sums in the improvement of our rivers and harbors. We are the most prosperous Nation in the world. Our people pay less taxes than any other. Why should we not appropriate for that upon which our commerce, our agriculture, our happiness, and our very national existence depends?

I should not be fair to my own convictions if I did not say at this point that my desire for preparedness for national defense would be much more keen if it were not for the feeling that there has been great extravagance and inefficiency in the expenditures heretofore made for that purpose. I shall vote for proper measures for the reorganization of the Army and Navy in the hope that the conditions which have made possible the extravagances and inefficiency in the expenditure of previous appropriations will be eliminated.

If there is one thing more than another which the discussion of this question has established it is that our people will not stand for a large standing army.

The expense of such an army is prohibitive, but it is not principally on this account that our people are opposed to it. They believe that a large standing army is opposed to the spirit of democracy and of our institutions. They regard it as an institution apart from their daily lives and their daily business.

In times of peace such an army would have nothing to do, and ought to have nothing to do. It is a mere burden upon peaceful industry. The ambitions of the professional soldier are not their ambitions; the thoughts of the soldier are not their thoughts; the spirit of the soldier is not their spirit.

They remember that standing armies have often been the instruments of tyranny and oppression, but every thinking man must realize that there must be, somewhere in the country, a force of men sufficiently trained and equipped and sufficiently large to meet any emergency which might arise and to support our position in the councils of the world. They want this force organized in such a way that it will be representative of the thought and the purpose of the whole people. The question is, How can such a force be created which will not be subject to the same objections as a large standing army?

My answer to that question is: Through the public schools of the country.

The history of war demonstrates that the battles have been fought by young men—boys. In a memorandum issued by the Pension Bureau in 1890 it was estimated that the average age of the survivors of the Civil War in 1865 was 28 years. It is probable that the average age at enlistment was around 22. More than one-half must have been under that age.

There are in the high schools of the country 500,000 young men averaging from 14 to 19 years of age. Two hundred thousand enter the high schools of the country every year. These young men could be taught the rudiments of military training, could be improved in physique, could be instructed in the care of themselves, could be taught how to use the instruments of warfare. Think what it would mean to the country to have in the ranks of its citizens millions of men trained to stand erect, trained in discipline, in system, in self-control, in self-reliance, obedience, and loyalty. Think what it would mean when applied to the business life of the Nation.

The training would not be confined to the mere learning of routine drills and the manual of arms. This means simply the going through of stated motions, and becomes irksome with repetition. The ordinary drills would be supplemented by practice marches, range and field work. Training camps could be held during the vacation seasons. The boys would gain knowledge of the roads in their own localities and whence they led, the topography of the country, and its advantages for defense and offense.

It is the purpose of education to develop the young in certain essentials, such as the preservation of health, the building of character, efficiency in fitting the individual for self-support and effective living, the acquiring of knowledge, and acquaintance with environment, and the liberalizing of the mind. I do not wish to be understood as criticizing our educational system, but it seems to me in some essentials insufficient and imperfect—one-sided. Take the average young men of to-day and strip them of the refinements of modern tailoring and it is surprising how many of them are round-shouldered, flat chested, and underdeveloped. It is not their fault, for it is very largely the result of the lack of suitable physical training in the schools. Such consideration as is given to physical training in the schools to-day results in making athletes of a few and hunchbacks of the rest. Military training in the high schools would supply the opportunities for physical development which are now lacking.

The physical, mental, and moral training received by the young men during the high-school period and the cost of this training would not be a dead loss to the country or to the student. It would contribute to his success in civil life.

There is nothing new in the idea of military training in the schools. Washington approved of it; Jefferson advocated it; educators everywhere testify to its effectiveness in character building and in promoting the efficiency and thoroughness of the individual, and their testimony is borne out by the experience of those who have had occasion to employ the graduates of colleges and universities.

Educators, clergymen, social workers, all testify to the need of something in our educational institutions which will lead to a fuller appreciation of civic duty and a greater regard for law and authority, and that the requisite is discipline such as military training affords.

The principal argument urged against military training in the schools is that it would create a spirit of militarism in the country. Military training teaches, among other things, a respect for your own weapons and those of the enemy. It is quite absurd to suppose that a young man who has constantly the opportunity to observe the effect of bullets and exploding shells is going to be consumed with a desire to feel their effect upon his own body.

Militarism is defined as "a system or policy which causes nations to keep up great armies." An army of 500,000 men is not excessive for a nation of a hundred million people, especially if it is only a reserve and built upon democratic lines. The principal menace of militarism lies in the education of men to make war their chief business; in the subordination of the civil life of the people to the military. The pacifist fears that the education of young men in the technique of the soldier will result in a desire to make war his chief business. If I believed that this would be its result, my fear would be as great as that of the most radical pacifist. Its purpose is utterly different, and its history utterly opposed to this fear. Its purpose is not to train men to be soldiers, but to train them so that if they must be soldiers they will be good soldiers, physically able and technically prepared. I shall not "raise my boy to be a soldier," but if my country needs my boy, he will want to go, and I will want him to go [applause], but I want him to be so prepared that his chance will be at least equal to that of his opponent.

Switzerland has had military training in her schools for more than 50 years. Switzerland to-day is the only oasis in the European war desert. The Swiss boy begins his military training when he is 8 years of age. Military knowledge and skill is a result, but physical development is the prime purpose of his instruction. The Swiss Army is approximately twice as large as our available force to-day. A Swiss army corps can be mobilized in three days, with all necessary equipment, transports, and munitions, ready to march against the enemy. I have never seen an estimate of the time required to mobilize our Army and militia, but it is more likely that it would take three weeks than three days. The Swiss soldier costs his Government $35 a year, the American soldier costs his Government twenty-eight times as much as his Swiss comrade.

The cadet corps which I have in mind could be equipped and trained at an expense not very much larger than those in Switzerland.

As a man grows older, as he analyzes his own life and the lives of those about him, as he increasingly sees things in the retrospect from the vantage ground of experience, he realizes that student days are the most impressionable and the most plastic in life. Its friendships are the most lasting and its associations remain the greenest. "I knew him in school" is the strongest claim to intimacy that human language can express. "Just to be a boy again" are the magic words that conjure in the mind days of boundless enthusiasm, limitless imagination, and illimitable hope—days when place and creed, birth and nationality, were all reduced to a common level. There is but one level like unto it in all the world, and that is the level of the soldier. To wear the same uniform, to eat the same food, to endure the common hardships of the march, to lie down at night grateful for the contact with the earth after utter exhaustion, to stand at attention with your comrades as the Star-Spangled Banner is played, when the sunset gun is fired, and the flag comes down, is an experience worth the while of every American. [Applause.] "I didn't raise my boy to be a soldier," but I would not give the hole in a plugged nickel for a boy whose heart did not beat a little faster at the strains of the Star-Spangled Banner and who could not feel the impulse to stand at attention when Old Glory is raised to its "place in the sun." [Applause.] Treasured within its bosom are the memories that men hold dearest. Cherished within its folds are America's glories of the past and her hopes for the future. Beneath its Stars and Stripes democracy must work out her destiny. [Applause.]

We need a national revival—to be baptized with a new national spirit. We need something in our institutions that will annihilate caste and creed, birth and nationality, and amalgamate us into a people with one language and one loyalty. [Applause.] We need to waken to the consciousness that we belong to a Greater America. The world has accorded us a greater place in its councils than we have accorded ourselves. We can not evade the consequences of the world's opinion or escape from the duties which they impose upon us. The conscience of America must have a part in the molding of the designs of civilization, must have a voice in determining the rules of the game. The world looks to America for the perpetuation of the ideals and the institutions of democracy. To this end we must be prepared. [Applause.]

Mr. KAHN. I yield 12 minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. FREAR].

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Chairman, the bill before us presents a reorganization of the Army. A world-wide war with difficulties along the Mexican border brings the subject of adequate defense close home. The country will not hesitate to pay the bill providing value received is rendered, but on the other hand it is not ready to accept every visionary scheme that masquerades under the cloak of "preparedness."

Possibly it may be gratuitious to suggest a self-evident truth, but every sincere friend of real defense, of honest dealings in public affairs, and of proper governmental business methods, will look with suspicion on questionable provisions contained in any bill, whatever may be its announced purpose.

I do not intend to discuss the bill as a whole, nor in anything I may say is criticism of the committee intended, but it is proper to suggest that out of 85 sections in the bill, containing over 2,160 printed lines, an insignificant item of only five lines, known as "Section 82," deserves the closest scrutiny.

It reads as follows:

That to provide for the fixation of atmospheric nitrogen by the development of water power, or any other means, necessary to establish an adequate supply of nitrogen, the appropriation of such sum or sums of money to construct the necessary plant for such purpose is hereby authorized.

That is the entire section—all that is contained on the subject in the 91-page bill. No limitation in amount, location, or general character is provided in section 82, although the Secretary of War is to make a selection of location, determine the expense and general character of the "plant." No armor plate factories, no gun factories, no munition factories, no new arsenals, or other "plants" are mentioned in the bill, but Congress is asked to delegate to the Secretary of War, and through him, subordinate Army Engineers are to exercise a predetermined expenditures of $24,000,000 on the Alabama Power Co.'s holdings at Muscle Shoals in the Tennessee River.

NAVIGATION, FIXATION, AND FERTILIZATION.

Why was section 82 slipped into the Army bill after it had been proposed in the naval bill? Why has the Alabama Power Co. urged that its project be inserted in the agricultural bill after it was refused consideration by the river and harbor bill?

The amount demanded by the Alabama Power Co. from the Government is substantially the same in every case, but in the river and harbor bill it is to aid invisible "navigation"; in the agricultural bill it is a "fertilizing" project that needs Government aid, and when it fails to command acceptance on either ground we find the "plant" anchored in the Army bill on the ground of "preparedness."

Incidentally the Alabama Power Co. is now "preparing" to sell $100,000,000 in bonds, according to its own statement, and apparently the Government is being used to finance the company's projects and to give a certificate of good character to its new bond issue. I do not desire to do anyone injustice, but will present some facts which, I believe, are worthy of consideration.

Attached as exhibits to my remarks will be found abundant evidence to support the assertions made as to the primary purpose, location chosen, amount to be expended, and methods employed to secure $24,000,000 from the Federal Treasury under the innocent-appearing 5-line section that will cost the Government over $4,000,000 per line. At this time I will briefly refer to some insignificant facts which invite the close attention of the House.

The Military Committee's report contains 14 pages, apart from statistical tables. One-third of the report in fine print is devoted to evidence given by Mr. Frank S. Washburn before the committee, and, strange to relate, out of a 14-page report devoted to a 2,160-line military bill, one-third of the report contains Mr. Washburn's rosy essay on fixation of atmospheric nitrogen and relates to the 5 lines contained in section 82.

Nothing appears to indicate what confidence may be placed in Washburn's statements. Nothing appears to show who Mr. Washburn claims to be, although 4 pages of a treatise by Mr. Washburn alone is offered in justification of this remarkable section 82.

In view of the fact that no information is vouchsafed by the committee on the subject and because Mr. Washburn and his associate, Mr. Worthington, have been in attendance before committees for many months in a patriotic effort to promote navigation, fertilization, and fixation of Government preparedness appropriations at Muscle Shoals, I will supply some significant facts as to their deep interest, taken from Moody's Manual for 1915; but first I desire to discuss briefly a subject on which Mr. Washburn claims to be an expert and of which I have no technical knowledge—one vitally connected with section 82 and the proposed $24,000,000 Government expenditure.

WHY GIVE $24,000,000 TO MR. WASHBURN'S FERTILIZING EXPERIMENT?

Mr. Washburn is the authority quoted by the committee in its justification for section 82. On his unsupported word Congress is asked to authorize an expenditure of $24,000,000 with which to go in partnership with Mr. Washburn's company. In the committee report he learnedly discusses his fixation process, and, based upon his argument and his judgment as set forth in the committee report, the Government is now prepared to make great investments as proposed by section 82.

Mr. Washburn's hypnotic influence has apparently convinced the committee of the great value of his proposition, but before discussing its merits I refer briefly to his proposal, found on page 13 of the report. Therein he speaks as president of the American Cyanamid Co. and discusses the fixation process with apparent candor. He also has some equally positive ideas on the cooperative plan, and, quoting from his proposal:

> The total initial investment under the cooperative plan is, therefore, $48,000,000, of which the Government expends in power development $21,000,000, receiving 3 per cent per annum thereon, the ownership of which development it retains and an "idle investment of $3,000,000."

Apparently the Government is expected to invest $24,000,000 in cash, possibly all of which is an "idle investment." Mr. Washburn's proposed investment will be discussed hereafter.

What do we know of Mr. Washburn's proposition, business experience, judgment, or purposes? He has injected himself into the proposition, so that its merits must necessarily stand or fall on the value of his own statements. I well remember when Army engineers were first criticized for waterway waste last session, I was warmly abused for my temerity in questioning their judgment, but cumulative testimony has been piled up, based on their admissions, proving beyond question the truth of those criticisms. It requires equal temerity to question the utterances of a great promoter who represents a new process for fertilizing, as well as a number of companies that are willing to undertake the business when financed by the Government, but I desire to offer some significant expert opinions on the same subject which Mr. Washburn failed to present to the Military Committee.

On March 12, 1915, or about a year ago, Mr. Washburn read a paper on the cyanamid process before the American Institute of Electrical Engineers and the New York Section of the American Electro Chemical Society. If time permitted I should be glad to quote some significant statements appearing in his paper, but I will only give a few words of criticism which come from men of the highest standing in the country—men whose opinions are well worth considering—before we blindly join partnership with Mr. Washburn and Mr. Worthington in a $48,000,000 project, of which the Government will furnish $24,000,000 in cash to offset an indefinite investment by the Government's partner, as will later appear.

EXPERT OPINIONS OPPOSING MR. WASHBURN'S CYANAMID SCHEME.

At the meeting of the Electro Chemical Society, Mr. Leland L. Sommers, an expert of high authority on fixation of atmospheric nitrogen, discussed the same subject at the same meeting, and said pointedly in criticizing Mr. Washburn's cyanamid paper:

> Personally I do not accept the unqualified statement in regard to the success of the cyanamid process that Mr. Washburn puts forth, because, while it has been successful, I do not think that engineers by any means accept it as the final word in nitrogen fixation.

Criticisms of Mr. Washburn's paper were pointed, and Mr. Sommers's knowledge on the subject of atmospheric nitrogen may be inferred from a technical paper of 40 pages on that identical subject offered at the same time. His paper did not occasion any criticism, although the Washburn paper was not so fortunate.

Dr. C. W. Bennett, who is one of the membership committee of the organization, a man of standing in his profession, said of the Washburn paper:

> No one denies that the preparation of cyanamid is the cheapest working process for the fixation of nitrogen. Nitrogen from cyanamid, however, is not as cheap as nitrogen from other sources. We must all admit that by-product ammonia can be placed on the market as ammonium sulphate at a profit for very much less, approximately one-fourth the selling price of cyanamid. This industry as is pointed out in another communication, is increasing steadily in this country and in others, and it will take the development of only a few other by-products to enormously increase the output of by-product ammonia. * * * No process in operation to-day for the fixation of nitrogen, as has been pointed out a number of times, can hope to compete with by-product ammonia. In drawing conclusions we can not compare alone the processes for the fixation of nitrogen, but we must also compare the price of the product in question, prepared from other sources, because the final user does not care whether his ammonia comes from the distillation of coal or from atmospheric nitrogen.

Mr. Bennett asserts that by-product of ammonia can be sold at a profit for approximately one-quarter the selling price of cyanamid. If he is right, it will be a congressional scandal to give $24,000,000 for that purpose.

Mr. Sommers says, in his comprehensive paper on Fixation of Atmospheric Nitrogen:

> It would be hopeless to attempt to put this acid (derived from fixation of atmospheric nitrogen) into a product to compete with fertilizer prices, for they are some 50 per cent lower. * * * It is useless to look only to cheap power as a solution of this problem, as the real solution is in the improvement of processes (p. 373).

Commenting upon Mr. Sommers's paper, which appeared simultaneously with Mr. Washburn's effort, Dr. L. H. Baekeland said:

USELESS EXPENSE IN MARKETING, NOT MANUFACTURING.

> We have heard the statement that in many cases it is more expensive to buy fertilizer than to have a low yield per acre. This is very true; and if the price of fertilizer gets too high, a low yield per acre becomes practically unavoidable. Unfortunately, in this country we are almost everywhere confronted with the detrimental economic condition of too many middlemen. * * * The time will come * * * when you will no longer speak about an excess of ammonia production in gas or coke ovens. There will not be such a thing as excess of ammonia. All ammonia will be saved.

Mr. Baekeland does not suggest the cyanamid process as having any bearing on the fertilizer or nitric-acid supply in this country, but he does suggest a situation which Mr. Washburn does not offer to meet—a reduction in the cost of fertilizer to the consumer through the elimination of too many middlemen. The Washburn Co., if it can profitably produce commercial fertilizer, will get all that the public will pay without any limit to unconscionable exactions, although financed by the Government.

I quote his words, because in the World's Work for March we are informed Dr. Baekeland was given the highest honors that could be conferred by the societies of which he is a distinguished member, an award of the Perken medal for eminence of industrial chemical research.

It is a matter of surprise that the Military Committee did not call some of the experts of world-wide fame whom I am mentioning, but, on the contrary, has placed entire reliance on the testimony of Mr. Washburn, who has $24,000,000 at stake, to be given his company by the Government.

THE BEST TESTIMONY OBTAINABLE ON MR. WASHBURN'S SCHEME.

During this same discussion of Mr. Washburn's paper by experts, the secretary of the society, Joseph W. Richards, significantly said:

> Mr. Landis, chief technologist of the American Cyanamid Co. (Mr. Washburn's), has said that his company confidently expects radical changes in nitrogen fixation processes in the next 5 or 10 years, and that it is prepared, if necessary, to scrap its whole plant inside of 20 years, thinking there might very possibly be no cyanamid process in use at that time (p. 405).

Mr. Richards is a man of high standing, and his statement based upon the chief technologist of Mr. Washburn's own company appears to have gone unanswered.

These are not expert opinions from Army engineers regarding commercial possibilities at Muscle Shoals, but expert opinions from the highest class of electrochemical engineers in the country who confidently predict that within 20 years Mr. Washburn's own company may scrap its cyanamid factory.

Other significant statements were made at the same meeting, but I will only read one further opinion which, however, is significant. Dr. Sumners, from whom I have quoted, and who appears to be a high authority on the subject, says of Dr. S. Peacock, on page 412 of the discussion:

> Dr. Peacock's paper is very much to the point. Undoubtedly you all know that Dr. Peacock is one of the best authorities in America on fertilizer * * * is thoroughly familiar with everything that has been connected with the use of nitrogen in fertilizers.

This high praise from a high authority is prefixed to Dr. Peacock's statement, which appears in his own paper on page 410, as follows:

> As a commercial undertaking, nitrogen fixation must remain substantially dormant so long as the ammonia produced as a by-product of coal distillation remains of such relative amount that it is capable of controlling the rewards of capital invested in nitrogen fixation. It may be accepted as a fact that no nitrogen fixation method has as yet been publicly proposed which can produce nitrogen as cheaply as coal by-product of ammonia.

Reduced to a bald business statement, Dr. Peacock says that no man with good business judgment would invest in any nitrogen fixation proposition unless he expects to lose his investment. That appears to be the reason why Mr. Washburn is unable to finance his project with private capital. Dr. Peacock's paper was read immediately following Mr. Washburn's paper. Peacock is a recognized expert whose statement was not challenged, whereas Mr. Washburn's rainbow-colored statements were repeatedly criticized and appear to conflict with inexorable facts. The Government is interested in providing its own explosives, but it should bear in mind that in a matter in which Mr. Washburn is vitally concerned, and which is of doubtful value, it may be well first to ascertain the business interests and experience which entitle him to our confidence.

MR. WASHBURN TOO BUSY TO BECOME AN EXPERT.

I have discussed briefly Mr. Washburn's project. Let us now inquire as to his business connections. Mr. Frank S. Washburn is chairman of the board of directors of the Alabama Power Co., of which company Mr. J. W. Worthington is a director. From Moody's Manual it appears the Alabama Power Co., by a process of benevolent assimilation, has taken over the Alabama Electric Co., the Wetumpka Power Co., the Alabama Power & Electric Co., the Alabama Power Development Co., the Huntsville Railway, Light & Power Co., the Decatur Light, Power & Fuel Co., the Etowah Light & Power Co., the Bell City Light & Power Co., and possibly some other smaller companies.

Mr. Frank S. Washburn is also president, vice president, or director in the Birmingham, Montgomery & Gulf Power Co.; the Anniston Electric & Gas Co.; the Little River Power Co.; the Muscle Shoals Hydro Electric Power Co.; the Alabama Traction, Light & Power Co.; the Alabama Interstate Power Co., and possibly other companies, most of which are located in Alabama or Canada.

Mr. J. W. Worthington also appears as an officer or director in many of the companies named, which have a combined authorized capitalization aggregating about $70,000,000. Mr. Washburn is also president of the American Cyanamid Co., organized nine years ago, that has an authorized capital of $8,000,000 and is operating a fertilizer factory at Niagara Falls, Ontario, Canada. This factory produced 37,586 tons of fertilizer in 1914. It is further stated dividends on preferred stock of $3,258,600 are regularly paid semiannually, but whether from profits or stock sales does not appear.

An interesting balance sheet appears on page 2044 of Moody's Manual for 1914. Assets are scheduled as follows:

Land, buildings, and equipment	$2,218,347
Bills and accounts receivable	19,263
Cash	75,218
Inventories	450,515
License patents and patent rights	3,569,578
Founding and propaganda	230,589
Total	6,563,510

FIFTY-EIGHT PER CENT OF ASSETS IN PROPAGANDA AND PATENT RIGHTS.

By a strange oversight no balance sheet appears for the many other companies with which Mr. Washburn is connected. Because of this silence, unusual among corporations quoted in Moody's Manual, we must analyze the one balance sheet submitted in seeking information as to financial methods and management of a concern with which the United States is asked to form a partnership. The American Cyanamid Co. places its total assets for 1914 at $6,563,510, of which amount $3,569,578, or more than half of the total, is listed for license patents and patent rights. Another item is $230,589 of assets noted as "founding and propaganda."

Possibly we may look with doubt upon any company that seeks to join partnership with the United States, whose assets rated as propaganda and patent rights reach over 58 per cent of its entire assets. We may also properly inquire what method of valuation is employed in making up the rest of this remarkable balance sheet.

Just what reliance should be placed upon such a showing is a matter of individual opinion, but what of the Muscle Shoals Co. and the Alabama Power Co. and all the other affiliated Washburn concerns which fail to file any public statement with the great financial authority from which I have quoted. Reputable concerns inspire respect by taking the public into their confidence, but this record is offered by a concern or concerns with which Army engineers have recommended we join partnership and which we are expected to finance with $24,000,000 of Government funds.

A WATER-POWER MONOPOLY WANTS $24,000,000 OF GOVERNMENT HELP.

Apart from the fact that the Alabama Power Co., of which Mr. Washburn is chairman, is credited with owning or controlling 96 per cent of all water powers in Alabama, we find the following statement of water-power sites owned by this one company, according to one of its prospectuses, a copy of which has been given me:

	Horsepower.
Coosa River, Lock 7	45,000
Coosa River, Lock 12	105,000
Coosa River, Lock 14	100,000
Coosa River, Lock 15	80,000
Coosa River, Lock 18	100,000
Tallapoosa River	115,000
Muscle Shoals on Tennessee	400,000
Saulty Creek	6,000
Town Creek	7,000
Little Creek	52,000
Choccolocco Creek	2,000
Total	1,012,000

From the highest authority, we have the connections of both Mr. Washburn and Mr. Worthington, and from the prospectus of one company we learn that they control over 1,000,000 horsepower in Alabama and Georgia. From official records we learn that, ably supported by Army engineers, the Muscle Shoals proposition has been forced upon the attention of three or four different committees of the House, and for those who care to follow its methods, attention is invited to page 3685 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of March 7, from which it appears that the same project is well intrenched in the hearts of the people composing part of another legislative body. In other words, Congress is informed that we must take over Muscle Shoals; that it has us going and coming. Presumably, $230,589, spent by one company for propaganda in urging its claims on public notice, has not been spent in vain. How much more has been spent for propaganda it would be interesting to know.

It may also be surmised that $230,589 spent for propaganda has to its credit Alabama laws containing certain exemptions from taxation for the company which are not enjoyed by war-tax ridden citizens, taxpayers who are asked to contribute $24,000,000 to the Alabama Power Co. on the advice of Army engineers. That company has the right of eminent domain under the law, a right to condemn and destroy the properties of smaller competitors whenever it sees fit to do so. It is supreme in Alabama and has strong connections on surrounding States. It has champions in Congress, who have advocated an $18,700,000 appropriation for this company in the past and now present an old friend in a brand new $24,000,000 suit of fixation pattern to replace the discarded $18,700,000 navigation garb of last year.

I have briefly presented some facts regarding a company whose president lists 58 per cent of the company assets under the items "propaganda" and "patents." These matters presumably are to be passed upon by Army engineers representing the Secretary of War. In order to determine the value of their judgment I will revert briefly to recent history connected with this same Muscle Shoals project when garbed in a peek-a-boo "navigation" waste.

Before doing so an interesting coincidence may be mentioned. I have not questioned the motives or good intentions of the committee in authorizing the Government to finance the concerns represented by Mr. Washburn and Mr. Worthington, which will give some standing to the $100,000,000 stock-selling operations they are promoting. I believe the committee has been misled by the "preparedness" argument that already covers a multitude of questionable proposals.

A PROMISING FERTILIZER MONOPOLY.

To those of an investigating turn of mind, however, I call attention to the fact that the great Duke interests are reported to control the best phosphate fields in this country. The Ammo-Phos. Corporation is a great fertilizer company capitalized at $6,000,000 organized less than six months ago, with J. B. Duke chairman of the board of directors. Mr. Duke was formerly president and one of the organizers of the American Tobacco Trust. Mr. Washburn has stated that the most important single contribution toward a high-grade fertilizer "would be a high-grade chemical salt containing nitrogen and phosphorus." "The process for the fixation of atmospheric nitrogen will contribute the nitrogen content to such a fertilizer compound."

With this state of facts, what a complete fertilizer monopoly might be brought about, providing the Duke phosphate and Washburn water-power interests joined forces and were financed by the Government.

If the technologist for Mr. Washburn's company is right in saying the cyanamid business may be scrapped and out of business soon, the project will not be a serious menace to agricultural interests of the country; but to show that every contingency may have been provided for I call attention to the fact that Mr. K. F. Cooper, who is vice president of the $6,000,000 Duke fertilizer company, recently organized, is by a singular circumstance general manager of the American Cyanamid Co., of which Mr. Washburn is president, according to the Engineering News, volume 73, No. 1, page 21. More interesting information might be afforded on the same subject if time permitted.

MUSCLE SHOALS IN A NEW GARB.

Section 82 does not state the amount or location of the proposed "fixation" factory, but every member of the Military Committee familiar with the statements of Mr. Washburn and Maj. Burgess before that committee understands that Muscle Shoals on the Tennessee River is the location desired. Burgess said substantially he did not know anything about water powers on the Columbia River or elsewhere that would be as suitable as Muscle Shoals. He further stated that it would cost the Government $14,500,000 for a plant and dam 100 feet high. This is not the whole project planned by Washburn, but is part of it, and Maj. Burgess admits, page 44 of his testimony, his proposition would prevent navigation between the upper and lower river, but as he naively says of this waterway, it is only navigable at this point "for about six months in the year."

A fairly clear statement of Muscle Shoals appears on pages 1137 and 1142, inclusive, of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD for January 13 of this year. The facts there presented will be reverted to because they disclose the methods of the Alabama Power Co. and the harmony of action among our Army engineers.

Muscle Shoals is a short stretch of the Tennessee River that was originally unnavigable. The United States Government gave a land grant of 400,000 acres of land to Alabama for a fund with which to build a canal and improve two rapids on the Tennessee River of which Muscle Shoals was one.

Alabama soon gave up the proposition but not the land grant, and then the Government undertook the contract of improving navigation at that point by building a canal upon which we have thus far spent $4,550,000 for "navigation." In 1913 the total commerce reached less than 6,000 tons, or about two train loads. Every ton of freight floated through the canal cost the Government $40, according to calculations based on interest and maintenance.

A number of years ago the Alabama Power Co. bought up parcels of land along the river and secured all the available water-power sites. After the laws of Alabama were adjusted to relieve the company of taxes the company with its peculiar methods of propaganda started to have the Government build a 150-foot dam or two dams totaling 150 feet for "navigation" in order to develop the water power for the use of the company. A brief history of the effort is contained in Committee Document 20, Sixty-third Congress, last session.

As Army engineers are to determine the location of the fixation factory after the manner proposed by Maj. Burgess, I desire to further give a brief insight into the methods of the engineers as disclosed by Document No. 20, which was prepared by the Chief of Engineers for the guidance of Congress.

THE BUSINESS JUDGMENT OF ARMY ENGINEERS.

Briefly, the proposition was for the Government to appropriate $8,575,000 for two dams 150 feet high for navigation. Then it was to pay $1,750,000 additional for flowage rights, and then $8,325,000 more was to be loaned to the Alabama Power Co. at 3 per cent for 100 years to be repaid in installments. Eighteen million seven hundred thousand dollars in all was to be paid by the Government.

That is what Army engineers recommended. Scandalous? Yes; and unbusinesslike; but that is the proposal at Muscle Shoals for "navigation" in 1915.

Col. Riché would not stand for the flowage gift and he says in Document No. 20—

I recommend all lands and easements be donated to the United States and do not fear delay will result in loss to the United States or prevent the improvement of Muscle Shoals.

In this he was overruled by the board of which Col. Black, the present Chief of Engineers, was chairman. Col. Black signed a report for the board in which he said that to await donations of flowage rights—would doubtless lead to considerable delay and would be apt to defeat the present opportunity to make this improvement in favorable terms.

Col. Black wrote the report proposing a donation of $1,750,000 to the power company for flowage rights after Riché had protested against its payment. Col. Black is the engineer who reversed Deakyne and Townsend on the Missouri River $20,000,000 wasteful project.

CONGRESS TO DELEGATE POWER TO COL. BLACK.

Col. (now Gen.) Black is the present Chief of Engineers called upon to determine the merits of this fixation proposition. Last year he recommended $18,700,000 for Muscle Shoals, $10,325,000 of which was for 150-foot dams for navigation to accommodate 6,000 tons of commerce. This year he is to decide the fixation preparedness Alabama Power Co.'s proposal. Is Congress ready to delegate this power to Col. Black. Last year I proposed an investigation of the Muscle Shoals project, which is indefensible; but it is no worse than this new nitrogen-fixation craze, which appears to be the result of a carefully prepared propaganda sprung at the psychological moment, having for its ultimate aim the development of Muscle Shoals by the Government for the benefit of the Alabama Power Co.

Last session a preliminary Muscle Shoals item was placed in the rivers and harbors 1915 bill just before its introduction on the floor of the House. The item was stricken from the bill after a hard fight on the floor. It was then reinserted when the bill was reported to the Senate, but the bill was defeated in the Senate. Then the Army engineers, under a supposed reexamination of the river for which no specific appropriation was made, spent, according to press reports, $90,000 more at this same point.

At the beginning of this session the Muscle Shoals item bobbed up before the Rivers and Harbors Committee, but was refused a place for "navigation." Word was then circulated that it would be placed in one of the preparedness bills—and it is here.

Discredited as a navigation proposal it yet had the indorsement of Army engineers. Recommended for a nitrogen-fixation project it surely has their approval, because they recommended a partnership with the Alabama company in Document No. 20. If it should fail to meet with the approval of Congress, notwithstanding the engineers' O. K., it may yet be inserted in the Agricultural bill as a fertilization proposition that will give untold (?) benefit to the agricultural interests of the country.

I have many communications relative to the lobby methods pursued, and connecting this lobby with the recent water-power bill passed in another body. I have also communications relating to the stock-selling end of this $100,000,000 company, but will not discuss that phase of the question.

SECTION 82 SHOULD BE STRICKEN FROM THE BILL.

These may be attached as exhibits but have no part in this statement of facts. I have briefly shown that Mr. Washburn, who represents many companies, has endeavored to float his project at Government expense. That it is not a safe proposal to undertake, according to the ablest electrochemical men in the country. These men, who have no interest in the action of Congress, state unanimously that the Washburn cyanamid process can not compete with the by-product of coal process. They quote the expert of Mr. Washburn's company as admitting that the cyanamid process may be "scrapped" and out of business in a few years. Not one of the engineers indorsed Mr. Washburn's glowing statements, according to the Electro Chemical Society's official record, and, strange to say, Mr. Washburn has never replied to them, so far as that record discloses. His own interest in the result has been manifest for years. He controls over 1,000,000 horsepower. It is a proper case for private enterprise, but to ask the Government to go into a foolhardy proposition condemned by experts familiar with the subject is to perpetrate waste and inefficient business methods as discreditable as those which have been followed in our river and harbor legislation. And by a singular coincidence Army engineers are depended upon in both instances to put over the proposal.

GOVERNMENT MANUFACTURE OF NITRATE.

Let the Government manufacture its own explosives if desired. Whether by the coal-extraction process or by air-fixation process should be determined only after careful investigation. To give the Secretary of War power to decide, and to place that discretionary power in the hands of the Army engineers, is foolhardy and unbusinesslike in the extreme.

If need be, let us condemn and take over private water powers wherever located as a military necessity, leaving the owners to their recovery in the Court of Claims. That would avoid the hold-up proceeding which will certainly result under the provisions of section 82.

I do not believe the country is in a mood to accept any pork-barrel proposal in the preparedness bill. Scandal is sure to attach to any political party espousing such an indefensible proposal.

Those who advocate Government manufacture of war supplies have ground on which to stand, and those who advocate permitting private parties of known business experience and standing to furnish part of our war supplies may also find justification for such course, but no excuse can be offered for a proposal which requires the Government to finance a proposition for a private company with practically certain disaster to the venture—a vicious proposition which the Government can finance only through war taxes levied upon the people.

No more astounding delegation of authority was ever proposed in Congress under any administration than this unlimited authorization for a proposed expenditure of $24,000,000 by the Government at Muscle Shoals, in partnership with companies that list over one-half of their assets as patent rights and propaganda in the proposed partnership, and many list water-power privileges and patent rights in this new arrangement at any amount acceptable to the Army engineers, who at the last session agreed that over $10,000,000 should be credited under the head of "Navigation"; with companies that are trying at the present time at both ends of the Capitol to get $20,000,000 or more from the Government through the Agricultural, river and harbor, and preparedness bills; with companies that, when squarely defeated on this floor, are endeavoring to insert their proposals in the Agricultural bill now before another body, with the hope that throught conference their vicious proposal may become law at this session; with companies that are primarily speculative promotion enterprises, according to the judgment of experts whose opinions I have quoted. Section 82 is an effort to put through Congress a proposal that will not stand the light of publicity and should be stricken from the bill.

ONE HUNDRED MILLION DOLLAR BOND ISSUE ARRANGED BY ALABAMA POWER CO.—HYDROELECTRIC PLANT ON COOSA RIVER TO BE DOUBLED IN CAPACITY AT ONCE AND LARGE STEAM PLANT BUILT—FUTURE PLANS OUTLINED.

The Alabama Power Co. has arranged to spend $100,000,000 in carrying out its plans for great hydroelectric developments in the middle South. A loan has been secured through the placing of bonds for the large amount named.

Expenditures will be made throughout a term of years.

About $4,000,000 will be used at once in more than doubling the company's present units of hydroelectric development on the Coosa River, near Birmingham; also in the construction of an auxiliary steam plant in the Birmingham district, possibly on the Warrior River.

Writing to the Manufacturers' Record of the company's plans, Mr. James Mitchell, president of the Alabama company, New York, under date of March 4, makes announcements as follows:

"This company is now providing for a bond issue to be limited to $100,000,000, of which $4,000,000 has been placed for immediate needs, and further amounts can be issued when and as required.

"Contracts have been placed for a new hydroelectric unit at the Lock 12 plant on the Coosa River. This unit will be about 20,000 horsepower, or slightly larger than the original units.

"Plans are now being worked out for the installation of a 20,000-kilowatt steam plant, which is necessary to safeguard the company's power supply in times of extreme drought. Contracts have not yet been placed for this plant, but will be placed during the coming week. The site has not been definitely selected, but there are many opportunities to place such a plant along the Black Warrior River basin, where coal can be cheaply obtained from numerous mines, so the choice of location is not a matter of immediate moment.

"The company plans extension of its transmission lines in a number of directions and intends to be ready at all times to meet the demands of the community it serves."

In connection with the occasion for employing the $96,000,000, not covered by immediate plans, it is stated that "the Alabama Co.'s ultimate development in Alabama is predicated upon legislation regarding power sites now sought in Washington and bears special reference to the use of Muscle Shoals. The large water-power site owners of the country are pressing certain legislation which is being as stoutly resisted by others who claim that too much encroachment upon the rights of the public is contemplated in the form in which the power-site owners desire this legislation. The use of the remainder of the $100,000,000 available bears relation to the ultimate future and the possibilities of favorable legislation."

NITROGEN FROM AIR READY FOR MARKET—JAMES B. DUKE ANNOUNCES COMPANY WILL TURN OUT 4 TONS OF NITRIC ACID DAILY—PRICES TO BE MUCH LOWER—SOUTHERN ELECTRO-CHEMICAL AND OTHER CONCERNS HAVE BEEN EXPERIMENTING FOR MONTHS.

Nitric acid obtained by extracting nitrogen from the air will be put on the market next Saturday by the Southern Electro-Chemical Co., according to James B. Duke, one of its officers.

This announcement follows close upon the recommendation of Brig. Gen. William M. Crozier, Chief of Ordnance of the United States Army, who in his annual report published yesterday urged that the Nation take steps to be independent of the Chilean beds for the nitrates used in making gunpowder.

The Southern Electro-Chemical Co. and several other corporations have been experimenting for months upon foreign processes for the derivation of nitrogen in an inexpensive way from the realm of cloudland.

Mr. Duke's company expects to turn out 4 tons of nitric acid a day from its works at Great Falls, S. C., about 50 miles from Charlotte, and to deliver it at a lower price than that charged for acid made by the present commercial processes.

The chemical will be produced on a much larger scale if the great problem of getting water power cheap enough can be solved. As set forth by Gen. Crozier, the production of nitrates by these new methods depends upon abundant streams and numerous falls.

The work will very likely be carried on in Canada by the Quebec Development Co. (Ltd.), of which Mr. Duke is the president. This company has been acquiring extensive water-power rights in the neighborhood of Lake St. John, and will have works on the Saguenay River. Mr. Duke has operated in this region before, and in June of 1914 a dispute rose between him and officials of the Interstate Chemical Corporation over a process for the making of phosphates and certain power rights. At that time a suit for $8,000,000 was brought against him by persons who feared that they might be ousted. * * * Several chemists in this city consider the recommendation of Gen. Crozier a practical one, and they see no reason why the Government, by arranging for cheap power, could not foster the "industry of turning the very air to gold in times of peace and ammunition in days of war."

If some kind friend will only state Mr. Duke's predicament as to the "great problem of getting water power cheap enough" to Mr. K. F. Cooper, the vice president of Mr. Duke's $6,000,000 company, so that he can take the matter up in a friendly spirit with Mr. K. F. Cooper, general manager of Mr. Washburn's $8,000,000 cyanamid company, possibly a solution of the difficulty may be reached.

[From Manufacturers' Record, Mar. 9, 1916.]

GOVERNMENT ALIVE TO NECESSITY FOR NITRATE PLANT SOUTH—PLANS POINT TO DEVELOPMENT OF GREAT HYDROELECTRIC DEVELOPMENT AT MUSCLE SHOALS IN THE TENNESSEE RIVER.

WASHINGTON, D. C., March 7, 1916.

In the Army appropriation bill recently reported to the House recommendation was made that there be established a large nitrate factory, to be operated jointly by the United States Government and private interests, for the manufacture of fertilizer in time of peace and nitrates for explosives in case of war. While no site is specified in the bill, the statement has been made by members of the Military Affairs Committee that the board would naturally consider the vast water-power projects on the Tennessee River. The greatest of these is at Muscle Shoals.

The power for the nitrate factory would, of course, be furnished by water power, and a considerable expenditure will be necessary for the improvement of Muscle Shoals. * * *

At the last session of Congress the United States Army engineers recommended to the Rivers and Harbors Committee the adoption of a project which provides for three dams at Muscle Shoals, two to be power dams: Dam No. A, with a height of 102 feet and a length of 4,450 feet, requiring 1,304,700 cubic yards of cement, and Dam No. 3, with a height of 48 feet and a length of 6,285 feet, requiring 488,500 cubic yards of concrete. When these dams are constructed, they will furnish open-river slack-water navigation for nearly 100 miles on the Tennessee River itself, and improve navigation of two tributaries of the Tennessee River, namely, Elk River for 30 miles and Shoal Creek for 20 miles, making a total improvement on the Tennessee River and its tributaries of nearly 150 miles. * * *

And now, fortunately for the taxpayers of the country, and luckily for the development of the natural resources and commerce in the vast drainage area of the Tennessee River, the costly navigation improvement of the Muscle Shoals stretch of the Tennessee River can be accomplished under a plan by which, "through the development of water power, the United States Government is repaid all of its expenditures for navigation and water-power development, and becomes the sole possessor of all the things for which that expenditure was made." * * *

The accomplishment of the Muscle Shoals project will mean the manufacture of ammonium phosphate, using the phosphate rock from the phosphate fields of Tennessee near by Muscle Shoals, in combination with cyanamid. Ammonium phosphate contains about five times as much plant food as the ordinary fertilizer, making it correspondingly cheaper to handle, bag, ship, and transfer from the point of manufacture to the farmer.

FLORENCE RAISES $10,000 FOR SHOALS—CITIZENS CONTRIBUTE LIBERALLY FOR BIG DEVELOPMENT PROJECT.

FLORENCE, ALA., March 9.

That Florentines have unlimited faith in Muscle Shoals development was conclusively proven at a mass meeting held in the courthouse at Florence last night when the circuit court room was taxed to its capacity.

The Muscle Shoals finance committee asked for $2,500, which was subscribed as fast as the secretaries, H. A. Bradshaw and W. H. Mitchell, could take take the names of the contributors. This brought the Florence donation for the furtherance of the Muscle Shoals development up to $10,000 during the last few months. This money is being used to defray the expenses of those actively engaged in the oversight of the public's interest in this all-important project.

R. T. Simpson, president of the commercial club, introduced Col. C. W. Ashcraft, who said people from one end of this country to the other are talking Muscle Shoals. Instead of impoverishing other sections, as is often the case in big enterprises, our progress in the Muscle Shoals development is the progress of every section of the United States. It stands head and shoulders above everything else in Washington. Many of the important congressional committees are considering it simultaneously.

The speaker complimented the Shields bill and said it removes obstacles that have heretofore existed. He declared our "preparedness" is our salvation. The surveys and plans for Muscle Shoals development are made, and it stands 999 chances out of 1,000 to be selected as the site of a Government nitrate plant.

Mr. N. C. Elting, chairman of the finance committee, said: "I presume every man, woman, and child in Lauderdale country is for preparedness. If all had been prepared, the fearful war now raging would never have been." He said the conditions relative to Muscle Shoals are indeed optimistic. He read the following telegrams from Washington:

WASHINGTON, D. C., March 7.

N. C. ELTING, Florence, Ala.:

Will you please extend my thanks and hearty feeling of congratulations and encouragement to the courageous, upstanding, constructive people of Florence, and tell them that the bill introduced in the House by the Military Committee authorizing the development of water power and construction of atmospheric nitrogen nitric-acid plants, and Chairman HAY, in his report on the bill, in part says:

"The committee consider this question of the first importance in the consideration of preparedness for national security." Our efforts supported by the lead of Florence secured the authorization for the proposed development, and if Florence will stand pat, put up and see us through, we will get these plants. The total development with fertilizer plants established to cost $50,000,000.

J. W. WORTHINGTON.

WASHINGTON, March 7, 1916.

N. C. ELTING, Florence, Ala.

Vote on Shields bill will not be taken until to-morrow and probably not until Thursday. Its passage is conceded.

J. W. WORTHINGTON.

And thereby hangs a tale. Is it not an astounding situation that committees at both ends of the Capitol are called upon to appropriate from $20,000,000 to $24,000,000 of Government funds to help out the Alabama Water Power Co., in the rivers and harbors bill, for "navigation"; or to provide in the Agricultural bill for a "fertilizing factory"; or in the military bill for "explosives"? Will the item get through Congress by some parliamentary juggle? I have given facts that deserve the examination of everyone interested in keeping the military bill and all other bills free from suspicion and scandal.

Mr. DENT. Mr. Chairman, in the temporary absence of the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HAY], who has left the control of the time in my hands, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. OLNEY].

Mr. OLNEY. Mr. Chairman, the Committee on Military Affairs presents to the first session of the Sixty-fourth Congress a unanimous report on House bill 12766, known as the Hay bill, increasing the military efficiency of the United States.

Since the time allotted to the committee has been necessarily limited, I intend to devote my limited portion to certain features of the bill which appeal particularly to me in their adoption.

The American National Red Cross, through its president, Miss Mabel T. Boardman, appeared before the Military Affairs Committee and made a profound impression. It is granted permission by this bill to erect buildings on any military reservations of the United States suitable for the storage of supplies which shall be available for the aid of the civilian population in cases of serious national disaster. Within the last decade, the American Red Cross, in directing 80 large relief works, has distributed supplies and relief funds aggregating over $15,000,000, and any further relief and assistance which this Government may tender to this worthy cause must be commended.

It also appeared in evidence that Japan to-day has 1,800,000 members of its Red Cross, Germany has 1,000,000, Russia has 1,000,000, England has 500,000, and the United States a paltry membership of 27,000 members. This statement shamed me so much that I immediately enlisted as a soldier of the American Red Cross, as this button in the lapel of my coat will show you. [Applause.] And if I only had the green ribbon indicative of this memorable day I might be the man of the hour or the man of the day. [Applause.]

I am thankful to say that since Miss Boardman gave her testimony, energetic efforts and solicitations have brought the membership of the American Red Cross to well over 30,000 members. [Applause.]

I consider the American Red Cross one of the most important arms of the Government in time of war, and its usefulness can not be exaggerated.

The Military Affairs Committee builded better than we knew when section 83 makes provision for summer military training camps after the idea of the Plattsburg camp. The committee was unanimous in its opinion that the continental-army plan to enroll 133,000 men each year for three years until a force of volunteers of 400,000 was enrolled was doomed to disappointment and failure. The idea of one or two months' intensive training a year was a capital one, but when we consider that the continental army would have cost the Government $15,000,000 the first year, $30,000,000 the second year, and $45,000,000 the third year, and that volunteers would be recruited largely from the ranks of salaried men, it was deemed an expensive and impracticable experiment. Furthermore, the military camps are not vacation schools, and the young men who join such camps are entitled to their vacations; and how many public-spirited citizens exist to-day who will pay their clerks, the main artery of supply for summer camps, full pay for two months' absence from business.

The continental-army plan having fallen to pieces, why not encourage the increase and development of summer military training camps all over the country, where periodical military drill of four weeks' duration is taught? A healthy renewal of interest in the Plattsburg and similar camps founded last summer has been evident, since nearly 20,000 men have been drilling inside during the winter months, and 1,500 patriotic citizens alone of Boston and vicinity are included. The original incorporators of the Plattsburg Camp Association inform me that present indications are that at least 30,000 men will attend military training camps in the season of 1916 at many points between the two oceans, and that Plattsburg alone is making provision for five periodical encampments from June 5 to October 1. The men of Plattsburg who appeared before our committee sought Federal recognition and control.

In the United States about a million men are coming of age each year, and at least three-quarters are fit for military training, and there are nearly 5,000,000 men between the ages of 19 and 25 fit for service.

In addition, there are at least 700,000 young business and professional men who would be eligible to join military training camps. The work of such camps is considered supplemental to the work of the State militia and in nowise conflicts with the interests of the National Guard. On the contrary, evidence has shown that service at Plattsburg and other camps has stimulated military drill to such an extent that the ranks of the National Guard have been swelled materially by summer-camp volunteers. While the Plattsburg Camp Association did not seek an appropriation, I feel confident that a substantial appropriation from Congress, say $3,000,000, would be acceptable. This sum would train and provide for 75,000 volunteers and would remove from these military camps the idea or stigma generally prevailing that the summer camps are established by and for a privileged class. The Plattsburg Camp Association and similar organizations desire to make the camps as democratic as possible, and to make it possible for the young men of moderate means to take advantage of one month's intensive drill during the summer, and they would welcome an appropriation for this reason. The cost per man is about $40 for his four weeks' instruction, and food subsistence is reckoned on the same basis as a regular soldier. When the proper time comes I shall urge this House to grant such an appropriation, and we can thus secure a strong volunteer reserve force, a real substantial continental army, if you will, on an economical basis, which will have the benefit of one month's intensive training eight hours per day and which would not be subject to duty in time of strikes or riots.

Personally I am keenly interested and enthusiastic in the future development of the summer camps, not only as a school of instruction in military tactics but also as a move for the betterment of the health and morale of the American youth. But I want to bring the camps within the reach of all citizens.

I want the people of my district furnished the means and opportunity to enlist their services at Plattsburg. Besides stockbrokers, lawyers, business men, and clerks who have patriotically drilled at the camps, I want the shoe operatives and the granite cutters in the fourteenth district of Massachusetts, as well as the 6,000 skilled mechanics of the Fore River Shipbuilding Corporation, furnished the same chance of enlistment. A substantial appropriation will provide the means of bringing together a splendid body of citizens at the summer military training camps, where a broad democratic spirit will be disseminated and inoculated, and this air and spirit of good-fellowship and comradeship once fostered and created will bear fruitful results and will prevail ad infinitum.

At my request, Mr. Samuel Gompers, president of the American Federation of Labor, wrote me the following letter, in answer to a question concerning the feasibility and future development of the Plattsburg Camp Association:

WASHINGTON, D. C., March 13, 1916.

Hon. RICHARD OLNEY, 2nd,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

SIR: There are many features of the Plattsburg camp idea which I heartily approve, but there are some features that I can not wholly indorse. In reply to an invitation to visit the Plattsburg camp last summer, I wrote Gen. Leonard Wood, calling his attention to some of these. The features and the tendencies that I could not approve were the limitations put upon the democracy of the movement.

Under the provisions for the Plattsburg and similar training camps, it was impossible for men working for wages to avail themselves of the opportunity for military training, physical development, and outdoor life.

To be sure, I fully appreciate the fact that the Plattsburg camp was democratic in spirit, and with this spirit must have had a lasting effect upon those of different walks of life who for a few weeks at least lived together without artificial distinctions, under conditions which brought out the inherent value and good qualities of the men.

But, as I have said before, because of inability to pay their expenses in such a training camp, the wage earners were practically debarred from this opportunity.

In order to provide for all citizens equal opportunity for participation in training camps, there must be some compensation for loss of wages, otherwise those with small incomes will be unable to benefit by them.

There are many indications that there has been a decrease in the virility of our Nation during the past decade. Whatever the cause of this decrease in physical power and resistance, it is a matter of grave concern to all.

Agencies that will build up our citizens physically must be a part of our social organization. Nor is this of concern from the military standpoint only, or purely as a problem of national defense. The effects of increased vigor and of better health among our citizens will be plainly shown in increased efficiency in all activities of life. If these agencies are in accord with democratic ideals, they will leave an indelible impression upon the mental outlook and the habits of all those who come under their influence.

In addition to what I have written, you may perhaps be interested in my address at the annual meeting of the National Civic Federation, on the subject of "National Preparedness." That address, together with a letter I wrote to the National Security League, was made a public document. I am sending you a copy, and call your attention specially to the first four paragraphs on page 10.

Very truly, yours,

SAML. GOMPERS,
President American Federation of Labor.

The most expert testimony to the Military Affairs Committee showed that the United States Army, such as it is, about 100,000 strong, is the most competent and efficient in the world man for man. The rules and regulations for enlistment in the Regular Army are so strict that only the best fitted recruits, mentally, morally, and physically, are accepted. The Adjutant General's report for the last fiscal year informs us that there were 168,842 applicants, of which 123,731 were rejected.

Gen. McCain testified that 50,000 was the maximum number that could be expected to be recruited in a year in time of peace—using extraordinary measures. It was also indicated that a minimum peace strength of 140,000 men would satisfy and comply with present conditions, providing that the reserves and reservoirs for the second line of defense were sufficiently adequate and powerful.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Massachusetts has expired.

Mr. OLNEY. May I have a little more time, I will ask the gentleman from Virginia?

SEVERAL MEMBERS. Give him more time.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman one minute more.

Mr. OLNEY. Mr. Chairman, I am proud to be reckoned a Member of the Sixty-fourth Congress of the United States, the most important since the Civil War. I am proud to have been one Member of that great majority which lately upheld in no uncertain voice the foreign policy of the President, which action obliterates the impression in European countries that this House was a house divided against American law, liberties, and institutions.

As Abraham Lincoln was the man of destiny and hope in the nineteenth century, so in these crucial and critical times of war and rumors of war do we as a Nation place our trust and confidence in Woodrow Wilson as the man of destiny and hope in the twentieth century, believing that his wisdom will prevent entangling alliances, and that he, the pilot and captain, in avoiding dangerous rocks and treacherous reefs, with steady hand and cool judgment will steer our ship of state at the proper time into a harbor of refuge and safety.

Although the Hay bill was reported unanimously, through the courtesy of the chairman each member was allowed to reserve his right to support any changes or amendments which would more particularly conform to his opinion of how the efficiency of the United States Army would be more thoroughly established.

Conditions of affairs change almost in a night, as evidenced in the recent complications in Mexican affairs. How splendid was the wisdom and patriotism of this Congress as displayed in the late afternoon of March 14, when, almost to a man, in this Chamber it arose and authorized the War Department, through the Hay resolution, to recruit the Regular Army immediately to its statutory strength, supplying at once a reservoir for 19,000 additional troops. Memorable was the day and commendable the action thereof.

Should the United States intervene in Mexico within the next six months, intervention will only come because our patience will be exhausted and our national honor will be at stake, and the course of the President will have the moral and physical support of every red-blooded American. [Applause.]

Mr. KAHN. I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Delaware [Mr. MILLER].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Delaware is recognized for 10 minutes.

Mr. MILLER of Delaware. Mr. Chairman, I am very glad to be given time following the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. OLNEY], because in part of his remarks he dealt with the military training camps to which section 83 of this bill relates, otherwise known as the "Plattsburg idea." Section 83 of this bill is the particular section to which I will address myself at this time in the few minutes at my disposal. This section gives the Secretary of War authority to maintain, upon military reservations or elsewhere, camps for the military instruction and training of such citizens as may be selected for instruction and training, upon their own application and under such terms of enlistments and regulations as may be prescribed by the Secretary of War. In addition, the Secretary of War is authorized by this section to use, for the purpose of maintaining these camps and imparting military instruction and training, such arms, ammunition, accouterments, equipments, tentage, and field equipage as is necessary.

The section also authorizes the Secretary of War to furnish the citizens undergoing instruction, at the expense of the United States, subsistence and medical supplies during the period of attendance. The Secretary of War is also authorized to prescribe courses of theoretical and practical instruction to be pursued by the persons attending the camps after they have dispersed to their homes. If this bill becomes a law and the section to which I have referred is included therein, there will be established throughout this country a system of military training camps such as were held last year at Plattsburg Barracks in New York State and at Fort Sheridan in the State of Illinois, which camps were under the direction and supervision of the Regular Army officers. It is my understanding that this particular section was prepared by certain gentlemen of the Military Affairs Committee after consulting with the War Department, with a view to establishing the so-called military training camps throughout the country by national legislation. Last year it was my privilege to undergo the regular course of instruction at the first Plattsburg camp held for business and professional men. At this camp there were over twelve hundred men, from practically every State east of the Mississippi River, and at the second camp about 600 additional. I therefore feel that I can bring to the attention of the House some useful information concerning this particular question.

The President of the United States in a recent message to Congress said:

It will be right enough, right American policy, based upon our accustomed principles and practices, to provide a system by which every citizen who will volunteer for the training may be made familiar with the use of modern arms, the rudiments of drill and maneuver, and the maintenance and sanitation of camps. We should encourage such training and make it a means of discipline which our young men will learn to value.

It was demonstrated last year that through the disinterested effort of the young men of the country and without any governmental action except the interest of a few Regular Army officers under Maj. Gen. Wood, the "Plattsburg idea" has come to stay, regardless of whether the Government will officially recognize it by legislation and appropriation of money. If, however, this plan is established by law the system referred to by the President in the remarks I have just quoted will, in fact, become a reality.

THE NATIONAL GUARD'S ATTITUDE.

It has been said by some people that the so-called training-camp idea would hurt the National Guard. We have evidence to the contrary, however, in a letter which I shall not read at this time in full, but which I will ask unanimous consent to insert in my remarks, from Maj. Gen. John F. O'Ryan, of the New York National Guard, in which he states that, on the contrary, the so-called "Plattsburg idea" of military camps has aided the National Guard in the State of New York, because a great number of men who served at Plattsburg have entered the various organizations in the State of New York. It might be well at this point to call attention to an allusion in his letter in which he says in some localities there are men who desire military training, but who are so circumscribed that they can not make available for the purpose the amount of time demanded by service in the National Guard. He means by that, I dare say, those of our citizens whose business or occupation prevents them from attending regularly the weekly drills. In addition, there are a great many people who live in the country, not near enough to the cities where the armories or National Guard units are located to take advantage of membership in those organizations, and therefore they can not see service, much as they would like to, in the National Guard.

Under the training-camp plan a man can serve his apprenticeship rather than throughout the year in a system of weekly drills in a 30 days' continuous course of military training in one of the training camps. I have only brought forward the question of the National Guard as it relates to training camps because I desire to be fair to both systems and to show that both can operate alongside of each other and in many instances in conjunction with each other. Under the bill the various National Guard units are supposed to have 48 weekly drills throughout the year of one and a half hours' duration, together with two weeks in the field. Allowing 10 hours per day for field service, it will be seen that the total hours per annum under this system amount to 212 hours. Allowing the same number of hours for field service, a 30 days' course of instruction and training at a military training camp will show 300 hours per annum. I merely mention this point to show that those of our citizens who can not take advantage of the National Guard will not fare badly under the military training-camp system when it comes to a sum total of military training and drill. At this point I desire to insert Maj. Gen. O'Ryan's letter, to which I have referred:

HEADQUARTERS NATIONAL GUARD OF NEW YORK,
New York, January 17, 1916.

The question is sometimes asked whether there is any conflict of interest or effort between the organizations of the National Guard and the training camps for college and business men. This question may not only be answered emphatically in the negative, but it may be affirmatively stated with equal emphasis that the training regiments have been of benefit to the National Guard of this State at least. A very considerable number of men of the Plattsburg training regiment have joined organizations of the New York Division, some as commissioned officers and some as enlisted men.

Wholly aside from the foregoing there is another aspect of the training camps which should not be lost sight of. There are in some localities men who desire military training, but who are so circumstanced that they can not make available for the purpose the amount of time demanded by service in the National Guard. Some of the men in this class find it possible to devote 30 days for training during the summer months. The training camps furnish the needed opportunity for men in this class. These camps are, therefore, performing a service to the Nation in respect to such men which it is not possible for the National Guard to perform.

I have no hesitation in urging upon officers of the National Guard throughout the States their fullest cooperation in support of the excellent movement represented by the training camps. In New York State facilities have been provided in some of the armories for detachments of men of the training camps who desire to continue the work begun at Plattsburg.

JOHN F. O'RYAN,
Major General, N. G. N. Y.

THE PRESENT TRAINING-CAMP SYSTEM UNDEMOCRATIC.

The present training-camp system as now constituted, but not recognized by law in the appropriation of money, is undemocratic, because a man who can not afford to pay his transportation or the cost of his subsistence or his clothing is unable to go to these training camps. I believe that the idea put forward in the President's message of a citizens' reserve army can be started and have a strong nucleus in these military training camps if they are established throughout the country and we recognize them in legislation such as is contained in section 83 of this bill and then provide for an appropriation in the Army appropriation bill when it comes out. I think it is the intention of the War Department—and I do not speak without having looked into the matter—that the Government should pay for the subsistence as well as the uniforms of these men while they are in the training camps. It was my experience that, at the outside, it did not cost me more than $60 to serve at Plattsburg during the 30-day period, and this included subsistence, transportation, and clothing. Of course, that is a good deal of money to some people, and I believe we are doing a wise thing when we make provision to place within the reach of all citizens who are fitted to attend these training camps. The present state of affairs as regards the financial side of these training camps is not the fault of those who originated the idea of these camps, but of the Government, which to date has not provided the necessary legislation or money to place the advantages within the reach of all. In spite of this, however, at last year's camp we saw national statesmen and legislators, famous lawyers, great bankers and merchants, and many high State and city officials standing elbow to elbow in the ranks with men who labor for a daily wage, and both were proud of it.

INDORSED BY THE SECRETARY OF WAR.

Only yesterday the present Secretary of War, Mr. Baker, gave out a letter addressed to the governing committee of the Military Training Camps Association of the United States, in which he unqualifiedly indorsed this plan. I am not going to read it to the committee now, but I will ask to insert it in my remarks:

WAR DEPARTMENT,
Washington, March 16, 1916.

To the GOVERNING COMMITTEE OF THE MILITARY TRAINING CAMPS ASSOCIATION OF THE UNITED STATES.

GENTLEMEN: I heartily approve and indorse the valuable and patriotic service that is being rendered to the country by the army training camps for civilians.

I believe in the work of these camps, not only from the military point of view but as of value to the Nation educationally in promoting discipline, order, and good citizenship. The camps are exactly in line with the sound policy of reliance upon a citizenry trained to arms as our main safeguard for defense.

I appreciate highly the service rendered by the university presidents and civilian committees who are forwarding this movement.

These camps were originated by the War Department in 1913 for the training of students, and have been since extended for the benefit of other citizens, with gratifying results.

You may rest assured that in continuing your work of developing and promoting these camps on a national scale you will have the continued cooperation and support of the War Department.

Yours, most sincerely,

NEWTON D. BAKER,
Secretary of War.

CAMPS DURING 1916.

Beginning in April and extending through September there are to be 11 camps throughout the country, that is, 11 localities where camps are to be held. Four of these are to be held at Plattsburg Barracks; 4 at Fort Oglethorpe, Ga.; 1 at Fort Sheridan, Ill.; 1 at Fort Benjamin Harrison, in Indiana; 1 at Ludington, Mich.; 1 at Fort Douglas, Salt Lake City, Utah; 2 in California; 1 in the Puget Sound district, and 1 at Fort Wright, near Spokane, Wash. In addition there are to be 2 in the southern department—1 at Fort Sam Houston and 1 at Fort Bliss, in Texas. You will see therefore, gentlemen, that it is the idea of the War Department, having these camps in charge, to see that every section of the country is covered so that not only the youth of the land but those of our citizens who are in the prime of life can attend these camps and undergo a course of military training.

Mr. POWERS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MILLER of Delaware. How much time have I remaining, Mr. Chairman?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has two minutes.

Mr. MILLER of Delaware. I will yield to the gentleman from Kentucky for a short question.

Mr. POWERS. I just want to ask the gentleman about the number of people who usually attend these camps.

Mr. MILLER of Delaware. I am very glad the gentleman asked the question. Last year, which was the first year in which camps were held for adults, there were in attendance at the two Plattsburg camps 1,800 men and at Fort Sheridan, in Illinois, approximately 600 men. I am reliably informed that at the present time there are no less than 24,000 applications on file for service at these camps throughout the United States. Bear in mind, gentlemen, that this is under the present conditions, where a man has to go and pay his own subsistence and buy his own clothing, and so forth.

Mr. PLATT. If the gentleman will allow, I think there were three camps at Plattsburg.

Mr. MILLER of Delaware. I am very glad the gentleman called attention to that. The first camp was a students' camp, composed of those young men who were in the high schools and colleges of the country.

Mr. PLATT. Colleges of the country.

Mr. MILLER of Delaware. I want to say here that the inception of the military training-camp idea was started in 1913 more as an educational project rather than one of a militaristic nature, and there was developed from the student camps of 1913 the so-called business and professional mens' camp of 1915.

Mr. Chairman, in conclusion I want to state to the committee—and I think that you will agree with me—that the so-called "Plattsburg idea" will be the means of supplying a nucleus of officers for and perhaps a real foundation of a citizens' reserve. I for one do not want to see a big standing army in this country, because I do not think we can have one sufficiently large enough to place our entire reliance thereon; but I do want to see a sufficiently well-drilled, disciplined, and equipped citizens' reserve that will serve this country when it is needed. [Applause.] I overheard the gentleman from New York [Mr. PLATT] ask whether the men who underwent the course of training at Plattsburg did not leave with the exaggerated idea of their own capabilities as officers. I have no hesitancy in saying that the result was just the contrary. The men who went through Plattsburg were taught one of the most beneficial lessons in that they were shown how very little one could learn of the elements that go to make up an officer. The greatest lesson that was impressed upon all those who went to Plattsburg was the utter impossibility of raising, drilling, and disciplining, to say nothing of equipping, an army in 30 days or many times 30 days.

Another fact brought out was the utter fallacy of the theory that these military training camps will breed and spread a spirit of militarism throughout the land. The men who have been no nearer to war than 30 days in a training camp can well testify that even this short experience tends rather to discourage than encourage a spirit of militarism. Mr. Chairman, I am not going to take any more time of the committee right now, because this question can only be touched upon lightly in the few minutes I have, but I merely wanted to bring the subject before the House, and I firmly believe that if this section is enacted into law with the rest of the bill it will provide a means of supplying this country with trained and disciplined men when they are needed, as well as providing a means in times of peace for those of our citizens who are so inclined to make of themselves more useful citizens. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on this particular question. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Delaware? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. MILLER of Delaware. Section 83 of the bill is herewith appended in the extension of remarks:

SEC. 83. That the Secretary of War is hereby authorized to maintain, upon military reservations or elsewhere, camps for the military instruction and training of such citizens as may be selected for such instruction and training, upon their application and under such terms of enlistment and regulations as may be prescribed by the Secretary of War; to use, for the purpose of maintaining said camps and imparting military instruction and training thereat, such arms, ammunition, accouterments, equipments, tentage, field equipage, and transportation belonging to the United States as he may deem necessary; to furnish, at the expense of the United States, subsistence and medical supplies to persons receiving instruction at said camps during the period of their attendance thereat, to authorize such expenditures, from proper Army appropriations, as he may deem necessary for water, fuel, light, temporary structures, not including quarters for officers nor barracks for men, screening, and damages resulting from field exercises, and other expenses incidental to the maintenance of said camps, and the theoretical winter instruction in connection therewith; and to sell to persons receiving instruction at said camps, for cash and at cost price plus 10 per cent, quartermaster and ordnance property, the amount of such property sold to any one person to be limited to that which is required for his proper equipment. All moneys arising from such sales shall remain available throughout the fiscal year following that in which the sales are made, for the purpose of that appropriation from which the property sold was authorized to be supplied at the time of the sale. The Secretary of War is authorized further to prescribe the courses of theoretical and practical instruction to be pursued by persons attending the camps authorized by this section; to fix the periods during which such camps shall be maintained; to prescribe rules and regulations for the government thereof; and to employ thereat officers and enlisted men of the Regular Army in such numbers and upon such duties as he may designate.

REPORT OF THE ADVISORY COMMITTEE OF UNIVERSITY PRESIDENTS ON THE SUMMER MILITARY INSTRUCTION CAMPS FOR STUDENTS.

NOVEMBER 17, 1915.

These camps have now been in operation for three successive summers. In their growth and admirable management during the past two summers of 1914 and 1915 they have more than fulfilled the expectations of those indorsing them, based on the first year's experience in the summer of 1913. The camps of 1913 and 1914 were held before the breaking out of the great war abroad, which has brought into greater prominence than before their value to the Nation.

We repeat the hearty indorsement given in our reports on the camps held in 1913 and 1914. This year they were visited by a number of the members of our committee, and the committee as a whole has given attention and thought to their educational usefulness in the summer season.

The students attending are under careful oversight. The excellence of food, sanitation, and medical care has been well maintained. The students have an ideal five weeks' outing, pleasurable and beneficial to them; and the instruction, drill, cavalry exercises, field maneuvers, field surveying, and field work generally give them in the continuous five weeks' training an insight into military matters. They are, in addition to this regular work, given ample time for recreation and rest.

We commend the camps to the authorities and students of universities and colleges of the country. We believe that the training and instruction which the students attending receive not only emphasize the dangers and losses of wars lightly and unpreparedly entered into, but we also believe that the training given is excellent, and a great benefit, mental and physical, to the students attending.

Finley, University of the State of New York and Commissioner of Education; President H. B. Hutchins, University of Michigan; Superintendent E. W. Nichols, Virginia Military Institute; President Benjamin Ide Wheeler, University of California; President J. G. Schurman, Cornell University; President Edmund J. James, University of Illinois; Chancellor J. H. Kirkland, Vanderbilt University; President A. C. Humphreys, Stevens Institute of Technology; President H. A. Garfield, Williams College; President George H. Denny, University of Alabama; President Henry Sturgis Drinker, Lehigh University, secretary.

Data contained in circular sent out by the Military Training Camps Association of the United States appended in the extension of remarks.

MILITARY TRAINING CAMPS OF THE REGULAR ARMY—THEIR HISTORY AND VALUE UNDER ANY PLAN OF NATIONAL DEFENSE—THE NECESSITY FOR A CAMPAIGN OF EDUCATION, ITS COST, AND APPEAL FOR ITS SUPPORT.

1. THE STUDENT CAMPS.

In July, 1913, the first training camp of the Regular Army for college and high-school students was held on the field of Gettysburg. The plan originated with Maj. Gen. Wood, United States Army, and was part of the effort to arouse the young men of the Nation to a sense of their military responsibilities or, in Gen. Wood's words, to justify manhood suffrage by the ability and readiness to render manhood service in the cause of national defense. In 1913 a students' camp was also held at Monterey, Cal., and in 1914 and 1915 similar camps were held in various parts of the country.

While these camps have been very successful, they have been attended by only 1,720 students in all. This has been due almost entirely to lack of funds and organization to put the camp idea before the general body of students throughout the country.

2. THE PLATTSBURG CAMPS OF 1915.

In June, 1915, a corresponding movement was started among the younger professional and business men. This movement spread through many of the large cities of the country and resulted in the Plattsburg training camps for business and professional men of 1915.

On account of lack of time, preventing any well-organized effort, the camps were necessarily recruited in a haphazard manner, but nevertheless resulted in an attendance of 1,800 men at Plattsburg.

Like the student camps, these camps were held with the approval of the War Department and under officers of the Regular Army. A high standard of morale and substantial military results were attained.

Indirectly the Plattsburg idea brought about a similar camp at Fort Sheridan, Ill., attended by over 500 men, and similar movements in various parts of the country. A camp has been recently announced to be held at Fort Oglethorpe, Ga., for southern men, and plans are being made for sectional camps on a large scale in the summer of 1916. Unquestionably the Plattsburg idea has had great influence throughout the Nation in developing a sense of military obligation among the young men of the country. It is capable, however, of accomplishing infinitely greater results if organized and developed.

3. THE MILITARY TRAINING CAMPS ASSOCIATION.

The students attending these Regular Army student camps formed in 1913 at Gettysburg "The Society of the National Reserve Corps," for the purpose of promoting the training-camp idea and supporting a sound military policy. The men of the business and professional men's camps formed an organization for similar purposes at Plattsburg in 1915.

With the object of coordinating and developing the common aims of these organizations there has recently been organized the "Military Training Camps Association of the United States," for the purpose of "encouraging reasonable military training for citizens of the United States by promoting a national system of training camps and by such other means as may be advisable."

The membership of this new national association will be restricted to men who have actually attended Regular Army military camps. It starts with a membership of 3,500 men, and it is expected that members of future camps will join the association, so that the movement for citizen military training will be promoted by a single strong national organization. It will steer clear of political activities and, as distinguished from other societies for national defense, will avoid legislative propaganda and devote itself exclusively to the single purpose of encouraging and providing military training for young men.

4. FUNCTION OF THE ASSOCIATION.

The immediate object of the Military Training Camps Association will be to recruit a large number of men for the 1916 military camps. While it is as yet uncertain exactly what form legislation will take in Congress, it is certain that instruction camps for civilians will be held on a large scale in 1916 and form a part of our permanent military policy.

Whether or not the Congress of 1916 makes provision for the military training of citizens on a large scale, the Military Training Camps Association has an important and useful function to perform. It is certain that the larger the number of men at summer camps in 1916 the better off will be any plan that Congress may finally adopt. If Congress enacts the legislation now pending for the training of citizen soldiers, it will be the task of our association to obtain recruits for the instruction camps. If Congress fails to provide adequately for the military training of citizens, the vital need of training camps, as the best available means of obtaining a citizen soldiery, compels the support of every citizen to whom the Nation's security and unity have any meaning.

Experience has shown that the recruiting for citizens' camps must be conducted through a strong civilian organization, and that to accomplish results a thorough and well-organized campaign must be conducted.

5. SCOPE OF THE WORK.

There are in the United States nearly 1,000,000 young men coming of age each year, and of this number about 750,000 are conservatively estimated to be fit for military training. Between the ages of 19 and 25 there are over 4,500,000 men fit for service. Of these men it is estimated that there are in the colleges alone not less than 200,000 of proper age and physique. (Actual male attendance in colleges in 1914 was 237,562, in high schools 541,486.) In addition there are at least 700,000 young business and professional men who are fit for and would be benefited by a reasonable amount of military work. While it is not practicable at present to reach directly through private agency all the young men of the country, it is entirely feasible to bring the "Plattsburg idea" directly to the attention of over 1,000,000 college, high-school, and young business and professional men. A considerable proportion of these men are ready and eager to equip themselves to serve their country if only a practicable plan is presented to them. Such a plan is the summer training camp of the Regular Army.

The aim of the military training camp is to give men of average physique four or five weeks a year of intensive military instruction under officers of the Regular Army, so that at the end of that time men of no previous military experience will at least have learned the rudiments of military organization and discipline, close and open order drill, use of the military rifle, become familiar with the clothing, equipment, feeding, sanitation, and transportation of an army in the field, and the handling and control of men in maneuvers under conditions approximating those which they should be prepared to meet in active service in time of war.

The work of the training camps is supplementary to the work of the militia of the States. The military camps afford opportunities to those men whose business or professions or home ties do not permit them to attend at regular intervals over an extended period of service in the National Guard, but who are able to devote a few weeks a year under field conditions to preparing themselves for the privilege of sharing in their country's defense in time of need.

The Military Training Camps Association proposes to put the training-camp idea, its opportunities, and advantages, before the great constituency of young men above described.

This will be done by distributing circulars through the medium of the college and graduate lists. Young Men's Christian Associations, commercial and professional organizations, etc., by sending speakers to the colleges and larger cities, by organizing local recruiting committees, and by other similar means.

Bulletin issued by the officer in charge of training camps, Governors Island, N. Y., appended in the extension of remarks in order to illustrate just how the matter is being handled at present.

1916 MILITARY TRAINING CAMP—EASTERN DEPARTMENT, UNITED STATES ARMY, FORT OGLETHORPE, GA.

[Bulletin.]

1. QUALIFICATIONS.

An applicant for enrollment for the "business and professional" men's camp must be, first, a citizen of the United States, or have taken out his first papers; second, between 21 and 45 years of age; third, of sound physical condition, capable of hard drill and maneuver marching with a full Infantry equipment, eyesight normal or corrected by glasses to admit of target practice; fourth, have a college education or the equivalent. By "equivalent" is meant a good elementary education which has been supplemented by business or professional training. This to be stated on application blank.

2. PERIOD OF CAMP.

The first camp will open Monday, April 3, and continue to April 30, 1916. Men are required to report in camp on April 3.

If conditions warrant, other camps will follow this one. A student camp will open July 5 for students at least 5 feet 4 inches in height and between the ages of 18 and 30 in universities, colleges, and the graduating class of high schools—and other schools rated as such—or graduates of the same.

3. LOCATION.

The camp will be located at Fort Oglethorpe, Ga., a military post now garrisoned by the Eleventh United States Cavalry.

It is near Chattanooga, Tenn., with both electric and steam railway service between the city and the camp.

4. CAMP EQUIPMENT AND EXPENSES.

Arms, ordnance, and equipment, including mess outfit, will be furnished by the United States Army.

Expenses, for four weeks (exclusive of transportation to and from camp, and the uniform, which costs from $8 to 10), about $30. This to be deposited in advance and includes $5 to cover loss or damage to United States property, which is refunded in case no loss or damage is incurred. This sum covers board, camp expenses, and ammunition expended.

Government loans tentage, ordnance (full field equipment), blankets, ponchos, cots, pillows, sweaters, and mattresses.

City furnishes camp site, drill grounds, running water, and electric lights (latter in mess shacks, Y. M. C. A. tents, officers' and orderly tents, rears, and showers). It also pays for damage to crops on maneuvers.

Y. M. C. A. furnishes a large tent for each battalion, tables, chairs, and writing materials.

All instructors are officers of the Regular Army.

NOTE.—Each company has attached to it one sergeant and one private of the Regular Army as sergeant instructor and signaler, respectively.

Extra pay for cooks and waiters—who are detailed enlisted men—is paid out of the $30 deposit.

5. UNIFORMS.

Each man must take one pair tan marching shoes; medium weight socks; one pair light shoes, or sneakers; underwear; two pairs of olive-drab breeches, cotton; one pair leggins, regular pattern; two olive-drab shirts, wool; one Army blouse, cotton; one campaign hat and cord (special for military training camp); toilet articles and other necessaries.

Articles of uniform may be purchased from Post Exchange, Fort Oglethorpe, Ga.; Army and Navy Cooperative Stores, 16 East Forty-second Street, New York; Sigmund Eisner, 103 Fifth Avenue, New York; or from camp store. These outfitters will furnish measurement blanks on request.

The Munson last shoe is recommended, but any good tramping or hunting shoe of fair leather will be satisfactory. Must be broken in.

All necessary articles of uniform or clothing may be purchased at the camp store conducted by the camp authorities.

Civilian clothing, etc., in trunks and suit cases will be properly stored.

6. TRANSPORTATION.

Chattanooga, Tenn., is reached by the following railway systems: Southern; N., C. & St. L.; C., N. O. & T. P.; Central of Georgia; A. G. S.; W. & A. Camp is reached by steam or electric railway.

Arrangements have been made for special rate for attendants of 1½ cents per mile each way for the round trip.

Facilities for moving passengers and baggage direct to the camp have been made.

Agents of any of the above railway systems will furnish information as to rates, routes, schedules, and arrangements for special cars and trains where the numbers warrant.

7. BOOKS ON MILITARY MATTERS.

It is recommended that the following books be read before attending camp: Infantry Drill Regulations, or Cavalry Service Regulations, or Field Artillery Drill Regulations, United States Army Field Service Regulations, Manual of Military Training by Capt. James A. Moss. For those wishing more information, additional books are suggested: Tactical Principles and Problems (Hanna), Basic Course for Cavalry (L. C. Andrews), Elements of Military Hygiene (Ashburn), Military Sketching and Map Reading for Noncommissioned Officers by Lieut. Grieves.

The above may be obtained from the Army and Navy Cooperative Stores, No. 16 East Forty-second Street, New York; the United States Infantry Association, Washington, D. C.; the George Banta Publishing Co., Menasha, Wis., or from any book publishing company.

8. INOCULATION.

It is strongly recommended the typhoid prophylaxis inoculation be taken at the camp, or before if preferred. (No charge for this treatment at the camp or for approved applicants at any Army post.) Not obligatory.

9. INSTRUCTION.

The purpose of the camp will be to give each attendant as much of the fundamental education of an officer as can be imparted in the duration of the camp. A certain definite routine will be prescribed for all, including rifle practice.

Special opportunities under selected officers will be offered for training in various branches of the service, Cavalry, Artillery, Engineers, Signal Corps, and First Aid.

There will be present at the camp, Cavalry, Artillery, Signal Corps, and Infantry officers of the Regular Army.

Those who have had a fundamental Infantry training or have attended a military training camp, may enter directly a troop of Cavalry or a battery of Artillery and devote their time to this special training, provided there are enough applicants.

10. ORGANIZATION.

Attendants at the camp will be divided into war-strength companies of Infantry, troops of Cavalry, or batteries of Artillery, commanded by officers of the Regular Army, whose duties cover not only those of instruction but also the health and general welfare of their commands. Attendants are on a cadet basis.

11. SPECIAL PERIODS OF ATTENDANCE—NATIONAL GUARDSMEN.

Those who are members of the National Guard or have had other recent military training, since August, 1911, may apply, and on approval may attend for less than the prescribed period. As the military training is progressive, the latter part of the camp is recommended for such men. Men of sufficient experience will be used as officers and noncommissioned officers for the various organizations. The original enrollments stating experience are on file with the commanding officer of the camp.

12. EXAMINATIONS.

No examination is required, but a board of regular officers on duty at the camp will make such recommendations as to individual qualifications as they may deem proper, to be filed with the War Department.

DECEMBER 20, 1915.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. GREENE].

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Vermont? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Mr. Chairman, it is manifest to all of us that in this short allotment of time one who has undertaken to give any attention to the details of this proposed legislation can not do justice to any opinion he may have formed about it, much less can anyone who has tried to study the general subject of preparedness or national defense undertake, in justice to his own opinion or to the good nature of anybody else, to make his position as to details plain and unmistakable. I must content myself, therefore, under the circumstances by only briefly suggesting a few things which I am hoping hereafter to dwell upon in extenso in the RECORD.

In the first place, this matter of national preparedness has been not only the most eagerly discussed of all popular topics in the later years of our generation but it has been one of the most likely to be misunderstood, misinterpreted, and misapplied. It is probably true that there has been a more general dissemination of misinformation about our military situation, about the strength and character of our organized Army, and the probable and possible strategical situations which might involve our Army, and about various other factors connected with this subject than would fill libraries.

The word "preparedness" has come to be a synonym for "national defense," and it is a convenient synonym, because it enables any man, no matter what his opinion in the concrete may be, to say offhand that he is, of course, in favor of adequate preparedness. The trouble comes, however, in trying to analyze what we may mean by military preparedness. I think we have perhaps derived something of a wrong impression, some of us, from the reports that have been in print in the magazines, in the newspapers, and current on the platforms, and on the sidewalks, and in places here and there where men get together and exchange views, because the tendency has been to carry the popular idea that somehow or other Congress was finally going to come out with a proposition to organize and maintain in the Regular Army of the United States half a million men in time of peace.

Now, I think when the public sees the bill that is presented here to-day, and when the facts are carefully examined, something of that erroneous impression will be dispelled. And then I am inclined to think that many of our friends who have been somewhat cautions about undertaking to support any definite scheme of preparedness at all, will feel that they are perfectly safe in supporting a bill that only provides for a Regular Army of something less than one-third of what the public has been taught to expect.

I think that the tendency of the average American in contemplating the idea and possibility of this country ever going to war is to rely upon our potential military strength. The average person has been inclined to say, "Oh, well; it is not necessary for us to maintain a large Military Establishment, because when the time comes we are the richest country on earth; we have hundreds and hundreds of thousands of fine young men who will volunteer to the defense of the flag, and we have every kind of resource imaginable for the maintenance and support of this Army in the field, and brains to spare by which its activities may be directed and administered." The trouble is, somehow, that we are relying upon some Aladdin's lamp by which all these resources will be conjured into existence in the twinkling of an eye by genii or by the mere fiat of Congress.

We forget that in order to prepare for national defense, even under the moderate terms of the measure that is proposed to you to-day, it will require years of labor. There is no such thing as this instant conjuring of efficient national preparations for national defense into existence. It takes time, even under the most favorable and favoring conditions of peace.

Let me give you an illustration, for instance, that may appeal directly to your own business, practical, everyday experience about this notion that the potential resources of our country will be sufficient to take care of us in any time of urgency and stress. I will confess it is something of a whimsical illustration, but it has a directly sensible and serious application, as you may see. Suppose any business man in this country now, with all the wheels turning in industrial life, with every favoring circumstance in the way of transportation, and with everything else that helps to facilitate the avenues and possibilities of trade in time of peace, wanted to place an order in this country for 5,000,000 buttons of a particular type and design and wanted those buttons delivered to him at an agreed spot in 30 days. That looks like a trifling thing. It looks like a small thing, and the average man would say, "Why, of course, in this enormous country of ours, with all its markets and resources of one kind and another, there ought not to be any difficulty at all about a man being able to assemble in 30 days, or even less, in a given spot 5,000,000 buttons after a pattern and design that he might require." And yet practical business men know, day in and day out, week in and week out, through all the years, more or less such propositions about small matters are put up to them, and they begin to rake and scrape this country with a fine-tooth comb to get together just such a quantity of articles of small account like that, and often fail to do it.

Take that question of 5,000,000 buttons. Suppose that war was suddenly to confront this country, most unexpectedly. Those 5,000,000 buttons would hardly be enough to gird up the trousers of the first 500,000 men that we want to put on the firing line. And you can go from buttons to batteries; you can go from the smallest, the simplest detail of the everyday necessity of the soldier's outfit right straight up to the enormous, the gigantic, the almost, to the layman, incomprehensible complication and bulk and magnitude of detail that must be organized to maintain and support an army in the field after it has got there; and you will find just exactly that same problem staring us in the face. It looks easy. It looks easy to conjure out of all the infinite resources of this land the articles and the necessities for the maintenance of troops in the field, but when the time comes, when the stress is upon us, when, instead of favoring business conditions, we are met with all the complexities and operations of war, when every resource is being strained both in industrial arts and transportation to do everything else except what we may want done at that particular place and time, then we find what a tremendous problem it is to get ready to put an army into the field; much more to maintain it after it is there.

The popular mind somehow is possessed of the fancy that armies simply consist of a wonderfully gallant line of brave boys in blue, with rifles in their hands. People do not stop to realize that this glorious little firing line is, after all, but a small part of the proportions and organization that must be reckoned with in any scheme of war. There are plenty of men; there is no trouble about the enlistment of plenty of men to go to the firing line. The problem consists in so organizing and so coordinating our resources behind those men that they can be kept there, and that they will not be more of a danger to themselves than the enemy is to them.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Certainly.

Mr. GOOD. As I read the bill, there is only one section that contains an authorization for the acquiring of ammunition or any of the parts of ammunition. That is section 82, covering the nitrate plant.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. I think the gentleman will bear in mind that already, under our present system, we are manufacturing a large part of what we need.

Mr. GOOD. I understand that; but I understand from men who have traveled abroad in the last 10 months that when the war broke out in Europe Germany had a less supply of ammunition than France, but Germany knew every private plant and knew the power of their engines and their capacity, and immediately turned those plants into munition factories. That is what she did; and so her ammunition was fresh ammunition and had not deteriorated. Why is it that this bill does not contain some provision whereby the manufacturing institutions of America can be commandeered, just as American boys can be brought in to fight a battle?

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman from Connecticut yield?

Mr. TILSON. Certainly.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I may say to the gentleman from Iowa that that exact condition is provided for by a bill brought in by the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. HILL] to create a dye industry. We produce now only about 8 per cent of our dyes. The experience of Germany was that they were able not only to supply their own wants but the wants of the rest of the world, and they were able immediately to turn those factories into high-explosive factories. So far as nitrogen is concerned, I called attention, in an interruption of a speech by the gentleman from Wisconsin, to the fact that Germany was to-day able to manufacture all her nitrogen, not out of water power by the fixation of atmospheric nitrogen but as a by-product out of the coking of coal. We need only follow Germany's example in that respect and we would have an ample supply.

Mr. GOOD. We are likely to provide for the dye industry; but why not look after it when we are looking after the killing industry? [Laughter.]

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. I may say that if the gentleman will examine the bill in detail he will find a provision in there covering that point.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Connecticut yield to the gentleman from Nebraska?

Mr. TILSON. Yes.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. I happen to have a copy of the bill right here, and you will notice that section 84 of the bill provides for covering the exact proposition referred to. We there empower the President to commandeer all such factories.

Mr. GOOD. Yes. It provides for that; but it does not give authorization for the acquisition of the equipment—the dies and lathes.

Mr. TILSON. That would be in the appropriation.

Mr. GOOD. We have not the authorization to-day to acquire all these things.

Mr. TILSON. May I interrupt the gentleman?

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Yes, if I have any time left.

Mr. TILSON. If the gentleman will wait until we reach section 21 of the bill, he will have an opportunity to vote upon an amendment which I propose to offer in the shape of a bill which provides for the furnishing of these preliminary dies, gauges, jigs, and so forth.

Mr. LONGWORTH. That is not the sort of dyes we were speaking of. [Laughter.]

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Now, Mr. Chairman, I will go on with what is left of my own speech. I followed the subject referred to by the gentleman from Iowa with diligence during the committee hearings on this bill, and if the gentleman will read the hearings carefully he will find a discussion along the line of the inquiry he has brought up. We have endeavored to cover some of those propositions in this bill.

I do not hesitate to declare myself as convinced beyond all manner of doubt that our present preparations for national defense are sorely inadequate. I believe they are sorely inadequate not only in contemplation of the possibilities of the present day but even for the ordinary routine peace establishment.

I believe this bill is a practical working measure, founded in the main on a correct principle that permits of development and expansion to suit changed and changing conditions, and that it is probably the best proposition for the substantial increase of the Military Establishment that can be expected of the House under all the circumstances that attend its organization and policy at the present time. Realizing that under any and all conditions the best that can be hoped for from this body in the way of advanced legislation must be begun and more or less slowly accomplished through considerate and intelligent compromise by many men of many minds, I am convinced that this bill makes a very decided step in the right direction. I am hopeful that if its essential features can be enacted into law time and experience will develope the best that is in it, eliminate such weaknesses as may be discovered, and, on the whole, result in the placing of our Military Establishment within a comparatively short time on a basis of reasonable preparation for national defense consistent with our recognized national policy in this regard.

The bill does not go as far as I would like in the matter of numerical strength of the Army as a whole, and in the matter of providing for the best efficiency of some branches of the military service. But, recognizing the difficulties in the way of securing the instant realization of one's own ideals and standards in such matters in this practical legislative world of give and take, I have joined in the unanimous report of the committee recommending the passage of the bill, with the understanding that some amendments might be offered or supported, because I believe half a loaf is better than no bread. And I truly think there is far and away more than half a loaf in this well-considered measure.

PROBLEM OF REORGANIZING THE ARMY.

Every practical man knows that it is easier in most instances to construct any large public enterprise or institution from the very beginning, building it out of hand in the light of knowledge gained from experience, observation, and investigation, and working out a symmetrical idea all the way through, because there is nothing already in existence to uproot or to get around or to go over or that must be for some reason brought into the scheme and roughly coordinated with it, than it is to make over and modernize an enterprise or institution that has been in existence for more than a century and a quarter without disturbing its general character and effectiveness while the work is in progress and without destroying any of its essential parts.

The work of remodeling the United States Army and our military system generally presents all the difficulties that must naturally be expected when one undertakes the disturbance of organizations that have been in existence in some form or another for generations and are interwoven with usages, customs, habits of thought, history, and tradition that the popular mind, and the men in the service also, to a great extent, have accepted as matters of fact, and perhaps even matters of necessity. It is not to be expected that such a task can be performed in one legislative measure, not only because the wisdom of lawmakers can not be expected to determine the right thing to do when military experts themselves are not agreed upon it, but because the great body of the people that are to be called upon to support the institution out of their pockets must themselves be convinced that these changes are not only expedient but necessary.

Not only that, but not all change is necessarily betterment just because it is change, as we all know, and there are many, if not most, features and principles and policies intermixed in our present Military Establishment that have found their place there because experience justified them, and the wise layman will let them alone until he finds something better to put in their place. This is particularly worthy of thought at this time, when the air is full of plans and schemes, propositions, and propaganda of all manner of Army reform, for the most part coming from men that are actuated by the highest considerations of lofty patriotism, to be sure, but that all too often are not born of any very practical military experience, and in most instances do not reckon upon the state of public opinion and the nature of public policy in this country at all; and Congress never yet made a success of legislating very far ahead of public sentiment and the habits and practices of the people that it is designed to represent.

SHOULD HAVE FIXED WORKING PLAN.

I believe that in some way found most expedient and practicable the Congress should have laid before it a well-considered general comprehensive plan for the evolution of a military establishment and the maintenance of a military policy adapted to the present needs and anticipated growth of the United States. That plan and policy, in so far as is practicable, considering all things, should be accepted and adopted as a permanent standard, should "stay put," so to say, until perhaps coming generations may have good occasion to change it. But in the meantime it should be let alone and should be the constant guide of the lawmakers in their annual or occasional provisions for the Army—and the Navy—by way of legislation and appropriations. With such an outline before it and with the firm resolve never to let politics or demagoguery or any caprice of the moment tamper with it, the various committees of the House charged with legislation in that field could regularly go about their work with some reasonable expectation of making each step count toward the expected total, making each contribution symmetrical and consistent with the standard established, just as a city or a State, or a private citizen or business concern for that matter, often begins and carries on to completion some scheme for public works or private industrial enterprise too elaborate to be made all at one undertaking.

TRAIN THE YOUTH TO ARMS.

I sincerely believe that we shall never wholly solve this great problem of adequate preparation for national defense in this country until, in some practical and sensible way, it shall become a recognized policy on the part of the people themselves to arm and train in military science the youth of the land as a matter-of-fact detail in their education for the duties and responsibilities of citizenship. I put it this way because I think we are all presently agreed that the time is not ripe for such a thing as compulsory military service by command of law and under penalty of law. The people are not in sympathy with it because somehow it suggests the ancient tyranny of militarism and hated domination of military overlords. They have not yet taken time to analyze the proposition, tip it over, and look on the other side.

But the hour has struck for the beginning of popular education on the subject, and the popular mind has already begun to take up the lesson and study it. One of these days it would not be surprising if public opinion in America came to favor the idea of military training for youth as an incidental part of their education, because it will be plain that this training is not something forced down upon them from a despotic Government above and simply for the Government's own maintenance, but that, rather, it is something that the people should do for themselves, in and among themselves, for their own preservation and the maintenance of their own homes and their own standard of civilization, and because it forms habits of mind and strength of character that are as useful in peace as in war. When public sentiment does reach that stage, then the law that carries out the idea will not only come about in a natural way but will be observed without fear or friction, because it will be doing literally what all laws in this land should do—carrying out the will of the people themselves.

Just as we argue to-day that every citizen should go to the polls and exercise his right to vote, that the elective franchise is a responsibility and not a privilege, so we shall some day argue that every man protected by the Nation owes to the Nation his contribution toward the national defense, whether it be time, service, property, or life, or all of them.

REPUBLICS UNPREPARED FOR WAR.

It is a significant fact in history that a strong centralized government is usually prepared for the emergency of war, while a republic or democracy generally never is. Of course, philosophers have reasoned throughout all this experience that what the looser form of government lost by reason of terrible sacrifices in the beginning of war because of unpreparedness for it was more than made up in the long run by the higher character of citizenship that it developed under its system of permitting and guaranteeing greater liberty to the individual. And it has been said that, after all, the ultimate benefit to humanity and civilization wrought by the freer government was worth all that its fearful sacrifices to defend and maintain itself usually cost. This is a comforting reflection when calmly read in an easy chair by a fireside, but it is quite another thing when the real test comes and when living human beings must give up their philosopher's books and easy chairs and make the awful sacrifice they have been reading about.

It seems to me that the world has grown old enough by this time, and our democratic-republican experiment in government has become strong enough by this time, so that we might prudently venture a little readjustment of the practical application of this lesson of history. Why should we pay the terrible price of unpreparedness for war when a little foresight, a little common sense, may help us to minimize the cost and the sacrifice, if not often avoid it altogether because our preparation actually prevented war? Why should we be content to dwell in a fool's paradise of fancied security from all attack just to make the philosophy of history good by blundering through to ultimate victory with a frightful sacrifice of lives and treasure when we are attacked? Why not do with the Nation as we do with ourselves individually—take out a little life insurance?

DREAD OF LARGE STANDING ARMIES.

The English-speaking people are born to an inherited dread of great standing armies, it is true, and there was a time when

English-speaking men, and men of all tongues for that matter, had a good right to dread them. But those were the days of strong centralized monarchies, practically absolute monarchies, when the soldiers belonged to the King, were paid by the King, and served the King alone. Nothing like that exists to-day nor has it ever existed in the United States. Why should men continue to terrify the multitude with the idea that any attempt to raise the United States Army must mean a militaristic domination and tyranny such as old King George once undertook here rather unsuccessfully, if memory serves aright? No such thing is possible to-day because the soldiers not only come from the people themselves, but they are paid by the people and serve the people directly and nobody else. And always and forever the people can have just as many of them or just as few of them as they please by simply keeping their hands on the purse strings.

PLANS OF MILITARY STUDENTS.

It is only natural to expect that professional military men, when called upon to suggest plans for national defense, will submit the most comprehensive and complete scheme of preparedness that their experience, study, and talents can devise. They would not be true to their professional ideals, they would not be faithful to the service in which they are employed if they did not. They are men set apart for the special study of these special problems by reason of their own special fitness and training. They are employed to make their life business cover a field of possible horror that all the millions of men and women that pay them for it hope with all their hearts will never be covered by anything but theoretical tactics, imaginary strategy, and peaceful drill. They are commissioned and compensated for the express purpose of learning so much about the art of war and of organizing our military resources to such a practical state of immediate effectiveness that no other people will ever try to make war upon us, or will be unsuccessful if they do. When they are called upon, therefore, to propose plans for the safeguarding of this land against an armed foe they can in all conscience do nothing less than propose the very safest and securest plans that the latest developments of military science suggest. They are specialists for that very purpose.

DUTY OF THE LEGISLATORS.

Now comes the work of the legislator, the task of reconciling these practical theories of practical theorists with the probable demands of the times and the nature of the times, the ability of the National Treasury to support, and the willingness of the people to be taxed to maintain. And it is his function and his responsibility to sift out of these professional plans of the experts that which is apparently necessary and indispensable for the purpose both have in mind and that will at the same time respond to the test of these enumerated conditions of demand and support. The task is a delicate one and the layman should approach it with caution and a deep sense of responsibility. But it is an imperative one and must be undertaken without fear or favor. The schemes of military scientists, however patriotically inspired, if left unchecked by the cool, calculating, practical economist, would inevitably drift the land toward a riot of reckless militaristic extravagance out of which in the end no good could come that even military men themselves could see. On the other hand, if the subject were left to the cool, calculating, practical economist alone the tendency would be right the other way, and we should soon find the land content with the flimsiest of pretenses for national defense—in some respects, indeed, just where it is now.

SIZE OF THE REGULAR ARMY.

I am not satisfied with the total strength of the line of the Army as fixed by this bill. Conceding, as one must, of course, that it exceeds the figures asked for by the War Department, it is still plain that it is not by any means nearly equal to the figures proposed to the War Department by the specialists of the Army employed for that very purpose, and I submit that a lay opinion may also be ventured in such case without undue assumption or immodesty inasmuch as we laymen must take the responsibility for the figures that are adopted in the end. Without intending to criticize motives in an offensive way, I do suggest that perhaps considerations of economy had no small part in determining the size of the Regular Military Establishment as it was officially proposed to Congress and to the Committee on Military Affairs.

At the outset it should be remembered that any attempt on the part of Congress to fix the strength of the Regular Establishment to be maintained in time of peace at a figure sufficient for the actual emergency of war would mean the appropriation for the maintenance of a simply enormous standing Army and saddle the country with an annual expenditure that the people would never consent to, and never should. When we estimate the size of a Regular Army sufficient to defend this country against attack, an Army so large and so complete within and of itself that attack would probably be useless, we must carry our minds into a realm of figures for soldiers and figures for money that makes the proposition utterly out of the question. And out of the question, too, not simply because of unwarranted money extravagance, but for the more vital factor of menace to national character. For when a people in any land under any civilization reach the point where they simply hire mercenaries to do their fighting for them and defend their hearthstones for them, they have no sense of liberty, no ideals of civilization worth preserving. The policy of the United States always has been, and I hope always will be, unreservedly against such suicidal folly as that.

REGULAR ARMY IN TIME OF PEACE.

This leads us to the conclusion that the Regular Army in time of peace should be so constituted in the matter of size and distribution of special arms and resources as to be sufficient for the preservation of law and order within our own boundaries, the maintenance of the constitutional guaranty of a republican form of government to each State, for its own efficient training and the education of its officers in the military science and art of war, and for the instruction and training of the youth of the land generally in the profession of arms and the duties of the soldier so that there may be constantly available in some form or another sufficient material from which to draw the great volunteer forces that inevitably must combine with and be a part of the Army in the dread emergency of war. Add to this the somewhat generalizing assertion that the Army should be large enough at all times to keep before the world a sufficient indication that this country is armed and prepared to defend itself, that its military resources are not simply altogether potential but that they are organized and coordinated and capable of instant and enormous expansion and employment in the field, and we have something of the moral effect of military preparedness that every self-respecting people must expect to maintain if they hope to have any share whatever in the making and the preservation of that comity of nations that is hoped for through the operation of international law.

Keeping in mind these two elements, therefore, the one an Army sufficient for national defense at any and all times, and the other an Army sufficient for peace purposes with expansive capacity in the emergency of war, it is plain that any amount of armed forces we add to the peace establishment that do not bring it up to the force necessary for war is almost literally wasted and means money thrown away for needless expense. Nothing can be accomplished by an addition to the Regular Army of men and officers that are a little more than are needed in time of peace and miserably short of what are needed in time of war; that is, nothing but absurdly extravagant waste of the people's money.

This was the idea kept in mind by the committee when the size of the Regular Army was fixed in this bill. To my mind, however, the limit decided upon was not sufficient, even for peace purposes, and for reasons that I shall attempt briefly to sketch, although it must be said that these reasons in part were more or less considered by the committee when it arrived at its conclusion.

NEEDS OF THE REGULAR ARMY.

I believe that it is a wise policy to maintain the Army in time of peace with certain arms of the service requiring special and intensive training for efficiency at figures of strength disproportionately higher than the normal ratio those arms of the service would hold to the total strength of the Army in time of peace, if the peace strength were all that we intended to calculate upon. I believe this because, when the emergency of war confronts us and we are put to increasing the Army on a huge scale at short notice, it is impossible to get these specially trained men at short notice, and the Army would have to go into action with a weakness in those branches of the service that would work more disaster and expense in lives and treasure than it would cost to maintain them at disproportionately larger strength in time of peace.

There should be a disproportionately larger number of officers in the peace establishment also, and for the same reason. This fact has been kept in mind pretty generously in the formation of this bill, I admit, but I am inclined to believe that the emphasis for their use was laid almost altogether on the necessity for their service as instructors of the National Guard and citizen soldiery, and that the capacity of the Army for sudden expansion in time of war did not enter into the calculations as much as might be. If we are to encourage and develop the idea of bringing about a citizenry trained in arms in this country, we must expect to have to employ a great and greater number of officers as time goes on in order to furnish the requisite competent instructors for our boys. Then, when the emergency of war comes, those same officers that have been schoolmasters will all find places in the organization in the battle field, and there will be none too many of them at that.

But there is still another phase of this subject that may be worth considerable thought. The United States has enormous potential military resources, it is true, but they are almost wholly potential, inchoate, unorganized, unrealized. I hinted at this and the possibilities that grow out of it at the beginning of my remarks. Whenever we have been confronted with the possibility of war or the actuality of war, we have invariably found that it took time, time, time to begin to put those great resources of ours into use. And even then, with the best of brains and energy, with toil unabating and zeal unflagging, with a whole country stirred to its center by a noble patriotic impulse, and all men everywhere in the land willing to lend a hand, the inevitable confusion of everybody trying to do everything needful all at the same time tended in instances innumerable to delay the very cause that all were striving to advance.

The enlisting and organizing of volunteer troops, the mobilization of Regular and National Guard troops already organized, and the organization and coordination of sources of supply for these troops, the gathering and transportation of troops, supplies, matériel, and munitions—all thrust upon the country at once—with every forge, factory, workshop, and market straining to its utmost to manufacture or to distribute, and with every available means of transportation congested with raw materials going one way and troops and supplies going the other—all this tremendous business suddenly thrust upon a country as unmilitary in its everyday habit as ours, means that the demand for trained Army officers to take charge of this emergency and bring order and effectiveness out of it will far exceed the capacity of any corps of officers we not only provide in this bill but are likely to provide in its successors, even with the utmost liberality of intention. Because we know we shall be short, even under the most favoring circumstances, it seems to me good reason why we should at least go a little farther than we do in anticipating such a shortage now.

In something of the same proportions the same argument will apply to the necessity for still larger provision for enlisted men. If the Regular Army is to serve as the nucleus for a war Army and is not simply to do the fighting alone, as we so often say, then, it seems to me, one of the greatest of the functions a large part of the Regular Army will be called upon to perform at the outbreak of war is this very work of organizing the military resources of the land. And we know from experience that, even with the freest of calculation beforehand, we shall never have enough help when the time comes.

ENORMOUS TERRITORY TO BE COVERED.

But entering into this whole proposition as to the size of the Regular Army, whether we are calculating solely upon its uses in time of peace or whether we are thinking also of its capacity for expansion in time of war, is the serious factor presented by the enormous expanse of territory that our Regular Army must cover under any and all circumstances. If we were called upon to estimate the size of a requisite Regular Army for the defense of the same number of people as we have now dwelling in the United States, and those people were living in some compact territory sufficient to the needs of their numbers without overcrowding, we could base our estimate on a somewhat different scale of proportion than we must employ now. But with conditions as they are, with continental United States alone encompassing a great domain that includes in many of its single States areas greater than most of the European nations, with a coast line of over 5,000 miles to defend right here at home, say nothing of our possessions overseas, it must be manifest to any thoughtful man that a Regular Army large enough to be of any use at all to such a country, even in time of peace, must be sufficiently large to enable it to garrison and police this enormous piece of geography. We are having an excellent object lesson of about how effective our regular establishment is for such peace purposes right at this very hour when we are compelled to raise an extra 20,000 men just because we are going across the Rio Grande to hunt a few hundred bandits.

"SECOND LINE OF DEFENSE."

Of course, we all agree that the Navy is our first line of defense. There is no question about that. But some of us appear to think that pretty much the whole stress of preparations for national defense should be laid upon the Naval Establishment just because it is the first line of defense. To men of that opinion I would take the time only to suggest the query, What would we be able to do, if in the fortunes of war, we should chance to lose control of the seas? Every prudent man that has a complicated machine in constant or expectant use, a machine that is intended to withstand a strain that is particularly and peculiarly wearing or destructive of it, does not hesitate to provide himself with spare parts. And he does not calculate that the spare part that he gets may well be inferior to the part it is to replace simply because the part already in the machine is going to bear the first test of wear and destruction. He knows, like a sensible man, that if the first part gives out under the wear the part he puts in must be just as good, or even better, for that matter, or it will give way just as the first one did. If we should ever lose control of the seas in time of war, our problem of national defense, instead of being simply reliance upon a land force of calculated strength sufficient to repel possible invasion while the Navy was still afloat but busy elsewhere, would be infinitely more complicated than ever, because the enemy would have greater and freer access to our shores and to more parts of them at once.

DEFENSE OF THE COAST.

In this connection it might be well to remind some lay strategists of a point in the subject of preparation against invasion of this country in time of war that many of them appear to overlook or misunderstand. There is a tendency to confuse harbor defenses with actual coast-defense preparations. We use the term "coast defense" loosely when we apply it to the defenses we have prepared on our shores. What we have in existence to-day are simply forts and guns and mortars and mines designed for the protection of the harbors at our most important seacoast cities. These defenses are in their very nature immovable; they are fixed; and must permanently guard the spots they are intended to protect. In between these harbor defenses stretch several thousand miles of unprotected coast line where an enemy unmolested might easily effect landings with great numbers of men and quantities of armament and stores. And the melancholy fact is that we have not to-day either sufficient mobile troops or mobile artillery of sufficient size to protect ourselves against a landing at any one of scores of strategic positions along this tremendous coast line.

We loosely talk about our standing army being our "first line of defense." Under conditions as they exist to-day this mistaken idea means only the pushing out to the front in time of war of a little handful of well-trained men who can not hope to combat such a force as would be brought against them by any enemy that would dare plan to attack us at all, and who would be slaughtered hopelessly and helplessly while this great land of such incalculable potential resources in men and stores and money was desperately groping about to bring into existence the invincible military power that Fourth of July orators have been boasting about for so many generations.

MUST RELY UPON CITIZEN SOLDIERY.

It follows, therefore, that apart from wise provision for a sufficient Regular Army our main reliance under our national policy must be upon having at instant command a great body of citizens trained to the use of arms, experienced in the duties of a soldier, acquainted to some practical extent with the life of a soldier in the field and the conditions and limitations under which life must be maintained there in such splendid fettle that it can survive the camp to meet the enemy and conquer him with as little loss as possible. Hitherto in our experience the loss of life in the camp when the enemy was not being engaged at all has been more to be dreaded than the actual shock of combat. Fortunately advanced medical science has begun to change this state of affairs to a remarkable extent. But the fact still remains that the average volunteer army in the field is at first more of a menace to itself than it is to the foe, for the very natural reason that men accustomed to the easy and comfortable indoor conditions of life at home must go through a severe and hazardous readjustment to new and strained and sorely trying physical conditions in the great outdoors in time of war.

However, the problem must be met and solved, and the first proposition in it is to determine what form of organization of our citizens for military training purposes and what authority for this training and service in time of peace or time of war shall be adopted and enforced.

THE "CONTINENTAL ARMY" PLAN.

It was proposed by the War Department that there should be organized for this purpose what might tentatively be called a 'continental army," a force of citizen volunteers to be enlisted directly into the United States service and to be maintained solely at the expense of the National Government and under the authority, control, and discipline of the Congress and the President. Tentative details as to this organization and its administration were also proposed, which it is not necessary to discuss here, inasmuch as the plan is not before us for consideration now. It is sufficient to say that these volunteer citizens were to be permitted to go about their usual private avocations, but were to be enlisted and sworn into the United States military service, were to be armed and equipped, and were to be summoned to compulsory drill and training for a certain period each year for a term of three years, after which each soldier was to be placed in a reserve force for another period of years, during which time he was subject to a call to the colors. In this way it was proposed to build up a great military reserve among the citizenry of the land in the course of a few years, so that in time of war we should no longer be put to dependence upon levies of raw and untrained men from the walks of business and industry and the professions, but would have a population largely imbued with the military spirit and a great force of men more or less accustomed to the use of arms and the duties of the soldier, with some form of always existing organization to which they might be summoned for war.

It should be said in all fairness that it was given out with much and repeated emphasis that this plan did not contemplate the undoing of the existing Organized Militia of the several States, or the National Guard, as it is now more commonly called, but that the National Guard or any part of it could come over to the continental army or act in conjunction with it on occasion.

Now, I want to say right here that, in my opinion, this idea that the Organized Militia of the country should be, as contemplated in this continental army plan, an out and out Federal force, that it should be under the pay and control and maintenance of the National Government and serve the purposes of the National Government under the authority and direction of Congress and the President within its sphere of usefulness, as the Regular Army does, is the only safe and sound one upon which our citizen volunteer army can be properly organized or successfully maintained. And I may add, by way of evidencing good faith in this assertion, that I took occasion myself to dwell with considerable emphasis upon that very idea as the only possible solution of this militia and volunteer citizen soldiery proposition in a speech I made to this House in the Sixty-third Congress on January 21, 1915, when I advocated the federalization of the so-called National Guard some time before this continental army scheme was set afoot.

So that I have no hesitation whatever at this time in indorsing with all my best judgment the idea that is the basic principle upon which this continental army was to be organized and maintained.

WEAKNESSES OF "CONTINENTAL ARMY" PLAN.

But I could not bring myself to accept the continental army plan as presently workable, or, for that matter, advisable, because, not matter what was said about it by its friends—that it was not designed to undo the National Guard but was to be a comrade in arms with the National Guard—the stubborn fact remained, as I view it, that it was simply an attempt to make two similar bodies occupy the same space at the same time. And every law of physics tells us that that can not be done. If this plan were put into operation there could be but one result: One of the institutions would have to give way to the other. But, to be sure, if this were to mean merely the same old operation of the law of the survival of the fittest, there could be no objection to the plan being tried out, because the country simply wants, and certainly ought to have, the best that it can get in the way of an organized citizenry trained to arms, and sentiment and home and personal interests ought not to be permitted to stand in the way of it.

At the same time, however, we were told repeatedly that the two organizations would in all probability continue to exist side by side; that the continental army plan was designed to reach a class of men not now and not likely ever to be attracted to the ranks of the National Guard, and that as a consequence the field would be better covered by the two bodies than it had been by the existing one organization. My objection to that was, first, that it was a needless expense and a mischievous dissipation of military energies and military resources and a frivolous complication of military organization to have two bodies of soldiery in existence in the same field when one body of sufficient size would do; second, that if the nature of the continental army plan was, as indicated, to be such as would attract to it men that would not go into the National Guard and that they were men who could afford each year to take a month or two months out of their business or other occupation, then we would be simply creating an aristocratic corps of the leisure class and deliberately setting it in opposition to the National Guard, no matter how sincere our good intentions in disavowing such purpose.

We might disavow and disavow the idea that we were constituting any class distinctions in this form of military organization, but on the very face of it the fact stuck out so plain that any man might read that the continental army could only be made up of men that had time and money enough to take out of their lives and away from their families two months or so of each year and practically give it to the Government. And that did not strike me as being quite in tune with the democratic idea of American social order, to say nothing of American patriotic volunteer war service.

Now, it was admitted that the continental army plan was an experiment, that it had not a soldier in existence and ready for it, that it must at the very outset be tested out by attempts at recruitment following popular education as to what it was and what it was designed to do, and that, when the beginning was made, it must be organized, equipped, drilled, trained, and generally whipped into shape at places and times, under conditions and circumstances in conformity to hopes and expectations all uncertain, and against difficulties and obstacles well known or apprehended, and that it would take three years at least to determine just what it would amount to at that.

WHY NOT DEVELOP THE NATIONAL GUARD?

It seemed to me, therefore, as it did to the entire committee, apparently, without even a first consulting of our minds upon it, that, as a matter of practical, everyday expediency in adapting our plans for a greater organized military establishment to existing conditions, it was wiser not to risk this wholly untried and altogether experimental scheme of a continental army that was not represented by so much as a solitary "high private in the rear rank" with local habitation and a name, but to take the already existent National Guard, invoke all the powers of the Constitution of the United States in the organization of it as a Federal force, and make a "continental army" out of that.

The National Guard is already in existence, with over a hundred years of history and traditions. It is armed, equipped, housed, organized, in part disciplined and trained, musters already 129,000 men, in round numbers, with degrees of military training and effectiveness running from poor to superb, but with the major part certainly in the scale of good to excellent. It already answers to what pretty much all military men hold to be one of the greatest considerations for such a force, in that it is territorialized, has State headquarters, recruits from a given locality, sends its reserves back to that locality where they may be quickly found again, assembles in its ranks men more or less of a common acquaintance and community of localized interests and even kinships, has a continuous existence and passes the grandsons of grandsires through the same ranks as generations come and go, and beyond all that has an imperishable and altogether glorious State pride behind it that quickens the sense of responsibility of the men that serve and deters the possible coward from deserting when it is certain that he will be disgraced at home where his shame will be known, where it hurts the most.

Still more, it has been shown that most of the men in the National Guard to-day are earnestly anxious that the National Guard shall be truly federalized, that it shall actually become a recognized part of the United States military forces, that it shall be given a place among Uncle Sam's authorized and dependable soldiers, and that it may be given an opportunity to live down at last the old-time sneer that forever greeted the term "militia" when real soldiers were being talked about.

It is true that the National Guard as it exists to-day, or as it has existed for generations and as the popular mind has fallen into the way of regarding it, is something that has been bequeathed to the country through the sequence of history, and is not something made to order by the logic of latter-day events to meet modern necessities. It is true that, had there been no militia organizations of any kind when the Federal Constitution was formed, there never would have been the occasion for their existence along the lines they have followed since, because the States never would have deliberately invented little State armies for themselves in all probability.

But the fact remains that the Organized Militia is with us and is a far more excellent and efficient body of trained soldiery to-day than it ever was before, and far more competent in all respects than most people probably imagine as they think of some of the amusing features of the old-fashioned militia times that the elders saw and their children have read about; and it is something tangible, something right to hand with which to begin and to continue the creation of the Federal militia force that the continental army was meant to supply.

"FEDERALIZING" THE NATIONAL GUARD.

It is argued with great earnestness by many men whose opinion is well worth serious consideration that the National Guard can not be made an out-and-out Federal force under the provisions of the Constitution of the United States as they read to-day. On the other hand, this committee in its report cites the opinions of men who either assisted at the making of the Constitution or were living at the time and following the process of the argument that accompanied it, and they are all emphatically protesting that the Constitution has done to the militia the very identical thing that these men of to-day say can not be done with it—that is, divorced it from the States and nationalized or federalized it. This may, perhaps, very properly be regarded as something of an open question to-day, nevertheless.

For my part, I am inclined to believe still, as I did when I discussed the question more than a year ago, that there will still be necessary some reconstruction of the militia clauses in the Constitution of the United States before the federalization of the National Guard will be found to be wholly satisfactory or beyond dispute in emergency. It is not denied by anyone, however, that Congress never has yet exercised all the powers over the militia that are conferred upon it by the Constitution or to the extent that those powers are conferred. I believe it is worth while to consider whether it is not a fact that the rights of the several States not surrendered by them to the Federal Government in the Constitution, but reserved to them or to the people, were wholly civil rights and not military rights. The very purpose of the formation of the Constitution as stated in its preamble was, among other things, "to provide for the common defense."

At all events, whatever time may bring forth as this experiment at federalizing the National Guard is tried out, I firmly believe it is a start in the right direction and that it will work out more effectively to our purpose in the end than the continental army plan could possibly have done. There will doubtless be occasion to make some changes in this law as experience develops the need for them. I would not be surprised if it were found that, little by little, the States would themselves come to the conclusion that it was a mere waste of money for them to keep up their troops themselves and that if the Federal Government were determined to federalize the militia in law for the purposes of control and administration it would also be welcome to go still further and wholly federalize them in appropriations for their support. True to the drift of affairs in English-speaking lands, most of these things are brought about by evolution rather than by direct fiat of law.

Now that the tendency toward federalization of the National Guard is being helped by both law and public opinion, I am inclined to think that a few years will produce a change in the situation that will make the practical effects of the plan about as appreciable in the matter of federalization as if there had been an out-and-out amendment to the Constitution prescribing and enforcing it. I think it can be shown that the idea that the States and not the Federal Government had the first and sole control, generally speaking, of their 48 little armies has grown up not so much from strict test of law as by that very same process of evolution of thought and habit of thought on the part of both people and Government. I believe the fact that Congress has not exercised its full authority over the militia is the greatest reason why people have argued that it did not have much to begin with.

At all events, why not take the National Guard as it is to-day, federalize it as far as possible, as this bill proposes to do under the most liberal interpretation of the Constitution, and then let the same three years of experience with it that the continental army plan would have required when it started from nothing at all, determine what more must be done, if anything, to complete the work of making the militia a Federal force beyond all question and dispute? We shall be educating soldiers all this time and preparing for the national defense. We shall be utilizing what we have already in existence and making it more and better. We shall be recognizing loyal Americans who for years have made great sacrifices of time and leisure and money and put in incalculable periods of hard work for the development of a military spirit among the citizenry of the country, all out of national pride and true patriotic purpose. And we shall be preparing the way for public opinion then to determine whether it is well to have a federalized volunteer force of this kind or not, and, if the decision is, as it undoubtedly will be, that it is the thing to be done, then that same public opinion will regard the amendment of the Constitution to complete it, if such a thing be necessary, as a mere matter-of-fact thing that ought to have been done long ago. It is only in such orderly, evolutionary ways of popular education and practical demonstration of merit and need that anything substantial of any kind is ever successfully done with national institutions or constitutions—in this country anyway.

AMERICANS NOT YET A "RACE."

We Americans are prone to characterize certain races of mankind as volatile, effervescent in temperament; to say that they go off half-cocked in times of national stress or excitement; that they act by uncontrollable impulse in times of national crises, and are not guided by deep reasoning and cool, deliberate, logical thinking. And yet we ourselves forget that, with all the various agencies of immediate publicity that in one form and another disseminate ideas and conflict of ideas throughout this broad land of ours, we can and do ourselves at times arouse more tempests in teapots at the breakfast tables in our country morning after morning as the years go by than perhaps any other highly enlightened people on earth.

One reason for it is the very fact that our marvelous facilities for instant communication with one another or comparatively immediate transportation of persons and literature may be used as thoughtlessly at times as they may be employed to good purpose at others. We have here in America wonderful resources for invoking the often to be dreaded awful power of making 100,000,000 people all think of the same thing at the same time. Another reason for it is that, proud as we are of our national unity, of our fast growing and developing national self-consciousness, we are in fact anything but one people racially.

We are, considered in the matter of racial origin and characteristics, the most diverse people of a higher order of civilization assembled under one flag anywhere on the globe. We represent among ourselves the greatest variety of inherited racial characteristics, tendencies, traditions, sentiments, and ambitions that can be found anywhere on earth in any one compact territory that is governed by the most enlightened standards of the most enlightened people now making history. It is our magnificent hope that time will mold us all into a homogeneous mass, with such a blend of all that is best in every family among us that there shall some day inhabit this part of the earth the noblest and best of all races that ever came out of the womb of time, and that that race will be called American.

But there is no such thing as an American race to-day, unless we find it in the Indian. We are not a race; we are simply a political entity.

WHAT AMERICAN CITIZENSHIP MEANS.

If this were the time and occasion to go further into the philosophy of our present situation and discuss some very pressing social and political problems that are vitally involved in it, we might ask ourselves some very serious questions and lay down some mighty important postulates.

Say what we will about troops and armament, tactics and strategy, military strength potential and military strength immediately available, the first step in national preparedness for the liberties of peace or for a war of defense is to find out who among our own citizens are at heart truly American nationals, and who, on the other hand, sharing our plenty and abusing our hospitality, are masking under the guise of nationals while their hearts beat to the rhythm of war drums that may some day sound the call to arms against our very selves.

We have been all too indulgent and easy-going in this land for many generations past, have paid little heed to some of these problems that must one day come to vex us if we do not arouse to them before it is too late. It is high time we began to find out for ourselves at least two things about our boasted American citizenship: First, what duties and obligations, what aspirations and consecration to national ideals, it entails upon those who bear its privileges here at home among us; and what guaranty of protection to life and property it carries with it when those who bear it venture on peaceful errands abroad.

However, we are not to deal with that aspect of the situation now in the consideration of this pending legislation.

But we ought not to lose sight of the lesson of all this as we give our best thought to the consideration of this very question of preparedness for national defense. After we have made due reckoning of all the factors of proper national self-respect, all the truly patriotic impulses that should animate us in our relations to each other and to the world; after we have consulted the best practical idealism that estimates our due share in the attainment of a higher civilization and the means of wisely safe-guarding every element in it after it has been made our own, we should still think of the stubborn fact that just at this time, with all the Eastern Hemisphere ablaze with war, we are likely to entertain ideas and advance propositions for future national security and the sacrifices that ought and must be made for it that by and by, in cooler, calmer times, we shall not be quite so willing to undertake.

We are daily persuading ourselves that we are very serene and coolly calculating about this, but we know in our heart of hearts that we would not be human beings like our unfortunate brethren in the battle fields across the seas if we were not subconsciously, at least, influenced in some degree by the smoke of gunpowder that is wafted into our own peaceful atmosphere from the horrible scenes abroad. It would not be extravagant to say that no country is in its normal thinking mind to-day, nor could it be expected to be with pretty much all the world turned upside down.

THE WORLD TURNED UPSIDE DOWN.

Now, I believe that just because pretty much all the world appears to be turned upside down is the first and greatest reason why we should make most unusual preparations for national defense. I believe with all my soul that our present-day Military Establishment is most inadequate even for its purposes in normal times, and glaringly so as related to the conditions of to-day. I abate not one jot or tittle of my implicit faith in the proposition that this country now needs and will continue to need a scheme of national defense and the military force to realize its effectiveness that is far and away greater than anything we have ever maintained before. I even go so far as to argue that our danger from possible war is not so likely to be realized in the midst of the present European conflict as it will be when that war is over—perhaps years after it is over.

So that I am not yielding any of my convictions upon the immediate necessity for preparedness for war when I still further urge that we must, at the very time we are planning the reorganization and reconstitution of our military forces on a greater scale, keep also in mind that fact, that we are making these estimates and doing this work in the heat of an atmosphere surcharged with abnormal forces and relations of forces. For that reason we must by the best that is in us so lay our plans at this time that we shall not find that we have been carried beyond the reasonable bounds of far-sighted prudence and committed ourselves to some details and features of our enterprise that never will stand the test of calmer thought when the air is clear once more. In other words, we are hoping to build for the Army this time something that will remain with us as a permanent establishment, something that will be so carefully deliberated, so wisely constructed, that the greater part, at least, of its essential features will stand the test of time in our generation, war or no war.

The air is just now full of all manner of suggestions for the practical realization of the great patriotic impulse that is behind this whole idea. Men are promising the greatest of personal sacrifices of time and leisure, the most laudable devotion of self-denial for years to come, that they may, as they say, learn how to be soldiers and be enrolled as part of the citizen soldiery sworn to the national defense in time of need. Propositions for this and for that organization or undertaking on the part of all classes of people among us are seriously put forward on all sides, some of them with palpable germs of practicality in them, some of them as empty as dreams. The whole country is stirred to a pitch that one might almost call military ecstasy about these matters, and good resolutions are fast making easy a good many national regrets hereafter.

What I want to suggest is that in the midst of all this we keep our heads, that we never forget how prone we are to these great and noble impulses, how easily we make these splendid resolutions of self-denial and tax-bearing in time of stress, and how easily, like the poor, weak mortals that we are, we forget all about them when the excitement is past and gone.

BUILDING FOR THE FUTURE.

I want to see our military establishment reconstructed on greater and stronger lines than ever before. But I want the plans so well laid, so carefully deliberated, so sensibly estimated, that they will stand the test of both peace and war. We are planning a great military institution while the tide of popular excitement is running high. I want its foundations so well laid and its superstructure so secure that we shall have all of it left to us in that inevitable day when the tide goes out again.

So much for the general character of the propositions put forth in this bill. I will not attempt to discuss the measure in detail because all that will be done by the committee when the bill is considered in debate under the five-minute rule. I want to say something now about the urgent necessity for making plans for national defense at this time, regardless of the particular merits of this or any other similar measure that may come before us in this Congress.

THE PROBLEM OF NATIONAL DEFENSE.

The truth is that the minds of the American people that once not a great while ago would have been shocked beyond expression at the mere suggestion of the Lusitania affair have been for so long fed daily upon the bloody details of the horrors of the world's greatest war of all time that they are becoming well-nigh benumbed, losing their sense of proportion and the true perspective of human sympathies and emotions. Indeed, we stand so far self-accused in this regard that we must plead guilty of what would in normal times amount to a constantly diminishing self-respect, else we would never have peaceably submitted to the repeated outrages upon our citizens and the national honor that we have borne during the past 20 months. As we grow more and more calloused to these terrible tales of slaughter of human beings by wholesale, so we are, perhaps, more and more indifferent to the suggestion that war can ever come to us. We are well-nigh hypnotized by horror, and are no longer the coldly, sensibly calculating Americans that the world reckoned us in former days.

OUR DUTY TO THE WORLD.

Some of our friends have argued that any unusual increase in our military forces at this time may be construed as in spirit, at least, a threatened breach of neutrality, or, if not that, at best a policy that will prejudice our attitude before the world as a Nation religiously devoted to peace and anxious to play the rôle of peacemaker among the nations of the world. I am not so sure that this country has any mission in this direction. I am more inclined to the opinion that we will do better to demonstrate to the world that our own idea of a self-governing nation is a practical one and that it is working out its own ideals of peace in a peaceable manner right here at home than to set out upon any Quixotic notion that we are so spiritual ourselves, so highly illumined in an exalted sense of world responsibility, that it is our sacred duty to mind other people's business because they are incapable of doing it on such a high plane as we follow ourselves.

OUR DUTY TO OURSELVES.

But let me suggest this to those who fear the consequences of preparations of the character contemplated in this proposed legislation: If the present war in Europe presents a world situation so critical that the United States should make every honest effort to keep out of it, and if we are almost constantly trembling now with fear lest we be unable to do that, then it must surely be critical enough to warn us to stop and think and plan what we would have to do if we could not keep out, or if we should be involved in a war that might some time follow it.

If there is any one thing that the present situation of this country in this regard teaches us at all, it is that we have too long unheeded the repeated warnings of those among us who in years past have urged us to be ready for just such an emergency as confronts us to-day. Advocates of national preparedness of yesterday were laughed to scorn as they foretold that some day this country might find itself threatened by war with a superior armed power. Not a day goes by now that does not see us trembling lest we wake up on the morrow to find it so.

SOME MISTAKES OF PACIFISTS.

Still we are asked, "What is behind all this agitation for national preparedness for war?" The answer is simply, "History." Nations are no better in morals, no loftier in purpose, than the individuals that compose them. That sounds rather platitudinous, to be sure, but like many other platitudes it has fallen on dull ears too many times already. We keep going on about our business here in this country, generation after generation, serenely trusting to the fond hope that inasmuch as we have no national purpose to despoil other peoples, no other peoples will ever be tempted to despoil us. It is true we read in school days of wars that were largely inspired by the same old human greed of gain and lust of power and dominion, but we closed the book and our education at the same time, lulled our fancy with the comforting thought that all history was made and imprisoned between book covers before we came on the earth.

We soothed ourselves with the comforting reflection that nations have become "civilized" in our own time and never will make war any more. It is true that now and then this solacing philosophy has been jarred a bit by some warlike demonstrations in other parts of the earth. It is true that we have seen war follow war in some regions remote, maybe, but the warning did not come home to us, and we were well-nigh on the way toward scrapping every battleship that was not already decaying of its own accord, dismounting every fieldpiece and burning up the very formula for making gunpowder, when the greatest war of all history broke out, to include within its belligerents well-nigh all the civilized world but us and a few small neighbors.

I repeat, nations are no better in morals, no loftier in purpose, than the individuals that compose them. Indeed, one might very well undertake to contend in an academic discussion of the proposition that, if anything, they are worse. It is a fact well known of our own experience that many a man will blink at his Government's doing a thing that for moral reasons he would not think of doing himself. Government is an impersonal, intangible thing, you know, while human beings must face direct, immediate, and personal responsibility for their own acts.

"THIS IS THE LAST OF WAR."

After every war of modern times there have not been lacking men to prophesy that that was the last of war. After every war of unusual duration, that left nations apparently exhausted by the terrible struggle, left them to mourn enormous losses among the finest and the best of the manhood in their lands, left them to care for multitudes of widows and orphans, left them to help support a mournful roll of hideously crippled veterans, left them to rebuild waste places, regain commerce, struggle beneath a burden of debt, and wrestle with desolation, hunger, disease, and poverty—after every such great historic catastrophe many men have said that such a nation can not for many a generation, at least, become a belligerent power again and participate in another such struggle as that which recently well-nigh wrecked it forever.

And yet every lesson of history from the earliest times proves exactly the contrary. One has only to study for a little while the history of Europe from the days of the Napoleonic wars, a little over a century ago, down to the present time to find that nation after nation went through just such an experience only to emerge in the end with a reinvigorated vitality, a new national consciousness and pride, a reawakened national purpose, and the inspiration to a redoubled and better organized energy that raised it to a plane of economic wealth and social greatness it had never reached before. One may debate the contrariness of logic, the seemingly inexplicable ordering of things that brings this all about, but it is the truth, and every page of history that deals with war testifies to it.

I will admit that simply because these benefits do come out of war despite its frightful horrors and unspeakable miseries is no reason why nations should invite war or even run the risk needlessly to become involved in war. War is a calamity to any people that must bear it, no matter how beneficial to posterity its results may ultimately prove to be. But I do suggest that when we know that any civilization that is destined to live at all and is founded upon race ideals that are determined to persist is not ruined by war, when we know that war does not have the effect of putting these great nations out of the forces on this globe to be reckoned with even to the death, it is folly for us in America to sit idly by with contentment in our fool's paradise and say, "When this war in Europe is over all the powers will be so exhausted that they can make no more war, and we shall be safe."

THE MENACE TO THE UNITED STATES.

What is likely to happen after the great European war is over? Of course, the wise man will not prophesy much in detail about such a thing as that, but the man of ordinary vision, if he interprets a few simple lessons of history the way they have interpreted themselves from generation to generation for many centuries, may easily lay down a rough outline that it will be safe enough to keep in mind and prepare for, on general principles, at all events.

Remember, first, that for several decades past the United States has been steadily climbing toward the first place in the world's industrial wealth and commerce. It has been notoriously the most prosperous country on earth, and, as such, the most envied. While in the natural course of events it would have taken, perhaps, many decades more before its growth in business and money profits would have placed it in the lead, the war has had the effect of arresting the competition of its most dangerous rivals, of diverting their opportunities for gain to itself, or even causing them to pour hitherto unheard-of sums of money from their own lands into our coffers.

So, not because we have all at once developed a superiority in industrial pursuits and commerce of our own accord, but simply because we have through the caprice of fate become the residuary legatee of a great part of the world at war, it is not improbable that we are destined to take this long-sought first rank among the powers of the earth soon after the war is over, if we do not even hold it now.

In the stress of rivalry among nations for wealth and power, competition is for the most part invariably directed toward the leader for the time. Community of interest, not by any means inherent friendship, makes all secondary powers in the race more or less regardless of one another while the struggle continues among them to gain the trade and its opportunities for wealth and aggrandizement that the leading power is withholding from them all in common. Hitherto, while viewed with ill-concealed jealousy as some day to be the leading power in this race for world wealth and commercial supremacy, the United States has been comparatively free from most of the frictions and international disputes that inevitably accompany this race for dominion in the trade of the globe's markets. We have been permitted to grow practically unmolested because the powers of continental Europe had other aims for their enterprise and energy, and our hour had not yet struck.

COMMERCE BREEDS WARS.

When this war is over, when the nations of the Old World set about recouping their fallen fortunes, rebuilding their forges and factories, making their devastated lands once more inhabitable and productive, once more seeking for the old and for new avenues of trade by which to repay the staggering financial losses that have befallen them, when the taxpayers of these countries begin to groan under the awful burden of debt that is piled up on their shoulders and that promises to be bequeathed as a melancholy legacy to generations yet unborn—then will be the time when all the eyes in the Eastern Hemisphere will turn with envious glances to the young giant of the western world who has fattened during the period of their misfortunes. Then will be the time when the United States will begin to feel the pressure of trade rivalry as it has never felt it before.

And if we learn anything from the history of commerce, we know that, directly or indirectly, it is the cause of more wars in these modern times than probably any other interest of mankind.

Of course nations in these days of so-called enlightened civilization are altogether too cunning to make the greed of trade and commerce an ostensible and avowed cause for war. But commerce, the pursuit of world trade, more than any other one thing is the occasion for constant and complicated personal relations of the peoples of the various nations of the earth with each other. It brings into the closest of association or the keenest of rivalry the wits and interests of men from the uttermost parts of the earth. It is the occasion of a never-ceasing coming and going up and down upon the waters of the earth. It assembles in all harbors ships of peace and ships of war of all manner of men. It employs every means of transportation from burden-bearing coolies to the fastest of modern express trains in every corner of the earth, and jostles together in the most freakish way and often under the most delicate and strained circumstances strange men from strange lands that know little in common except the desire for money.

And the trade of the world is capricious. Every textbook on political economy may work out what theory it will about the balance of trade and the ideal system of world marketing and exchange of products and commodities with equal benefit to both sides to the transaction, so that all the ledgers of all the world may show trial balances that figure out all sides making a profit, a just and altogether righteous distribution of gain, and all the world prosperous and happy. And then comes along some circumstance altogether unforeseen and unforeseeable, and a large part of the earth may be lacking food at home and have no sufficiently available credit in any bank or foreign exchange with which to relieve the distress of its own people.

Through all such diverse ways as these commerce constantly sows the seed of friction among the people of the world. An agency of untold, incalculable benefit to humanity and civilization in its primal intent, it is at the same time the potential parent of hatreds and wars innumerable, and always has been.

DANGER TO US WHEN THE WAR IS OVER.

So I say if we are not to have reason to dread war in the midst of the terrible conflict now raging in Europe—and I doubt very much if we are—we must not lose sight of the pregnant fact that after this war is over, after the nations now in arms have begun to recuperate and seek again their lost places in the world of trade and industrial progress, the United States of America, the only great power on earth unscathed by this terrible affliction, the only great power sustaining no losses of account by it and actually waxing rich and richer indirectly because of it, must take heed lest it find itself for the first time in its history the solitary object of the jealous rivalry of any or all the powers of the Old World.

INTRIGUES OF FOREIGN DIPLOMACY.

If we are attacked at all, if we are drawn into a war at all, it doubtless will not be by a manifest declaration of hostilities based upon an openly avowed jealousy and covetousness. It will be the result of probably several years of oft-repeated disputes and friction, all growing out of the complexities of intercourse in the struggle for world trade, and each put away in memory to tally one on the score of bitterness and hatred until the opportune day dawns when shifty diplomacy and unscrupulous intrigue can so cunningly play the cards that the United States will be at war with a jealous rival who maintains, maybe with some superficial show of reason, that the responsibility for any war at all is all on us.

In days that do not go back of our own generation just exactly this same shrewd play has been invoked by nations in Europe, and with success.

"BALANCE OF POWER" DOCTRINE.

Undoubtedly one of the results of the European war will be something of a readjustment of social and political conditions and policies in the nations now at arms against each other. There is much reason to anticipate that such will be the case, and there might be some satisfaction at other times and in other places in dwelling upon some of the aspects that these changes are likely to take. But there is one possibility among them that I think we can not afford to neglect just at this time. In the first proposal of it perhaps it may be thought by some to be rather fanciful or a strain of the imagination, but stranger things have happened, for all that, and this may be one yet to happen, for all that we know now.

For many generations before the present conflict the statecraft of Europe has occupied itself, among other large continental problems of concern, with attempts to maintain what was known as the balance of power among the nations with their ever-increasing multitudes of people that were forced to dwell together in its cramped and confining area. The constant fear that some great militaristic nation would sooner or later gain dominion over the territory by subduing to its rule the various nations and races beside it and compelling them to support it by their own industry, taxation, and military service as the only means of preserving their physical existence at all, has been responsible for this European doctrine, and the resorts it has followed to keep patched up and presentable from generation to generation what has amounted to nothing less than an armed truce that finally burst out into the present horrible conflagration.

During the progress of this policy of maintaining the so-called balance of power, we have seen congresses of rulers and statesmen unblushingly rend smaller nations apart, upset their governments, distribute their peoples among their own dominions regardless of their natural inclinations or love of home and country, and even divide the men of one race, who by every instinct of nature would fare best in a governmental community of their own kind and making, and partition them off to each other with a nonchalance that was brutal even if enforced by a specious pretense of world safety and benefit to civilization. This game has been played before our very eyes for decades and even centuries, and yet we have tried to deceive ourselves into the notion that the world was growing better, that civilization was becoming more and more ideal, and that the lion and the lamb were fast getting ready to lie down together.

Once the races of men fought each other for temporal dominion largely, not merely because of the glory and pride of conquest, but because organized industry and trade were comparatively unknown and nations could prosper for a time by despoiling one another with the sword. Now comes the era of industrial competition and the struggle for dominion of the money markets of the world.

STRUGGLE TO REGAIN WORLD'S TRADE.

Let me suggest for your consideration the possibility that, after this war is over and the crippled combatants set about reestablishing themselves in industrial pursuits and wealth against the next great day of world conflict that is bound to come, maybe the doctrine in Europe will be, not the resumption of the old policy of balance of power, so far as military strength and territorial aggrandizement go, but the balance of power in the world's trade. What if there should prove to be some day a combination in Europe to control the trade of the world? What if these powers now at war with each other, realizing for a time to come the futility of hostilities for any purpose of territorial expansion, should all see a common rival and a common interest in a common rival, especially if the bread and butter and clothing and comfort of their people, now made unspeakably miserable by the calamities of war, should be seriously restricted by the quasimonopoly of commerce and trade held by any more favorably situated peoples—and those peoples should happen to be over here in America?

"WHO IS TO ATTACK US?"

But we are asked, "Who is to attack us?" The answer is and must be, "We do not know." And not to know who our possible antagonist may be is even more threatening to our security than if we did. A foreseen foe may be anticipated, his warlike preparations discounted, his probable strategy forecast and studied, and his armed strength and matériel estimated and may be overmatched. At all events, in long eras preceding the actual clash of arms, it is possible to safeguard in many ways against the menace and encroachments of a nation that maybe has some historic reason for revenge upon us or easily understandable and plain temptation to aggrandizement at our expense. It is the element of surprise, the menace of the unexpected, that is most to be dreaded in war.

When we enter at all upon speculations about war, we must prepare our minds to set aside pretty much all the rules and maxims by which men and nations may calculate their expectations in intercourse with each other in times of peace. According to the spirit of Christian civilization, war is an anachronism, and like all such is not reducible to the common laws of common times and experiences. We may study history and philosophize over its lessons as we will, in the end we may be reasonably sure of only one fundamental conclusion: That war always has been, is now, and shows no sign of cessation, and that the wisest man on earth can not tell when, where, and why the next war may break out.

FUTILITY OF FORECASTING NATIONAL POLICIES.

If it is more or less idle to attempt to forecast reasons why one nation may or may not go to war with another, it is no less so to speculate why such and such nations are likely to form offensive and defensive alliances. There often appears to be a suggestion of logic in the lay of events and conditions that prompts such a forecast, but history repeatedly shows how vain it is. I am moved to dwell upon this for a moment because some of our brethren have been more or less busy in later months figuring out various combinations of world powers that would do thus and so to our possible enemy, if by any unlucky chance we should become involved in war ourselves. And the general trend of their prophecies has been that other interests than ours would help to protect us against any likely foe when we did not even half try to protect ourselves.

In this connection we might do well to remember that the Triple Alliance appeared to be a fixture in European policies. Germany, Austria, and Italy might be depended upon to stand by each other in war, and every calculation of theorists appears to have been based upon that as a foregone conclusion. But when the strain came, Italy left her partners and joined the allies. Japan and Russia, that only a few years ago were locked in combat, are now sworn allies, and there is talk of the warmest reciprocal understanding between them when the war is over. The Crimea in 1854 saw Russia fighting Great Britain, France, and Sardinia, or the beginning of the present Kingdom of Italy. Sixty years later all four of these powers are aligned to fight two empires that in the form we know were not in existence at that time. And similar instances may be multiplied as long as one is content to keep at the books and pick them off.

GREATEST CRISIS IN HISTORY CONFRONTS WORLD.

This is a sobering and a solemn problem that confronts us. It is not one to be discussed with easy elegance of rhetoric by literary assemblies in most approved academic atmosphere, coming to no resolution thereon; not one to be declaimed with mock-heroic outbursts of pseudopatriotic spirit on popular platforms, pledging all America to one sublime self-sacrifice, coming to no resolution thereon; not one to be flippantly ridiculed out of all consideration as the mere phantom of disordered imaginations or the subtle device of greedy capitalists to fool the multitude for more inordinate gains, showing no possible resolution whatever.

Whether we like to acknowledge the bitter truth or not, we are face to face with a world crisis such as was never before written in all the story of mankind.

No matter how deeply intrenched were many of our hitherto cherished ideals of man's duty to himself and his neighbors, no matter how eagerly some of us had begun to welcome what were believed to be the first most promising signs of the dawn of universal peace and the realization at last of the brotherhood of man, we find ourselves—all of us, of whatever opinion—face to face with a staggering reality.

One might almost say without conscious exaggeration that the greater part of the world has gone mad.

There is no more safe reckoning upon what sensate beings and responsible governments of their own making or choice may be inclined to do or may do in the midst of the terrible strain that is now put upon the minds and impulses of millions of our fellow creatures with deadly weapons in their hands and all the malice of war, death, and destruction in their hearts. Mere philosophizing, academic speculation upon probabilities, or any other similar resorts of reason and judgment approved in normal times are not safe guides alone in this extremity.

WE HAVE NO "FRIENDS" EXCEPT OURSELVES.

Saddening as the thought must be to all of us, the people of the United States must make up their minds that, tried in the last test, measured by the last rule, weighed by the last scruple, they have no certain friends upon this broad earth except themselves.

And they must quietly, reasonably, and with cool, calm deliberation prepare themselves to face any eventuality that may be the immediate or the distant product of this awful world cataclysm.

We have great reason to hope and to believe, it is true, that in some way or another the old order of things will some day right itself and be even a better order of things than we have ever known before. It has always proven so before in other times of national peril, and it will doubtless prove so yet again, or else all our conceptions of Providence have gone a-glimmering and the world is given over to chaos and self-destruction. We must not believe that that can be true; but we can not doubt—we must not, in peril of our very national existence, dare to forget—that while civilization is shaken to the very center as it is, we owe it to ourselves and our posterity as sensible men to take every reasonable precaution against a world that is running amuck.

AMERICA'S EXPERIMENT OF SELF-GOVERNMENT.

Three hundred years ago the fathers founded on this virgin continent the beginnings of a social order and political idealism that we have fondly called our American concept of civilization. It was an experiment in a new kind of government for mankind, an experiment that was designed to evolve new ideas and realizations of civic liberty, freedom of mind, and social righteousness. It is still an experiment. The fathers fled from the oppression and tyranny of centuries-old institutions of government and social order in Europe to plant this new idea of man's destiny in a new land. Succeeding generations of men have watched and tended it as it grew and flourished, and each in its turn has poured out its lifeblood in war that it might survive.

All through the ages at various times and in various lands other men have sought to work out other experiments in government and social order that might bear some fruit of hopefulness for the ultimate freedom of mankind. All of them in their turn have failed and been forgotten, save here and there one or another that has been set up to be tried since the American idea has given such promise of some day being realized in very truth.

NO PLACE LEFT TO BEGIN AGAIN.

The world has been becoming crowded since the days when the fathers of American liberty found this new land open to their mission, so that to-day there is not a spot on the face of the earth where any people of race stock sufficient to achieve great things of world moment may go and undertake their mission for humanity in a region unoccupied and suited to their life and its necessities.

The world's greatest experiment in the struggle for the emancipation of mankind from the thraldom of the errors of the past is taking place right here in America to-day, the last bit of earth providentially left open and unpeopled for countless ages after the world was old, indeed. If our experiment fails, either through our own folly or that of our children, or if it fails because we do not prize our institutions and our civilization enough to defend and to die for them there is no other land on the face of the globe where the same or a better experiment under similar conditions may be begun again.

Let us have something beside dollars and cents in our calculations upon the great problem that is before us now. Let us partake of something of the noble sentiment that through all these generations since Plymouth Rock and Jamestown has made such ungrudging sacrifices for us. We are not a warlike people by instinct or cultivated nature. We do not design to make war upon other peoples. In the midst of all the frightful carnage, the cataclysm of horrors that shocks the civilized world to-day, we may well fear the worst even as at the same time we fervently hope for the best. This matter has passed beyond the stage of mere political economy or cash balances and businesslike reckoning on probabilities.

We are driven to the necessity for arming ourselves, not to enlarge or stimulate our civilization by conquest, but actually to preserve it from possible destruction.

The world calls us commercial and greedy. Shall we not show it, if need be, that we are ready to fight to the death to protect something we regard as infinitely higher than factory chimneys?

This extract from President Monroe's message of December 3, 1822, referring to conditions in Europe, reads as if it might have been written to-day, and is as true to-day as it was when Congress heard it 94 years ago:

* * * distant as we are from the troubled scene and faithful to first principles in regard to other powers, we might reasonably presume that we should not be molested by them. This, however, ought not to be calculated on as certain. Unprovoked injuries are often inflicted, and even the peculiar felicity of our situation might with some be a cause for excitement and aggression. The history of the late wars in Europe furnishes a complete demonstration that no system of conduct, however correct in principle, can protect neutral powers from injury from any party; that a defenseless position and distinguished love of peace are the surest invitations to war, and that there is no way to avoid it other than by being always prepared and willing for just cause to meet it. If there be a people on earth whose more especial duty it is to be at all times prepared to defend the rights with which they are blessed and to surpass all others in sustaining the necessary burthens and in submitting to sacrifice to make such preparation, it is undoubtedly the people of these States.

Mr. KAHN. I yield to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. POWERS].

[Mr. POWERS addressed the committee. See Appendix.]

Mr. KAHN. Will the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. DENT] kindly use some of his time?

Mr. DENT. I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. QUIN].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Mississippi is recognized for 15 minutes.

Mr. QUIN. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, I desire to say that this bill, as you see from the report, comes from the committee with a unanimous backing. Democrats and Republicans alike all agree to this bill. While there are some features in it that every man could not subscribe to, yet as a whole the committee have reported to this House what they considered the best bill that could be brought forth under all of the circumstances. According to the judgment of a large majority of that committee, a standing army of 140,000 men is all that this country needs now, and the committee had to back them in their judgment the Secretary of War, Hon. Lindley M. Garrison, and the Chief of Staff, Gen. Scott, both of whom your committee recognized as able to give advice on that vital question.

The National Guard provision is a substitute for the continental army scheme that was proposed by Secretary of War Garrison and connived at by some few others. The committee believe that the National Guard is the proper source from which a citizen soldiery can be drawn in this Republic. The National Guard in each State will naturally get the best, the most active, and among the most patriotic young men of each community, and the evidence before our committee demonstrated that the present National Guard of 129,000 men is composed of strong, virile, and patriotic young men.

Then the question of the federalization of the National Guard came up. There are many good lawyers on the committee, and we are advised that the President of this Nation had some of the best lawyers at his command to pass upon the question of the constitutionality of this provision; and it is the unanimous belief of your committee, and the opinion of the legal advisers of the President, that the scheme of federalization comes within the Constitution, and that in the imminence of war or in actual war every member of the National Guard at once, which means each company, battalion, and regiment, with their officers, as units, drafted by the President, becomes a member of the Standing Army of this Republic, and the companies, battalions, and so forth, as units, will become units in the Regular Army, to be sent without the borders of this Nation or anywhere else where duty may call.

So that question is, in the minds of the committee, absolutely settled. Your citizen soldiery then will be built up to a number equal to or greater than the continental army scheme proposed.

Then the cost amounts to little. This bill provides that the private soldier in the National Guard gets only $48 a year provided he attends all the drills required. The captains and all officers above him get $500 a year, first lieutenants $240, and second lieutenants $200 a year, and nobody else to be paid any officers' salaries. From an economic standpoint the National Guard was the only proposition that your committee could say would build up a strong citizen soldiery in this country at a very small cost. We owe it to the taxpayers of this country to consider them first in the formation of the citizen soldiery. No one, unless he goes back on the Chief of Staff, who is an expert, and on the Secretary of War, the highest authority of this Nation in the War Department, can believe that we are justified in calling up and making a greater standing army than 140,000. As the chairman [Mr. HAY] explained to you in his remarks, this bill has an elasticity about it that allows more than that number of men when the President calls. We know from the evidence before the committee that under present conditions you can not get a standing army in this country of more than 140,000 men. We know that men are not going to volunteer any faster in the future than they have in the past. With all of this talk about war, and the European war having been in progress for more than 19 months, the number of enlistments in the Regular Army has not increased, and it will not do so in the future. We are now almost at war with Mexico.

I have been one of those who believed that we ought to stay out of Mexico; but since Villa has come up into the United States, attacked a town, set fire to houses, and murdered women and children in the nighttime at Columbus, N. Mex., I am proud that the United States has seen fit to go after him. [Applause.] And I hope that they will send enough soldiers with big enough and long-range enough guns to shell the mountains and canyons of Mexico so that neither a jay bird nor a rabbit can live there for 16 months. [Applause.] I hope it will jar the whole population of Mexico to such an extent that they will remember it for 400 years and have respect for the American flag for all time. [Applause.] It is time that the United States Government is showing an iron hand in some matters, and in my judgment the President of this Nation has done the wisest thing possible when he has ordered the soldiery to go into Mexico and get Mr. Villa and that other gang of cutthroats, thieves, assassins, and midnight marauders. [Applause.]

But, gentlemen, it takes money and it takes soldiers to do that. Of course we know that Mexico is not much to contend with. We realize the fact that we must prepare in this country to protect the Monroe doctrine in Mexico, South America, and elsewhere, and in my judgment that is one of the main reasons why this Congress should pass this military program just exactly as this committee has brought it out, a wise, economic, and judicious measure, that patriotism and duty to our constituents, to every man and interest in this Nation, demand of this Congress.

This bill mobilizes the commercial interests and industrial enterprises of this country in time of war. It takes all of the present munition factories and puts them at the command of the President of the United States in war or imminence of war. This bill carries with it the idea that the railroads of this country shall be commandeered by the United States in time of war. In other words, it is a practical, sensible measure. It has in it the authority to establish a plant to fix nitrogen from the atmosphere. And let me tell you right now, gentlemen, if this Congress fails to put in the proposition to manufacture nitrates from the air it will be a most vital mistake, and you will be condemned from one end of this Nation to the other. The saltpeter mines down in the deserts of Chile, in South America, is the only source from which we can get nitrates to manufacture powder. The evidence shows that in times of peace you can get enough, perhaps, from coke and coal products; but for actual war necessities, estimated at 180,000 tons of nitric acid, we must have the power to manufacture nitrates, and the nitrogen must come from the atmosphere that surrounds mother earth. Nitric acid is an absolute requisite in the manufacture of powder and all military explosives. Then if we need national defense at all, this is the most necessary thing in this bill, and we must make it a part of the law in order to be safe from any and all enemies who might cut us off from the supply in Chile. The greatest benefit to the Nation will be in the establishment of the nitrogen industry as a sure source of powder supply in the event of war and as a great economical advantage in giving cheap fertilizers for the farmers in time of peace.

There are two reasons why this is the most necessary and vital thing for preparedness—both preparedness for war and preparedness for peace. You need this as an absolutely necessary potential of the essential element to manufacture explosives in time of war.

You need it in time of peace for fertilizer in this country. Do you know my friends that the great farming class of this country, according to the evidence before the committee, is paying about $75,000,000 a year for nitrogen that goes into fertilizers, and the bulk of it comes from Chile? Your Government, as an incident to this preparedness program should establish a plant, should cooperate with private capital; if the Government will not do it, to manufacture the phosphate or nitrate that goes to make up the fertilizing qualities of plants in this country. You can not possibly pass a real national-defense bill unless you have a nitrate plant established, and the evidence before our committee shows that it could be done by water power, and that is the only reasonable and feasible way by which it could be done.

It is proposed that this Government should construct a dam or dams and power house and install electrical machinery, in fact, develop the power and lease it, at interest cost to the Government, to a company for the sole purpose of fixing nitrogen in times of war, and in times of peace to make fertilizer for the farmers and all the powder the Government needs in peace time. Let every friend of the farmer in this Congress vote to force the Government to reach up into the atmosphere and pull down fertilizer at a cheap price for our farmers.

The American Government ought to go into the business itself; but I am convinced that a majority of the Members of Congress would never agree to that. However, a Member who can fail to agree that the Government should go so far as to cooperate with private capital with Government supervision to control the plant and manufacture all the powder we need, and as an incident the fertilizers that the farmers of this country must have and save the American farmers thereby $40,000,000 a year, in my judgment has a false conception of the obligation of this Government to the citizens. How can any of you vote against this provision?

My friends, if we have all the preparation on earth and fail to put in the construction of a plant for making nitrogen from the atmosphere, your bill is a failure if you have war with a nation which could control the nitrate from Chile. Your bill would be an absolutely nonsensical one, for what use is it to have a hundred thousand machine guns and cannons and hundreds of thousands of men in the field with rifles in their hands unable to do anything for the want of powder? If you cut off the supply that we now get nitrate from, where are you going to get it? It is as plain as it can be that in a very short time our country would be destitue of all powder and explosives. We can not get a plant ready for operation under 12 months. Our country would be panic stricken; and the American people will not be fooled on that.

Some gentleman said before our committee that we could not do it because of a lobby. Some few of our committee said this feature would cause us to be criticized by the press. I saw one young man representing the Farmers' Union of the country, and he said they were very anxious to get this nitrogen plant established so the farmers could get cheap fertilizer. I know he is right. I am for him and the farmers. I believe that the lobbyist here is the great Powder Trust that controls the saltpeter in Chile. I believe that is the lobby which is going to interfere and endeavor to keep this nitrate proposition from being made a law in this bill. That is the lobby I am afraid of. Now, I have not seen a lobbyist of the great Powder Trust, but I am like a farmer who passes by a little patch of vines and bushes in his field near the creek. He scents a very peculiar, strong, rank-smelling odor, and while he has not seen the polecat, yet he knows he is there, or has been there, because he can smell him. [Laughter and applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Mississippi has expired.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GARDNER].

Mr. GARDNER. Mr. Chairman, this bill makes a noise like preparedness; but it is not a noisy noise.

SUITS ALL THE NEAR PACIFISTS.

It is almost as still and almost as small as the still, small voice of the human conscience. This bill has not even awakened Henry Ford, and it has not brought a dissenting voice from a single one of the near-pacifist members of the Committee on Military Affairs. It seems to suit the pacifists all right. There are 91 pages and 20,000 words to this bill, and it gives us just two new regular soldiers for each word. Forty thousand additional Regular soldiers is what it gives us.

Plenty of words, but a scarcity of Regular Army men; and yet Regular Army men are exactly what we want and need.

THE REGULAR ARMY MAN.

There is nothing on earth that comes within gunshot of being "practically as good" as the Regular Army man. No amateur soldier can any more compare with a professional soldier than an amateur plumber can compare with a professional plumber. The lawyer who spends six days a week lawyering and one day a week soldiering is pretty certain to be six times as good a lawyer as he is a soldier. That is the fundamental trouble with our militia. Furthermore, I have not yet been carried away with this idea of an army of has beens, or reserves, as they are called; that is to say, an army largely made up of men who once upon a time have done a turn at soldiering. It may be all right to have a supplementary army of ex-soldiers, but I have a notion that the cheapest thing in the long run will be to maintain a good-sized regular force of about 300,000 men, and then train our boys so that they will all know something about how to fight if need be.

I believe in compulsory military training for every young man, be he the son of a beggar or the son of a multimillionaire. I mean real, hard military training under real, hard military discipline, day in and day out, for a substantial period of time. I do not mean high-school drill and I do not refer to armory evolutions once a week in the long winter evenings. That kind of thing is military drill, not military training, where every youth is compelled to learn to subordinate his will to that of his officers.

Do not misunderstand me. I am not advocating compulsory military service in time of war. I hope that we can maintain the Army by volunteers in time of war, but I want those volunteers to be trained men when they enlist.

NEAR FEDERALIZATION.

I think nothing at all of the alleged federalization of the militia provided in the Hay and the Chamberlain bills. You can not really federalize your militia so long as the States appoint the officers, and I confess that I do not see the logic of Uncle Sam paying soldiers that some one else commands. Think of it; this Hay bill, and the Chamberlain bill also, for that matter, actually proposes that the State governors shall continue to command these 48 little armies while the Nation pays a big share of the bill. Suppose that some governor, of Massachusetts, for instance, were to order out his army to suppress a strike, do you not think that Uncle Sam ought to have the right to say "Halt," if he did not approve of the governor's order of "Forward, march"? Well, if you pass either one of these bills, Uncle Sam will not have a word to say about it. He can pay the piper, but he can not name the tune.

WHY NOT LISTEN TO THE WAR COLLEGE?

What in the world is the use of having an elaborate War College here in Washington if we refuse to pay the slightest attention to anything which it says? Last summer the President asked for a report as to our needs in the way of an army. The War College replied that we needed an army of 280,000 regulars and 380,000 reserve regulars, not reserve militiamen, to make us safe against invasion, in case our Navy were unable to retain control of the seas. Instead of this force, the Hay bill gives us in all 140,000 regulars and 60,000 reserve regulars. Instead of 660,000, the Hay bill gives us 200,000 regulars and regular has beens.

WHAT THE NEW SECRETARY OF WAR SAYS.

For the balance we are told that we must depend on 48 little armies of State militiamen hastily consolidated under national control. Oh, it is true that Chairman HAY, in his report on this bill, gives us a table showing 1,324,790 men, which he says are "men who will be at once available upon the passage of this bill." Let us see how that is. On March 9, 1916, I wrote a letter to the new Secretary of War, Mr. Baker. Here is what I wrote:

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D. C., March 9, 1916.

To the honorable the SECRETARY OF WAR,
Washington, D. C.

SIR: On page 14 of Mr. HAY's report on the new army bill, I find a statement that 1,324,790 men will be at once available as a national force upon the passage of the Hay army bill.

Calculating in the same way as Mr. HAY's table is calculated, how many men are now available as a national force without the passage of any bill at all?

Very respectfully,

A. P. GARDNER.

Here is Secretary Baker's answer:

WAR DEPARTMENT,
Washington, March 16, 1916.

Hon. A. P. GARDNER,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

SIR: 1. In reply to your letter of March 9, 1916, I would answer the question therein contained as follows:

Using the same method of calculating as Mr. Hay adopted on page 14 of his report on the new Army bill, we should now have available, without any legislation whatever, approximately the following number of men who have had some military training:

Regular Army, including Philippine Scouts	100,000
Reserve of Regular Army	60,000
National Guard	129,000
Men trained and in the country	995,790
Total	1,284,790

In other words, the only immediate effect of the passage of the House Army bill would be the increase of the Regular Army by 40,000 men, and even that increase, being added in four annual increments, would require about four years' time to be recruited and a still longer time to become effective.

2. The fallacy of this method of calculation is shown by the following statement of actual conditions:

As a matter of fact, the reserve of the Regular Army at present amounts to only about 2,875 men. This number will increase gradually until, under existing period of enlistment, it reaches a maximum equal to about 40 per cent of the total strength of the Regular Army, or about 40,000 men for the present Army of 100,000 or 56,000 men for the Army of 140,000 provided by the House bill. The net increase in the reserve would ultimately reach about 16,000, but it would not begin to become effective until about three years after the passage of the bill.

Mr. Hay estimates that there are 995,790 men who have had military training and are now in the country. This estimated number includes 270,200 men who have passed through the Regular Army in the past 10 years, 395,590 men who have passed through the National Guard, and 330,000 men who have passed through military schools and colleges in the same period. No deduction is made for those who have died or become unfit for service.

From the annual reports of The Adjutant General we find that during the past 10 years there have been discharged from the Army 89,644 men who did not reenlist. If we estimate the number of these who have probably died or become physically unfit for service at 2 per cent per year, or 6,848, we would have remaining 82,796 instead of 270,200 as estimated by Mr. Hay. These 82,796 men may be considered as having been adequately trained at date of discharge, but subsequent changes in methods, armament, etc., and the long separation of many of them from all connection with matters military make it unsafe to consider them as adequately trained except with respect to discipline. Three months' intensive training probably would render them effective.

It is believed that Mr. HAY'S estimate of the number of men who have passed through the National Guard is substantially correct, but none of these men were really trained when discharged and about two-thirds of them were discharged before expiration of term of enlistment when they had received training ranging from that imparted in one day to that possible in a nearly completed enlistment period.

Although last year some 33,000 students at our military schools and colleges were receiving military instruction, only 5,200 of this number were graduated. Using the latter figure for computing the number who have passed through military schools and colleges during the past 10 years, we obtain a total of 52,000 instead of 330,000 estimated by Mr. HAY. The records of the War College Division show that, as a matter of fact, only about 40,000 have graduated during the past 10 years from civil educational institutions of all classes at which officers of the Army were detailed. Until three years ago military training in these institutions consisted almost entirely of close-order drill and ceremonies. Consequently none of these 40,000 graduates are adequately trained. The class which will graduate in 1917 will have received a much more adequate course of training.

The only adequately trained men in the country are in the Regular Army and Army Reserve. The National Guard, those who have served therein, and the graduates of educational institutions having military training should be considered as only partially trained.

The numbers of each are as follows:

Adequately trained:
Regular Army, including Philippine Scouts	100,000
Regular Army Reserve	2,900
Partially trained:
National Guard	129,000
Others who have had some training	241,800
Total	473,700

Included under the heading "Others who have had some training," are 82,796 who have passed through the Regular Army, about 132,000 less 2 per cent per annum allowance for deaths or physical disability, or about 121,200, who have completed an enlistment in the National Guard, and 40,000 less 2 per cent per annum allowance for deaths or physical disability, or about 37,800, who have graduated in the past 10 years from military schools and colleges. Except for about 1,100 graduates of military schools who have been listed by The Adjutant General, the Government has no knowledge of the present addresses of any of these 241,800 men nor of the number of them that would be willing to volunteer for service in time of war.

The passage of the House Army bill would increase the Regular Army by 40,000 men in a period of three to four years, would make a net increase of the Regular Army Reserve by about 16,000 men in a period of about seven years, and would also increase the National Guard and therefore the number of partially trained men available in the country, but to just what extent I am unable to predict.

You will, of course, understand that accurate information on this subject is not available, and that therefore the figures I am giving you are at best only approximate.

Very sincerely,

NEWTON D. BAKER,
Secretary of War.

Here is an analysis of Secretary Baker's comment on the figures in Chairman Hay's report:

CHAIRMAN HAY'S REPORT SAYS.	SECRETARY BAKER SAYS.
1. On page 14 of his report Mr. HAY says that 1,324,790 men will be at once available on the passage of the Hay bill.	Secretary Baker says that calculating in the same way as Mr. HAY calculates there are now available 1,284,790 men without passing the Hay bill or any other Army bill at all. The Secretary makes this comment: "In other words, the only immediate effect of the passage of the House Army bill would be the increase of the Regular Army by 40,000 men, and even that increase, being added in four annual increments, would require about four years' time to be recruited and a still longer time to become effective."
2. Mr. HAY says that the reserve Regular Army will be 60,000 men.	Secretary Baker says that our present reserve of the Regular Army is now only 2,875 men, but that it will ultimately be 40,000 men, whether the Hay bill passes or not. The Secretary further says that the Hay bill will ultimately increase the reserve by 16,000 men, but this increase will not begin to become effective until about three years after the passage of the bill.
3. Mr. HAY says that it is estimated that 270,200 former Regulars can be counted upon as part of our available material.	The Secretary says that only "82,796 instead of 270,200, as estimated by Mr. HAY," would be available. About these 82,796, the Secretary makes the comment that it is "unsafe to consider them as adequately trained except with respect to discipline. Three months' intensive training probably would render them effective."
4. Mr. HAY says that in the last 10 years 395,590 men have passed through the National Guard.	The Secretary says that Mr. HAY is correct and adds: "But none of these men were really trained when discharged and about two-thirds of them were discharged before expiration of term of enlistment, when they had received training ranging from that imparted in one day to that possible in a nearly completed enlistment period."
5. Mr. Hay says that 33,000 young men passed through our military schools last year. He, therefore, reckons that 330,000 of these young men have received military training in the last 10 years and accordingly should be reckoned.	The Secretary says that out of the 33,000 military students last year only 5,200 were graduated. On this basis, he says, "we obtain a total of 52,000 instead of 330,000 estimated by Mr. Hay."

A significant paragraph in the Secretary's letter is as follows:

The only adequately trained men in the country are in the Regular Army and Army reserve. The National Guard, those who have served therein and the graduates of educational institutions, having military training, should be considered as only partially trained.

The numbers of each are as follows:

Adequately trained—
Regular Army, including Philippine Scouts	100,000
Regular Army, reserve	2,900
Partially trained—
National Guard	129,000
Others who have had some training	241,800
Total	473,700

The Secretary concludes his letter with the following observation:

The passage of the House Army bill would increase the Regular Army by 40,000 men in a period of three to four years, would make a net increase of the Regular Army reserve by about 16,000 men in a period of about seven years, and would also increase the National Guard and therefore the number of partially trained men available in the country, but to just what extent I am unable to predict.

So you see that there is a good deal of difference between the estimate in the report and the estimate of the Secretary of War. The report estimates nearly three times as many trained and partially trained men in the country as the Secretary estimates.

EX-REGULARS DID NOT FLOCK TO THE COLORS.

Let us not fool ourselves into thinking that former Regulars will flock back to the colors in time of war. Has-been Regulars will not tumble over themselves in their anxiety to get killed any quicker than the rest of us. I hold in my hand a letter from Secretary of War Garrison, dated February 17, 1915. In it he informs me that in the Spanish War only 974 former Regulars returned to the Regular Army from civil life. It is true that many Regulars in all probability returned to the colors in the ranks of the Volunteers. Statistics are incomplete. Unfortunately, they were compiled only for the First Army Corps and for the second division of the Third Army Corps. A liberal estimate based on these incomplete figures would show that about 2,300 former Regulars, coming from civil life, enlisted in the volunteer service at the time of the Spanish War. This makes in all about 3,300 former Regulars who enlisted either in the Regulars or in the Volunteers.

And yet somewhere about 25,000 ex-Regulars who had been in the Army within the preceding 10 years were available for military service.

Here is an extract from Secretary Garrison's letter:

WAR DEPARTMENT,
Washington, February 17, 1915.

Hon. A. P. GARDNER,
House of Representatives.

My Dear Mr. GARDNER: I have the honor to furnish you with the following information bearing upon the queries set forth in your letter of the 10th instant:

* * * * * * *

2. How many former Regular Army soldiers reenlisted for the Spanish War either in the Regulars or Volunteers?

The records of this department show that during the 10 years ending June 30, 1898, 53,399 men had been honorably discharged from the Army for causes that would not render them ineligible for further military service. Of this number 26,271 reenlisted so as to make their service in the Regular Army continuous, thus leaving at large in civil life 27,128 men for the entire 10-year period. Of course, this number must have been reduced somewhat by casualties prior to the beginning of the War with Spain.

The records show that from April 1 to August 31, 1898, both dates inclusive, 3,162 men, who had had previous service in the Army, Navy, or Marine Corps, enlisted in the Regular Army, but 2,188 of these enlistments were continuous-service reenlistments of recently discharged men, leaving 974 as the number of former enlisted men of the Army, Navy, and Marine Corps who entered the Army from civil life during the period from April 1 to August 31, 1898.

The foregoing data, it will be observed, relate solely to reenlistments in the Regular Army and were ascertained only after a protracted examination of the official records. No compilation of data showing the exact number of former Regular Army soldiers who enlisted for the War with Spain in volunteer organizations has ever been made, but assuming that the data set forth in the inclosed table are representative of conditions among all the volunteer forces of the War with Spain, it will be seen that the percentage of men in volunteer organizations who previously served in the Regular Army was approximately a little over 1 per cent.

* * * * * * *

Very truly, yours,

LINDLEY M. GARRISON,
Secretary of War.

THE MILITIA.

As to the 129,000 men in the militia or National Guard it is hard to guess how many effectives we could depend on in the event of war. The outlook is disheartening for anyone who has watched the militia records for target practice and camp attendance. Even in this last year, with the European war in progress, over 43,000 militiamen failed to go to camp, according to the figures of the Chief of Staff, United States Army. Furthermore, in his annual report, the Chief of Staff tells us that out of 91,000 militiamen armed with a rifle, no less than 41,000 were so indifferent to their duty that they failed to show up for a single day's target practice throughout the entire year. According to this same official, our target practice "is in a fairly satisfactory condition in eight of the States and is unsatisfactory in all the others, with varying degrees of deficiency."

WHAT THE BILL PROVIDES.

Now, let us see what this bill actually does.

The Hay bill is a conscientious effort to build up an army without men. Counting the 20,000 men we voted the other day, the Hay bill adds 40,000 soldiers to the Regular Establishment, provides for picayune payments to militiamen in 48 different little armies, devotes a few paragraphs to regularizing instruction camps of the Plattsburg kind and to the formation of cadet companies, and doubles the number of cadets at West Point. The West Point provision is worth all the rest of the bill put together and a lot more besides. So far as the increase in the Regular Army is concerned, and so far as the summer camps are concerned, the bill is a Lilliputian step in the right direction. To regard this step in the right direction as an adequate satisfacton of the Nation's demand for preparedness is about as sensible as to regard the peanut tendered by some child's hand at the circus as an adequate satisfaction of an elephant's demand for food. What do 40,000 additional men amount to? If they were all well and strong, they might man a trench half the length of Manhattan Island, on which a part of New York City is built. If you were to put these 40,000 men in a trench here in Washington, with the left of the line resting on the Congressional Cemetery at Nineteenth Street SE., the extreme right would not reach beyond the American University on Nebraska Avenue.

Out of approximately 100,000 men in the Regular Army today we have some 35,000 available for a field or mobile army, as it is called. The rest of the men are in overseas garrisons or in the coast defenses or in the noncombatant corps. If we add 40,000 new men to our field force we shall ultimately have 75,000 Regulars for the field army of the United States, and that is all. Remember, however, that the Hay bill allows us four years' time for the recruitment of these 40,000 new soldiers. If we pass the Hay bill we shall ultimately have a force of Regulars in our field army sufficient to man the trenches along a 15 to 20 mile front, or about one-fortieth of the Texas frontier along the Rio Grande.

THE RECRUITING PROBLEM.

I believe that we are going to have the very greatest difficulty in the future in recruiting a Regular Army, and no wonder. We do not pay our soldiers enough. Fifteen dollars a month and all found, including quinine and coffins, does not offer men much inducement to hunt Mexican murderers where the ambushing is good. If we want good men for a good Regular Army we must go right into the labor market and compete for them. By the way, we voted the other day to increase the Regular Army 20,000 men, so that we could meet the Mexican crisis. If we need 20,000 more Regulars to fight Villa, how many more Regulars would we need to fight a real enemy?

DOES THIS BILL FEDERALIZE THE MILITIA.

Not being a lawyer, I do not propose to discuss the constitutional questions in this bill. As far as I can judge from the report made by the chairman, the committee feels that in its near-federalization plan a successful scheme has been hit on for circumventing that clause in the Federal Constitution which reserves to the States the appointment of officers and the training of the militia under Federal regulations.

The Missouri Military Council, whatever that may be, agrees with the committee, and so the committee quotes the council in Chairman HAY'S report. On the other hand, Secretary Stimson and Secretary Garrison insist that the Constitution can not be buncoed; and, by the way, Secretary Garrison underlined his opinion by resigning his seat in the Cabinet of the President of the United States.

Each side marshals the decisions and the views of the bigwigs. No one knows what the Supreme Court of the United States will think when it is called upon to decide the question. One man's guess is as good as another's, and my guess is that any plan for federalizing the militia under which every private carries a lawsuit in his knapsack is a pretty good plan to avoid, the executive council of the National Guard Association to the contrary notwithstanding.

Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. DOOLITTLE). The gentleman from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I was very much interested in what the gentleman said as to the overlapping authority of the President and the governors of the States. Suppose, to follow out the illustration the gentleman gave, that the National Guard had been ordered out by the governor to suppress a riot, and at the same time an invading force was landed in this country, who would have the authority, the President or the governor?

Mr. GARDNER. I can not answer the gentleman.

Mr. LONGWORTH. If the gentleman can not answer, I do not know who can.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman, I understand that the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GARDNER] has yielded the floor.

Mr. GARDNER. Certainly.

Mr. HAY. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARD].

Mr. GARD. Mr. Chairman, I rise at this time merely to ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD for the purpose of inserting in the RECORD at this point the text of a substitute which I will offer for section 18 of the pending bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARD] asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD as indicated. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The following is the substitute for section 18 of the bill referred to:

SEC. 18. That for the purpose of securing a sufficient reserve of officers for the military forces of the United States the President is hereby authorized to establish and maintain in civil educational institutions a reserve officers' training corps, which shall consist of a senior division organized at universities and colleges requiring four years of collegiate study for a degree, including those State institutions that are required to provide instruction in military tactics under the provisions of the act of Congress of July 2, 1862, donating lands for the establishment of colleges where the leading object shall be the practical instruction of the industrial classes in agriculture and the mechanic arts, including military tactics, and a junior division organized at all other public or private educational institutions, and each division shall consist of units of the several arms or corps in such number and of such strength as the President may prescribe.

That the President may, upon the application of any State institution described in the first paragraph of this section, establish and maintain at such institution one or more units of the reserve officers' training corps: Provided, That no such unit shall be established or maintained at any such institution at which an officer of the Army is not detailed as professor of military science and tactics or at any such institution which does not maintain under military instruction at least 100 physically fit male students.

That the President may, upon the application of any established educational institution in the United States, other than a State institution described in the first paragraph of this section the authorities of which agree to establish and maintain a two-years' elective or compulsory course of military training as a minimum for its physically fit male students, which course when entered upon by any student shall, as regards such student, be a prerequisite for graduation, establish and maintain at such institution one or more units of the reserve officers' training corps: Provided, That no such units shall be established or maintained at any such institution at which an officer of the Army is not detailed as professor of military science and tactics, or at any such institution which does not maintain under military instruction at least 100 physically fit male students.

That the Secretary of War is hereby authorized to prescribe standard courses of theoretical and practical military training for units of the reserve officers' training corps, and no unit of the senior division shall be organized or maintained at any educational institution the authorities of which fail or neglect to adopt into their curriculum the prescribed courses of military training for the senior division or to devote at least an average of three hours per week per academic year to such military training, and no unit of the junior division shall be organized or maintained at any educational institution the authorities of which fail or neglect to adopt into their curriculum the prescribed courses of military training for the junior division or to devote at least an average of three hours per week per academic year to such military training.

That eligibility to membership in the reserve officers' training corps shall be limited to students of institutions in which units of such corps may be established who are citizens of the United States or have legally declared their intention to become such, who are not less than 14 years of age, and whose bodily condition indicates that they are physically fit to perform military duty or will be so upon arrival at military age.

That the President is hereby authorized to detail such numbers of officers of the Army, either active or retired, not above the grade of colonel, as may be necessary, for duty as professors and assistant professors of military science and tactics at institutions where one or more units of the reserve officers' training corps are maintained, but the total number of active officers so detailed at educational institutions shall not exceed 300, and no active officer shall be so detailed who has not had five years' commissioned service in the Army. Retired officers shall not be detailed under the provisions of this section without their consent. Retired officers below the grade of lieutenant colonel so detailed shall receive the full pay and allowances of their grade, and retired officers above the grade of major so detailed shall receive the same pay and allowances as a retired major would receive under a like detail. No detail under the provisions of this section shall extend for more than four years.

That the President is hereby authorized to detail for duty at institutions where one or more units of the reserve officers' training corps are maintained such number of enlisted men, either active or retired, as he may deem necessary, but the number of active noncommissioned officers so detailed shall not exceed 500, and all active noncommissioned officers so detailed shall be additional in their respective grades to those otherwise authorized for the Army. Retired enlisted men shall not be detailed under the provisions of this paragraph without their consent. While so detailed they shall receive active pay and allowances.

That the Secretary of War, under such regulations as he may prescribe, is hereby authorized to issue to institutions at which one or more units of the reserve officers' training corps are maintained such public animals, arms, uniforms, equipment, and means of transportation as he may deem necessary and to forage at the expense of the United States public animals so issued. He shall require from each institution to which property of the United States is issued a bond in the value of the property issued for the care and safe-keeping thereof and for its return when required.

That the Secretary of War is hereby authorized to maintain camps for the further practical instruction of the members of the reserve officers' training corps, no such camps to be maintained for a period longer than six weeks in any one year except in time of war or when war is imminent; to transport members of such corps to and from such camps at the expense of the United States so far as appropriations will traveling to and from such camps and while remaining therein so far as appropriations will permit; to use the Regular Army, such other military forces as Congress from time to time authorizes, and such Government property as he may deem necessary for the military training of the members of such corps while in attendance at such camps; to prescribe regulations for the government of such corps, and to authorize, in his discretion, the formation of company units thereof into battalion and regimental units.

That when any member of the senior division of the reserve officers' training corps has completed two academic years of service in that division and has been selected for further training by the president of the institution and by its professor of military science and tactics and has agreed in writing to continue in the reserve officers' training corps for the remaining two years of his course in the institution, devoting five hours per week to the military training prescribed by the Secretary of War, and has agreed in writing to pursue the courses in camp training prescribed by the Secretary of War, he may be furnished at the expense of the United States with commutation of subsistence at such rate, not exceeding the cost of the garrison ration prescribed for the Army, as may be fixed by the Secretary of War during the remainder of his service in the reserve officers' training corps.

That the President alone, under such regulations as he may prescribe, is hereby authorized to appoint as a reserve officer any graduate of the senior division of the reserve officers' training corps who shall have satisfactorily completed the further training provided for in the preceding paragraph hereof, or any graduate of the junior division who shall have satisfactorily completed the courses of military training prescribed for the senior division and the further training provided for in the preceding paragraph hereof, and shall have participated in such practical instruction subsequent to graduation as the Secretary of War shall prescribe, who shall have arrived at the age of 21 years, and who shall agree, under oath in writing, to serve the United States in the capacity of a reserve officer of the Army during a period of at least 10 years from the date of his appointment as such reserve officer, unless sooner discharged by proper authority, but the total number of reserve officers so appointed shall not exceed 50,000: And provided, That any graduate qualified under the provisions of this section undergoing a postgraduate course at any institution shall not be eligible for appointment as reserve officer while undergoing such postgraduate course, but his ultimate eligibility upon completion of such postgraduate course for such appointment shall not be affected because of his having undergone such postgraduate course.

That any physically fit male citizen of the United States between the ages of 21 and 27 years, who shall have graduated prior to the date of this act from any educational institution at which an officer of the Army was detailed as professor of military science and tactics, and who while a student at such institution completed courses of military training under the direction of such professor of military science and tactics substantially equivalent to those prescribed pursuant to this section for the senior division, shall, after satisfactorily completing such additional practical military training as the Secretary of War shall prescribe, be eligible for appointment as a reserve officer and as a temporary additional second lieutenant in accordance with the terms of this section.

That the President alone is hereby authorized to appoint and commission as a temporary second lieutenant of the Regular Army for a period of at least six months, with the allowances now provided by law for that grade, but with pay at the rate of $100 per month, any reserve officer appointed pursuant to this section and to attach him to a unit of the Regular Army for duty and training during the period covered by his appointment as such temporary second lieutenant, and upon the expiration of such service with the Regular Army such officer shall revert to his status as a reserve officer.

That no reserve officer or temporary second lieutenant appointed pursuant to this section shall be entitled to retirement or to retired pay, and shall be eligible for pension only for disability incurred in line of duty in active service or while serving with the Regular Army pursuant to the provisions of this section.

That in time of war the President may order reserve officers appointed under the provisions of this section to active duty with any of the military forces of the United States in any grades not below that of second lieutenant, and while on active duty they shall be subject to the Rules and Articles of War.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. CRAGO]. [Applause.]

Mr. CRAGO. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, in approaching the subject of a military policy for our country we must accept certain fundamental principles of government before we can intelligently discuss a definite policy. First, I take it we must admit that it is the first duty of government to protect life and property, and in the final analysis a government must depend on its physical force to perform this function. Second, the physical force of a government to be effective must be organized, and whether this organization or mobilization shall be purposed to maintain peace or to successfully wage war if war comes makes but little difference. If we admit these propositions to be true, we must consider, first, the legal machinery by which it is possible to gather together or create this force, capable of meeting the demands made upon it, and, second, the adoption of a system in harmony with our principles of government by which we can have the services of our citizens in sufficient numbers to meet any emergency.

I believe that all sane people who have given this subject any real thought will agree that we as a Nation should take every necessary precaution to prevent war, and that most of them will agree that in preparing to defend ourselves we will to a great extent make ourselves less liable to attack. How far we shall go, what shall be the degree of our preparation, what, in fact, shall be the purpose of our preparation, is a question for the people to determine and is not a question for military experts to define or demand. The fact that military experts, so called, have attempted to dictate the military policy for us has made it difficult to get our people to agree to legislation which is really necessary. We value to the full extent the advice and the counsel of these officers as to the organization, the discipline, and the equipment of the different units of our Army, but the extent of it, the purpose of it, the means of calling it into being, is for the legislative branch of this Government, representing, as they should endeavor to represent, the people, who must provide the means for maintaining it, rather than for the men who live by reason of our Army and whose life work is given to the Army.

Do not misunderstand me. I yield to no one in my admiration and respect for the men of our Army—those officers who in time of war as well as in peace we must look to for the suggestions as to the best means of bringing efficiency out of the forces at their command. But for these men to dictate our military policy is much like our handing over to any other branch of our Government the making of the laws which will dictate the course of this great Nation of ours.

Any measures of preparedness should be based on our present needs, and should reflect an intelligent and permanent policy, dictated by experience and the recommendations of our best military authorities. But legislation by which we bring this about should reflect the sober, deliberate judgment of the representatives of the people.

It has been well said that inefficiency is a part of the price that democracy pays for the blessings of individual freedom and personal liberty, and we are not yet willing to admit that they are not worth the price. It is our duty, however, to make the price as small as possible, and to that end we must work for the greatest efficiency possible under a system harmonizing with our principles of government.

Much has been said concerning the bill now pending. I simply want to add here some words, referring particularly to the adoption of the National Guard as a part of the first line of defense. In order to continue a rational program of preparedness the National Government, in addition to perfecting our small Regular Army, should give immediate and continuous attention to the following: First, follow to the fullest extent the opportunity offered by the federalization of the National Guard; second, systematically mobilize our physical resources, to the end that we may know at all times that we have control of all materials necessary to maintain ourselves if entirely shut off from the rest of the world; third, encourage the States in their work of imparting military instruction and discipline.

Cooperating with the National Government, the States first should vie with each other in furnishing the General Government with the most efficient organizations of troops for Federal service; and second, the States should establish courses of military instruction in all schools, and in all medical schools receiving State aid, insist on a thorough course in military hygiene and sanitation; and third, the States should relieve the National Guard of any possibility of police duty [applause] by establishing a State police force, trained for this particular kind of service.

Now something has been said as to the constitutionality of this federalization, and I want to say here that, after studying this question to the best of my ability, I agree heartily with our honored chairman in the conclusion which he has come to, and I have no sympathy with those people who are depending on something that has never been decided by a court of law, but who are merely using in their arguments an obiter dictum uttered by some official whose opinion is not the decision of a court of last resort.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CRAGO. Yes.

Mr. FESS. I would like to ask the gentleman whether he knows of any experiment where a State has adopted a State constabulary to do away with police duty on the part of the National Guard?

Mr. CRAGO. I know of one splendid example, that of the State of Pennsylvania, where, about 12 or 14 years ago, against the protest of a great many people, such a course was adopted, and it has grown so in popular favor that to-day the 300 men of the constabulary in a State of 9,000,000 population have made it absolutely unnecessary to use the National Guard in such labor troubles as have occurred; and to-day you will not hear among people who condemned it in the beginning a word of condemnation against the splendid body of men that has been organized for that particular purpose.

Sections 23 to 78 of the present bill apply to the National Guard and are intended to provide such an organization and discipline for this part of the militia as will make of it a real Federal force. I recognize the fact that our people are not ready for universal military service and that we can not hope to maintain a Regular Army at such strength as to give us an effective first line of defense; and believing that from our organized citizen soldiery must come the officers and men who will be first called to the colors in time of danger, we have turned to the National Guard in the belief that this body of men who, with but little encouragement, have kept alive the military spirit in our country during the years that our people have been engrossed in industrial progress, will be able to provide our nation with a real Federal force, one in harmony with our high ideals and capable of being made a dependable force.

In proposing this legislation we are fully aware of the arguments which have been urged against such a course. Some of these arguments are advanced through ignorance of the real value and the present worth of the National Guard, while others come from men who have a personal motive in their attempt to belittle the possibilities of this body of citizen soldiery. No one who has served long in the National Guard will claim for it perfection, nor should we expect more than we have achieved under the conditions as they have existed. The men who are responsible for the proposed legislation realize that it means either the achievement of proper results from this plan or it means the complete disbandment of the National Guard as a Federal force.

We believe that to continue the present halfway system of support is money wasted, and that it is unfair and unwise to maintain an organization for military purposes which deceives its members into thinking themselves soldiers when they really are not, and giving our people a false sense of security by relying on a force which in the test might not make good. It is better that we have no National Guard, so far as Federal purposes are concerned, than to have one not up to such a standard of efficiency as will accomplish its real purpose.

I want to take up briefly the arguments against using the National Guard as a Federal force, and dispose of them in the light of the facts and the conditions which we hope will prevail when the federalized National Guard shall have a chance to demonstrate what can be accomplished. In dealing with the subject we must formulate a system not only to meet the present strong demand for preparedness, when men are giving their best thought to the subject, but a plan which will in the years to come give us the men so necessary to any effective fighting force. In doing so I shall compare our proposed system with that of the German Empire, which most people admit is able to furnish quite an effective military force. The difference in effectiveness as a result of their universal military service must be made up with us through the patriotic zeal of our citizens and a recognition, if possible, of the fact that the failure on the part of a citizen to do his share is just as culpable as his failure to perform those duties devolving upon him in behalf of those who are dependent upon him by reason of family ties—which common humanity dictates.

The first criticism is usually the fact that the National Guard is composed of 48 little armies, and I think I heard those words ringing in this Chamber just a few moments ago—48 little armies, each under a different commander and lacking uniformity, efficiency, coordination, and unity. I will answer this criticism by saying that under the proposed plan a unity of organization would obtain, and our National Guard would be as much under the control of one commander in chief, namely, the President, as the German Army is under the Emperor of Germany.

Let me quote from pages 321, 322, 323, 324, and 360 of "The German Empire," by Howard. We find here:

> Strictly speaking, the German Army is not a unit. Indeed, it may be quite properly said that there is as yet no imperial army, but simply contingents of the several States.
> The principle of unity in the military organization of the Empire is carried out in three ways: (1) By placing the supreme command, both in war and peace, in the hands of the Kaiser; (2) by introducing a uniform organization, equipment, and set of tactics in all the contingents; and (3) by meeting the expenses of the army out of the common treasury. From a military standpoint, as Laband concedes, the different contingents may be regarded as parts of a wholly unified army, but from the standpoint of constitutional law, which is the only point from which the jurist can view the matter, it is a fundamental fact that there is no imperial army; these words are simply a collective symbol under which the contingents of the several States may be comprehended.

I will take this occasion to answer briefly the question that was asked in regard to the use of State troops in case this country was invaded, and at the same time the State should have internal troubles. In the first place, such a contingency is unlikely to happen. These things do not occur in time of war, but only in time of peace. But the Federal control would, of course, be absolute on an occasion of that kind. I read further:

If it be true that the imperial army is but a name for the combination of the various contingents, what is the relation of the Empire to these contingents and what rights have the several States over their own armies? The answer grows out of the nature of the Empire as a Federal State. German jurists are generally agreed upon two points with respect to the nature of the Empire: First, the Empire is not a mere international arrangement based on contract, but a true State based on a constitution; second, the individual States, on entering into the Federal relation, ceased to be sovereign, but did not cease to be States. Each State has its own army, to be sure, but that army is recruited, organized, equipped, and drilled, not in conformity to rules and regulations laid down by the military authorities of the State, but the laws and ordinances of the Empire.

The matter of liability to military service, the recruiting of the various contingents, the qualifications and duties of officers, the establishment of a criminal code for the Army and the code of procedure in military trials, the maintenance of discipline, the whole arrangement of the military organization, the fitting out of the troops, etc., all fall within the competence of the imperial legislation. The States, indeed, possess military supremacy formally, but the material content and extent of this supremacy are determined by the Empire. The rulers of the several States are the heads of the various contingents; that is, the officers and men of the various contingents stand in a relation of immediate service to the ruler of the State to which their contingent belongs. They take the oath of allegiance to him and owe him their personal loyalty. Nevertheless they are all under the supreme command of the Emperor as head of the united armed forces of the Empire, and in taking the oath of allegiance to their own ruler they swear obedience to the Emperor at the same time. The Emperor has the right of inspection at any and all times, and he may order the remedying of any defects which such inspection may discover. Further, in the administration of their own contingents, the States, while actually conducting the work of administration, must keep within the bounds set by imperial law, the command of the Emperor, and the amount assigned to them out of the general budget. Any balance which may remain after the expenses of the military administration of any State are paid does not fall to the State, but flows into the imperial treasury.

Another provision here is:

It will be seen that two principles are at work in the military organization and administration of the Empire, the two principles which are always asserting themselves and seeking adjustment under the federal form of government, viz, the principle of unitarianism or centralization, which is constantly aiming to gather the whole power of the State into the hands of the Empire, and the federalistic principle, or principle of State supremacy, which seeks to preserve to the individual members of the Empire the largest measure of independence and control compatible with the efficiency of the whole. The very necessities of effective military organization demand that the supreme power and control be located at a single center, and that all the members shall be subordinate to this central authority. To reconcile this demand, which is vital to any successful military organization, with the justifiable desire on the part of the States and their rulers to retain and assert their own supremacy, is a delicate task and presents the problem which the imperial constitution attempts to solve.

The theory, therefore, on which the military powers are distributed is this: Every State has its own troops and is in possession of military supremacy. This supremacy is to be limited only so far as may be required in order to secure the unity of the federal Army, which is composed of these State troops.

In other words, in all these States making up the German Empire they appoint their own officers, and it is only the higher officers commanding the divisions who are subject to appointment by the Emperor of Germany. To sum up the organization of the German army, Laband puts it as follows: "To the Empire belongs the military organization and arrangement of the army, the supreme command in war and peace, the fixing of the requirements as to recruits and as to the budget of expenditures; to the States is left the formal supremacy over the contingents and self-administration."

Second, the appointment of the officers is in the hands of the different governors. This is a source of strength rather than weakness under the restrictions as contained in this bill. The States are never of one political complexion, and while partisan politics has never obtained in the National Guard of the larger States, even granting that it may in some of the States, is not the governor of a State as competent to select proper officers as the President, and is the power any more likely to be abused by a governor than it is by one man as President. Under the German system the officers are selected by the States.

Third, the right men will not join the National Guard by reason of fear of strike duty, and the unfriendly attitude of organized labor. This opens up an economic side of the question, one which goes to the very heart of our industrial system if it were entirely true, and would always so continue; but I believe this phase of the subject will eventually solve itself. To begin with, the National Guard was never originally intended for strike duty. Strikes are the product of our too rapid industrial development, and unfortunately we have been called on to pass through this period of our development. The necessity for such service is being lessened, first by organizing State police, trained for this particular service; second, by the better understandings existing between capital and labor. At times the use of the Guard in strike duty has been abused, and they were thought by the great corporations to be their servants and subject to their instructions when on duty. Their real duty was to see that the laws were not violated, and when in some cases they were used as an adjunct to the corporations, naturally this created a feeling on the part of organized labor which it has been difficult to correct. This phase of the subject affects but few States and will in time disappear once it is known that the Guard is a Federal force.

But, says some one, will not the legislatures of the States refuse to support the guard if they are not to be used in this strike duty? This has not been the result in Pennsylvania, where we have that splendid organization known as the State police, which is maintained by the State. The true theory is that the guard from each State will be that State's contribution to the Federal service, just as the theory of our representation in Congress should be that each State sends its representatives to Congress, not to get what they can for that State, but as the State's contribution to the councils of the Nation. I regret to say that many of the criticisms of our volunteer system in former wars are only too true, but these criticisms do not apply to the present Organized Militia any more than the deserved denunciation of the inefficiency of our little Regular Army of former years applies to our present splendid reorganized Army of to-day, the equal, man for man, if not superior, to any fighting force in the world. [Applause.] The critics give little attention to the fact that in the War with Spain and the Philippine insurrection the organizations of the National Guard were quickly utilized in forming an Army of the size desired, and that these men, after doing duty in the Philippines, when their time of service had expired by reason of the ratification of the treaty with Spain, when they knew that they were needed to hold our island possessions while months were being consumed in building up an Army to relieve them, did what no other American soldiers ever did, either regular or volunteer, agreed to stay on the firing line until such time as they could be relieved. [Applause.] And Congress has never yet given proper recognition of this sacrifice to duty.

And now, since I have touched on this service, you will pardon my personal testimony concerning the deplorable conditions which existed in the National Guard of the different States in 1898, not in any manner the fault of the States or the National Guard, but the direct result of the neglect of the National Government to properly arm and equip these soldiers.

When the call to arms was sounded we answered, and on the 28th day of April, 1898, these young men of Pennsylvania, taken hurriedly from their homes the day before, found themselves at daylight at Mount Gretna, Pa., where they were unloaded on one side of that bleak mountain without shelter of any kind. It was bitter cold, and in a blinding mixture of snow and rain we were compelled to pass the day waiting for canvas and rations. We were camped there several weeks being mustered into the service of the United States. We had in each company 55 uniforms and 55 guns for 75 men. We were sent across the continent in that condition, the men being compelled to occupy during the long journey the poorest type of day coaches. When we reached San Francisco we were issued 20 more guns of the same type as our others. In order to provide shoes for the men there was dumped in front of my tent a miscellaneous assortment of shoes—pointed toes, enamel leather, congress gaiters—of a type which had not been seen in a first-class shoe store for a generation. In fact, I am satisfied the entire lot was the output of some store which had failed years before. The men were given brown canvas overalls, and thus equipped we were loaded on to an antiquated vessel built for the coasting trade in 1874. The men were quartered below the water line, under conditions which would have brought condemnation from an immigrant inspector if imposed on the poorest type of immigrant.

We made the journey across the Pacific and finally landed on the island of Luzon and in a few days were in action with the Spaniards, where we found our guns were not equal to theirs. We were using old-fashioned black powder, with Springfield rifles of a type condemned years ago. We lived in the trenches until August 13, when we moved our men into the surrendered city of Manila, with more than 300 men in our brigade without even a semblance of a shoe on their feet, in a country where the soil is filled with malarial germs, where the natives never think of going barefooted. Before long we were battling with the Filipinos, who were armed with guns far superior to ours, furnished, as we were told, by German merchants. We were compelled always to advance under more than 200 yards of their fire before we could fire a shot in return, and practically every man we lost in action was lost in reaching the point where he could return the fire. When I recall these evidences of the criminal negligence of those whose duty it was to see that the young men who answered the call were properly armed and equipped, and when I think of what this cost, do you wonder that I am intensely interested in righting, so far as I can, this national disgrace?

We may here adopt the legal machinery for the formation of an army. If we have kept it in harmony with the human side of our problem it will accomplish its purpose. If not it will fail, but I have faith that its purpose and plan will find a response in the heart of every loyal American who loves his country and recognizes the fact that love and loyalty demand service. [Applause.] Very few of us will ever be called upon to bear the physical burden of whatever system we may here adopt. To younger men must fall the real service our country may demand, and so it does seem to me that as the representatives of the people, working for the perpetuation of a nation we love, we should all shoulder to shoulder present a solid line of determined action in the great task before us and so legislate that those who come after us may realize that we have contributed something of value to our country. [Applause.]

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. SHALLENBERGER].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Nebraska is recognized for 20 minutes. [Applause.]

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Mr. Chairman, in the short period of time allotted to me I wish to confine my remarks chiefly to the question which I believe is the one really in dispute as to this bill, and that is, What shall be the size of our standing Army? We have the past experiences of other nations as a light to direct our own actions at this hour.

I am not to be stampeded into enormous and useless expenditures for national defense because of the panic that has swept over this Nation by reason of the great war in Europe; but a study of the condition of the military arm of this Nation will, I think, convince any patriotic citizen that he is warranted in supporting the reasonable increases and program provided for in this bill.

Much as we may abhor war and cry out against it, there is nothing in the experience of mankind nor the history of nations to warrant the hope or belief that the world is yet growing weary of war. On the contrary, to-day, in the very center of civilization, mankind is blood-mad, and at any moment we may be drawn into the maelstrom of war that now roars around the earth. Neither religion nor civilization restrains the rage of nations. The most cultured and scientific peoples are the fiercest fighters. The experiences that now confront us on the Mexican border is evidence that at any day or hour the question of peace or war may be no longer a matter of our own choice. The gauge of battle may be thrown at us and we must be prepared to defend ourselves or be stricken down. We do not want war, but if it comes in spite of our wishes we want to win.

Let us hope that when peace comes to war-stricken Europe it will mean the beginning of the end of war; but if either side shall win a signal triumph I am fearful that the world will declare that the victory teaches a different lesson. If Germany and the Central Powers win, it will be heralded around the earth as proof stronger than Holy Writ that the greatest thing in the world is a 42-centimeter gun. If England and her allies triumph, it will be accepted as proof positive that the biggest thing in determining the destiny of nations is a battleship. If this should be the verdict of the world as the lesson of the present war, how shall we hope to escape the same curse while all the rest of mankind is taken. We are exactly the same flesh and blood, the same kind of people as those who are fighting like demons in countless millions over on the other side of the Atlantic. They are the same kind of men and women, the same civilization. America is what she is because she is the son and the daughter of Europe. We are no better or wiser than they. All of you are proud to trace your lineage there.

Left to ourselves, the power of public opinion and our splendid isolation may ward off the possibility of war. In Europe kings and emperors yet rule. They get together in secret conclave with their counselors and can bring war upon the nations, and the people are powerless to prevent it.

The only part the common people are allowed to play is to fight the battles in times of war and pay the debts in time of peace, and that is about all the common people are permitted to do in any land when war comes to it.

Two years ago all Europe was at peace, not one person in a million in all that Continent believed that the future held the possibility of war for them, but at about the same time we sent thousands of trained soldiers to Vera Cruz, Regular soldiers, trained to kill, armed to the teeth, and backed up by a great war fleet upon the sea; but we did not go to war with our southern neighbor, because the President knew that the great mass and body of the American people are in favor of peace and against war with Mexico or any other nation if it can possibly be avoided with honor. The glory of the American Government and its people is that public opinion is supreme, and the strength of the President with the Nation is that it believes his great heart always beats for peace. [Applause.]

The bill before the House provides, in my opinion, for a reasonable and efficient increase in the Regular Military Establishment. The additions provided for are demanded by the increasing population of the country and are necessary that the Army may perform its proper functions for the Republic in time of peace. It also takes the first step toward providing a force of citizen soldiery to fight the battles of the Nation in time of war. Civilization need not fear the fighting man when he is fighting on the side of humanity and justice. It has taken a thousand years of fighting upon the part of the masses of mankind to win the rights the individual now enjoys in time of peace. There will never be an enduring peace throughout the world until the red-blooded fighting men of earth begin to fight against war and the abuses of power that makes it possible for war to curse mankind.

The bill is properly designated "An act to increase the efficiency of the Military Establishment of the Nation." It provides for a maximum strength of 140,000 fighting men as the line of the Army. Those who ask for a larger enlisted strength for the Regular Army are confronted with the admitted fact that it will require the utmost effort of the recruiting arm of the service to enlist 140,000 men in time of peace. Personally, I believe the number of enlisted men asked for by the Secretary of War in his report to this Congress, which was 134,000 men, would give us an Army of sufficient size to perform all the duties required of the Regular Army in time of peace; but I realize that all legislation is the result of compromise, and I am willing to accept the added organizations and enlisted personnel as provided in this bill. The minimum strength of the enlisted force as provided in this act, when the four yearly increments have been enlisted, is 127,000 men. When we take into consideration that we have to furnish garrisons for our military establishments in the Philippine Islands, in Hawaii, and the Canal Zone, in addition to those for our fixed fortifications at home, it will be seen that the mobile force of the Regular Army, as provided for in this act, will not be excessive in time of peace.

The record shows that Congress has been generous in the matter of appropriations for the Army in past years, and if we are lacking in those things that are essential to the effectiveness of the Military Establishment it can not be justly laid at the door of the legislative branch of the Government. In round numbers, since 1901 this Nation has appropriated for the support of the Military Establishment $1,700,000,000. During the same period the expenditures of the German Empire for the same purposes have amounted to $1,650,000,000, or practically the same expenditure as ourselves. With this money they armed the nation and builded a military establishment that is the wonder of the world.

This bill recognizes as one of its fundamental features the futility of relying upon a standing army to defend the Nation in time of war. A standing army is now recognized as essential as a training school for the Nation in time of peace, to develop trained officers of high efficiency and furnish the first line of defense if war shall come. The item of expense alone precludes the possibility of maintaining a standing army in sufficient numbers to defend a nation the size of ours in warfare with a first-class military power.

That distinguished advocate of a large army, the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GARDNER], proposes that we should increase our standing army to something like 250,000 or 350,000 men. This would increase our military expenditures by hundreds of millions, but a difference of a few hundred millions of dollars does not seem to startle us any more, when military affairs are concerned.

Mr. QUIN. Will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Yes.

Mr. QUIN. The gentleman from Massachusetts did not explain how they were ever going to get these men, did he?

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. No; and no one has explained that yet. That is one thing that has never been explained. Such an army would require an annual appropriation of something like $300,000,000 or $400,000,000 annually, and even if we were able to enlist an army of that size in time of peace, which is believed impossible by those the best informed upon the subject, an army of that number is only cannon fodder for a week or two of conflict in modern warfare. The greatest mistake that we could make, in my opinion, would be to adopt the idea that with an army of 250,000 Regulars we would be safe from invasion. It has been the practice of many countries in the past, when the people have grown rich and prosperous, to become indifferent and not willing to play the part of men in defending the life of the nation and to rely upon a professional army as a bulwark behind which the balance of the nation could rest at ease. Such a policy has always resulted in disaster when the system has been put to the real test of war. England was the last nation of Europe to rely upon a standing army of professional soldiers in numbers something like that advocated by many preachers of preparedness in the United States. Behind the bulwark of her battle fleet she felt herself secure with this obsolete military system. When the crisis came and that professional army was thrown against a nation of citizen soldiers in arms—and no men ever fought more bravely than this British army—they only served as a block for a week or so to stay the war chariot of Germany, until the citizen soldiery of France stopped the Teutons at the Marne. [Applause.]

Mr. KAHN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. If it does not take too much time.

Mr. KAHN. Does the gentleman contend that these citizen soldiers whom he speaks of were untrained men? They had had three years' and two years' training, respectively.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. I understand that; but after all they were just the same kind of soldiers that this Nation is going to obtain under this bill. They were not professional soldiers. They were not men reenlisted over and over again and maintained in a standing army, but they were men who took the duty of citizenship upon their shoulders, received their military training, and then went back to the avenues of peace, ready to come to the defense of the nation when it called them. That is the kind of an army program I am in favor of, and that is the only kind of an army program that will properly defend this country in time of war. [Applause.]

A century ago the kings and emperors of Europe relied upon a standing army of picked professional soldiers as a means of defense both for themselves and for the nation. The art of war became largely a thing of discipline and display. Suddenly the new Republic of France sprang into being and armed a nation of citizen soldiers, who, under the leadership of Napoleon Bonaparte, the greatest military genius the world ever knew, ran roughshod over the professional armies of Europe. But Bonaparte taught the Germans the secret of his power, and Prussia began to arm the nation. The story is told over and over again how Scharnhorst and Gneisnau trained the 42,000 men each year that Napoleon allowed them in their standing army until they had a nation of citizen soldiers, each trained for a year. With this army they overthrew Bonaparte at Leipsic, and later on with Wellington wrought his everlasting defeat at Waterloo.

In the Middle Ages the professional soldiers of Europe were men mounted upon horseback, clad in armor. The man upon horseback is yet a synonym for the soldier. They were robbers in time of peace and pirates in time of war. The standing armies of Europe in that age consisted largely of paid mercenaries, who fought solely for loot and pay. Charles the Bold, of Burgnundy, was the most powerful military prince in all Europe. He was the richest potentate of his time. He owned Burgundy and Lorraine, the fairest part of France, and the Provinces on the Rhine. He possessed Flanders and much of what is now known as the Netherlands. He claimed a part of Switzerland, and finally, in order to win for himself a crown in place of a ducal coronet, he claimed sovereignty over the men of the mountains. When he went forth to battle 20,000 knights, mounted on great horses and clad in shining steel, rode in his train. The men of Switzerland had neither horses nor armor. They were trained to fight on foot. They were armed only with an axe, a sword, and a spear. They were a nation of fighting freemen, just as they are to-day. They came down out of the mountains, and three times they met the knights of Charles the Bold in open field in pitched battles, and three times they overthrew him; and the last great fight cost him his kingdom and his life. And when the battle was ended his 20,000 knights laid dead upon the plain beside him or were scattered to the four winds of heaven; and for the first time in a thousand years these mountaineers of Switzerland showed the world that brave men fighting on foot are invincible against the man on horseback.

We have heard a great deal about the necessity for officers to make an effective army. Much is made of the wonderful military inventions that are revolutionizing the art of war; but we hear very little of the common soldier, and yet he is the very heart, the lifeblood, of every army. The ability to secure him is the one problem of preparedness.

We read much of the great guns the Krupps have builded—the "Brummers," the 42-centimeters—those great cannon that can hurl a projectile weighing 2,500 pounds loaded with high explosives 20 miles across the face of the world. The highest point in the trajectory of the shell as it flies is 7 miles above the earth. That is 2 miles above the highest mountain upon God's footstool. When it falls upon a fort or an intrenchment and explodes it digs a hole like the crater of a volcano, and the earth shakes with the detonation of the shell. But the gun does not win the victory; it never takes the fortress; it does not deliver the last shock of war.

We are told of the famous horsemen of the armies of Europe—the Cossacks, the Uhlans, the Cuirassiers—mounted upon great horses, with rattling sabers and flashing spears, a hundred thousand of them dash by, and the earth trembles from their charge. An inspiring spectacle, the most thrilling in war. But they do not achieve the victory. They do not win the fortress. They do not take the city. No! The horsemen and the cannon only prepare the way. After the horsemen have gone by and the guns are silenced, then come the men; the men on foot, the common men of Europe; millions upon millions of them. The real fighting force of every army is the men who fight on foot. Every great battle of history in the last 300 years has been won by the common soldier, with his gun in his hands. The one lesson that war always teaches is that man himself, in the strength that God gives to us all, is yet triumphant over everything else upon this earth.

To-day the German people are fighting a wonderful battle to maintain their place in the center of Europe. The Slav pushes down from the north and the Latin hammers at them from the south, and the Anglo-Saxon thunders upon the deep from the west, and yet the Teuton holds his own. The whole nation is in arms and fighting for its life. The armies of Germany are not made up of professional soldiers. They are citizen soldiers, fighting for little or no pay. They are fighting now as that people has always fought when they have been united. When divided into separate governments and dependent upon professional armies they have always been easily overthrown. Their struggle for "a place in the sun" in central Europe has been going on for 2,000 years. They have never carried their battle flags to other continents for conquest. They are the only great European nation of which this can be said. But the German fights fiercely when fighting for his home and the fatherland.

The first glimpse we get of the German in history illustrates how invincible an entire nation is when aroused to arms. The armies of Rome in the days of her military glory were composed of legions of men who fought for the preservation of the Republic. When her emperors gained the throne they came to rely upon a standing army, and the first time that the Roman legions of the emperors met a people in arms, the armies of the Empire went down to defeat. Two thousand years ago, at the dawn of the Christian era, Octavius Cæsar sat upon the throne of Rome and ruled the known world. He heard that away off in the North and in the West there had arisen certain tribes of barbarians who dared to deny his edicts and dispute the authority of imperial Rome. So he called to him one Quintilius Varus, his general. He said to him, "Go out against these men; bring them once more under our yoke; put the foot of the conqueror upon their necks; bind their chief men to your chariot wheels; and bring them here to make a Roman holiday." So they gathered together a mighty army of black-browed Roman veterans, and your history will tell you that for 500 years in conflict with the barbarians a Roman army had never known defeat—

> Oh, gay, yet fearful to behold,
> Flashing with steel and rough with gold
> Was that bright battle front.

And in the vanguard, the imperial eagle of almighty Rome flapped his wings—and so they marched away.

Now, these German tribes had heretofore been easy prey to the Roman arms, for they were divided among themselves and fighting with one another, and in the open the Roman short sword and Roman discipline were invincible. But there had arisen a man in their midst. We know not what his name was. The Romans called him "Arminius," but we know that was only a corruption of the German "Herr-man"—the lord, or chief man. But no matter what his name was, he was a hero, and he bound those different warring factions together into one harmonious whole.

He said, "My people, united we stand but divided we fall, and we will no longer fight these Romans as the Romans fight, but we will fight them as Germans fight, with our homes and our families and our country at our backs." And so they took station in a great wood, the Teuterberger wood, and they placed the women and the children and their property in the center and the warriors formed a mighty ring about them, for that was the way that people fought in ancient times, so that every man would have behind him all that life and home held dear. After days of waiting the Roman army drew out in the open and for days they tried to entice the barbarians out, but at the command of Herman they stood fast in the forest. At last the word for the Roman onslaught was given, and though their soldiery performed prodigies of valor, though their cavalry charged like a whirlwind, unbroken was the German ring. Every time that a man went down there was a hero ready to step into his place, and if any coward dared to give back the women and the children drove him once more to the fight, and the end was that after three days of most fearful fighting that grand army that had followed the mighty Julius Cæsar from Spain upon the west to India upon the east, through one long series of unbroken victory, was absolutely annihilated and left its bones to rot in the Teuterberger wood. And when the news of that dreadful disaster, the most fearful that ever came to the Roman arms in conflict with the barbarians, was brought to Octavius Cæsar, where he sat upon his throne of gold in the imperial palace of the Cæsars at Rome, and he thought of his once proud army that had followed him to victory upon a hundred hard-fought fields now lying dead in that far-off German forest, he cried out in the agony of his soul, "Quintillus Varus, restore me my legions! Restore to me my legions!" And throughout the ages that has been the cry of every ruler and of every people that has relied upon a standing army as its bulwark of defense in the hour of the nation's peril.

It is because I do not want that cry ever to be heard in America that I am for this bill. The standing army of this Nation is officered by as brave and competent men as can be found in any army in all the world. The fighting quality of the enlisted men is not surpassed by the soldiers of any other nation. The effort of the Republic must be to train and arm the citizen who in time of peace produces the wealth and prosperity of the Nation and will be the bulwark of its honor and its glory in time of war. To add another regular soldier to our standing army above that provided for in this bill would, in my opinion, be a waste of public money. It is a demonstrated problem that we can maintain an army of a million trained citizen soldiers, the equal of the best armies in Europe, for about the same expense as the cost of a regular army of 100,000 men.

We should provide in plenty the best rifles and field artillery and ammunition and all other military equipment necessary to arm the manhood of the Nation. The first step should be to put a rifle, such as our regular soldiers are armed with, behind the door of every householder in this Nation and provide the means whereby the citizens of the Nation can learn to shoot that gun. If we will arm and train the manhood of the Nation, we can produce an army at little cost that, bulwarked behind the two great seas that beat upon our eastern and western shores, will stand like a stone wall against every foe that can be brought against it. [Applause.]

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. TILSON].

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Chairman, it is a long span of time from the days of the Roman legions, so eloquently described by the distinguished gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. SHALLENBERGER] who has just taken his seat, to the present year of grace; but during all the centuries that have intervened wars have occurred and recurred at shockingly frequent intervals. Nor is there any hopeful sign now visible that the day is near at hand when war will be no more. In spite of this fact, the subject of national defense, which always should be one of overwhelming importance, only recently has come into its own in the public attention of this country. It is well that it should enter into the thoughts of the people. It is a hopeful indication that "preparedness" has become a sort of national slogan, and I sincerely hope that out of it all there will come a reasonable, sensible, sane preparation for the primary duty of national self-defense.

It is not usual for me to take my political philosophy from Kansas, but a signed communication which I saw printed in the Topeka Capital a short time ago contains a bit of philosophy which to a certain extent represents the attitude of the extreme pacifist. It is entitled—

"THE FABLE OF THE OSTRICH."

"An ostrich with plumes of great value roamed peacefully about his accustomed haunts when he heard the sound of guns in the distance. He realized that this meant danger and that some avaricious hunter might take a notion to shoot him. But he philosophized with the following arguments:

"I do not know who this possible enemy is, therefore I am safe.

"I do not know, but think that some one will defend me in case danger should come.

"I am not sure, but I think those defenders are well enough armed. Jingoes say they are not, but jingoes take the word of those who make a business of fighting, who, of course, know nothing about it.

"The enemy is so exhausted from shooting that he will be unable to shoot me.

"If some one should attack me, I could instantly turn myself into a lion and repel the attack with ease. Anyhow, it is wrong to fight under any circumstances.

"I will not take refuge behind a fence or building, because the chances are that somebody got a 'graft' out of building them.

"There are two or three places on the boundaries of my domain where it is impossible to break through. Therefore I am safe.

"Although I have my faults, I feel that I should pose as a model of virtue, an example to the whole world. Therefore I will not resort to resistance.

"I believe in taking things as they ought to be instead of as they are.

"I do not believe in being prepared. I will stick my head in the sand and forget that there is such a thing as trouble.

"Moral: Ostrich plumes for sale." [Laughter and applause.]

It would be a sorry spectacle to see the tail feathers of the American Eagle on the bargain counters of any of the countries across the seas.

Before beginning my remarks on the bill I would like to say a word in regard to our chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HAY]. His able leadership and the broad-minded patriotic spirit exemplified by him during the consideration of this bill in committee are worthy of commendation. The members of the committee differed sharply as to many things, and yet, out of all of these disagreements, he has brought in a bill upon which the entire committee has agreed. No member of the committee would have written this bill just as it stands. A part of the committee, just as patriotic as the rest, believed that there should be no increase in the Regular Military Establishment. They yielded much to their colleagues and deserve great credit for it. Others thought the Regular Army should be somewhat increased, some more than others, but no member of the committee and no one who appeared before the committee, including many distinguished military officers, favored a large standing army.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. TILSON. Yes.

Mr. MONDELL. Do I understand that the committee will stand by the bill as reported?

Mr. TILSON. What does the gentleman mean by "standing by"?

Mr. MONDELL. Resist amendments to increase.

Mr. TILSON. No such condition was sought to be imposed. Not only that, but it was thoroughly understood that at every opportunity during the passage through the House or in the later stages those who believe there should be an increase are expected to utilize every opportunity to endeavor to get it.

Mr. MONDELL. Then I understand that, while the committee reported the bill unanimously, the members do not consider themselves bound to resist important changes in the way of increase?

Mr. TILSON. That is correct. I do not believe that anyone on the committee considers himself bound to refrain from increasing the bill if he so desires and is able.

Mr. BENNET. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TILSON. Yes.

Mr. BENNET. I suppose that the committee would resist any attempt to change the title or to strike out the enacting clause?

Mr. TILSON. All of us think that this bill is very much better than the existing law, and therefore we are in favor of the bill and will support it.

Mr. BENNET. That is, if you can not get anything that is thought to be better.

Mr. TILSON. Those who wish to increase the Army or change other features of the bill have the liberty to try to do so.

It seems to be conceded, Mr. Chairman, that in a war of any magnitude citizen soldiery must be used. The Regular Army is considered as a model, a sort of school of instruction, as well as a national police force and a nucleus around which the real Army of defense must be built. There was no contest in the committee between a big Army and a little Army. The only question was just how large our little Army should be. The maximum fixed by the committee was somewhat less than a respectable minority of us thought it should be. It is fair to state that this minority was not made up on party lines. After all, so far as this point is concerned, it is only a question of numbers, and those who thought there should be more had no difficulty in agreeing to the bill as reported.

As to the distribution of the small increase among the several arms of the service, there was complete unanimity that the Field Artillery should be increased. The lessons of the European war undoubtedly demonstrated that need. There was quite general agreement that the Infantry and Coast Artillery should be increased. Other increases of importance were made in other branches of the service, especially in the Medical Corps, the final addition being made by a committee amendment which the chairman will offer.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TILSON. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. BORLAND. I notice that there are no increases provided for in the regular cavalry service of the Army. Is it contemplated that there will be increases encouraged in the militia, or the reserve force, of the Cavalry?

Mr. TILSON. It is hoped that there will be a considerable increase in the Cavalry and in the Field Artillery in the Organized Militia of the several States.

Mr. BORLAND. The gentleman is aware now that there has been a great deal of difficulty in doing anything of that kind formerly?

Mr. TILSON. Yes; and of the many difficulties in the way. One of them is the greater expense of Cavalry and Artillery.

Mr. BORLAND. But plenty of material for Cavalry is available if proper arrangements could be made for it by law?

Mr. TILSON. Plenty of it; and if the Government will encourage it I think there will be an increase in the Cavalry and in the Field Artillery.

It was brought home to the committee quite forcibly that more officers are needed. Good officers can not be produced easily. Their training is a matter of considerable time. Therefore it clearly appeared to be one of the duties of the committee to materially increase the number of officers. Besides the addition of officers provided for in the new organizations, almost a thousand extra officers are provided for, to be used largely for the training and instruction of the National Guard and in schools and colleges where military instruction is given.

Then there is a provision for an officers' reserve corps, which it is contemplated will produce eventually a large number of officers ready for service in time of war.

Another important step in the right direction is the provision for a reserve. The object of this step is the building up of a trained reserve to fill up the ranks of organizations to war strength in case of war. In my opinion it might have been more effectively done by a somewhat shorter service with the colors, but the step is in the right direction. Four years ago I introduced into the Sixty-second Congress a bill providing for the beginnings of such a reserve. I submitted to the House at that time facts and figures to show how such a reserve could be established and maintained. I pointed out the importance of having trained men rather than raw recruits to fill up our skeleton organizations. I called attention to the fact that we were missing an opportunity to conserve for possible use one of our most valuable national resources—the men whom we had trained at considerable expense for military service. Unfortunately, I was somewhat ahead of the time, and my voice was like one crying in the wilderness. It attracted little attention then, but it is gratifying now to see the same idea embodied in this bill.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TILSON. Yes.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I would like to inquire of the gentleman, if he is not about to state it as he proceeds, how much of a reserve that would now have created if his plan at that time had been carried out? I would like to know, if we progress further with the bill, how many we could obtain in the future in this way?

Mr. TILSON. If my bill had been adopted four years ago, it would have been in full operation now only one year, so that we should not have had a very large reserve, but we should have had something.

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. What would it be now, if it had been put into effect then, is what the gentleman from Iowa inquired.

Mr. TILSON. If it had been put into effect at that time, it would have taken three years before anybody could have gone into the reserve at all, and therefore it would have been in full operation only one year at this time.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. And after that how many?

Mr. TILSON. After that it was contemplated that it would furnish something like forty or fifty thousand a year—I do not now remember accurately, but something like that; perhaps not quite so many.

Mr. GARDNER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TILSON. I yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. GARDNER. How many years' service in the reserve, according to the gentleman's plan?

Mr. TILSON. My plan at that time was three years' service in the reserve, three years with the colors, and three years in the reserve. I would now make it two years with the colors and four with the reserve. By a committee amendment we have gone one step further and provided that in time of war a reserve battalion shall be raised and maintained for each regiment at the front. One of those who seemed to appreciate the reserve idea in the Sixty-second Congress was my friend, the distinguished gentleman from Arizona [Mr. HAYDEN]. When it was decided for me that I should take a two years' vacation from Congress he came to me and asked the privilege of taking over my mantle in this particular matter, and he has done some very excellent work along this line. The committee amendment, which will be presented to the House, for a reserve battalion for each regiment in the field is almost entirely his work. One of the most deplorable defects of our lack of system in recruiting that bore the most bitter fruit in the Civil War was the lack of such a reserve to supply wastage and keep the ranks of well-trained regiments full. In that war scores of new regiments were raised and rushed to the front to be slaughtered because untrained, while regiments of seasoned troops at the very zenith of their efficiency were permitted to waste away to the size of small battalions.

After all, important as the Regular Establishment is, it would be comparatively insignificant if we ever became involved in a great war. It should be so, for no country should attempt to maintain a professional army large enough for such a task. It is a question whether any nation with such an army could long remain free. Great wars have been and must be fought, not by a professional army, but by the citizen soldier. Napoleon is credited with saying that there are three essentials for war; first, money; second, money; third, money. Surely there is one other requisite, and that is men. In the United States we have the men and we have the money. The problem is to properly utilize both for our national defense. Untrained men and gold coin are alike unavailing for the purpose. Both must be brought into condition for use in order to be effective. Unless this is done the former become only cannon fodder and the latter good only for tribute.

In some observations submitted to this House a few days ago, February 29, I called attention to some very necessary special tools and appliances that can be procured at comparatively small cost and will do more than any other one thing to make us ready to realize our material resources quickly in the way of providing arms and ammunition. It is my intention to offer at the proper place an amendment to this bill that will authorize the preparation in advance of these special appliances. I now bespeak your interest and votes in the adoption of such an amendment. I believe there will be no difficulty in convincing this House and the people of this country generally that the principle of the amendment which I shall offer and have been advocating for some time must be adopted and thoroughly worked out, and, when that is done, the problem of producing matériel for war is far on the way toward being wisely solved. I think it is going to put the "prepare" in "preparedness." [Applause.]

The problem of utilizing to the best advantages our resources in men is, however, a still more difficult one. There are just 21 different solutions of the problem in our committee. There are probably 435 different solutions in the House and nearly 100,000,000 in the country, because each individual has the only perfect plan in his own mind. They range all the way from dependence on a million men springing to arms between sunrise and sunset to universal compulsory military service. The committee has tried to avoid both Scylla and Charybdis, or, to bring it up to date, it might be said that we tried to steer a course somewhere between "the peerless statesman of Nebraska" and "the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GARDNER]." [Applause.]

The problem of the committee was not to chase fanciful theories, but the practical one of arriving on common ground where at least 11 of the 21 members of the committee could stand. It was only necessary that the majority of the committee should arrive at a conclusion which, in their judgment, was better than the law now in existence. It should be kept in mind that the issue is not between the ideal bill in the mind of each individual and the present bill, but the issue is between the law as it exists to-day and the present bill or such as the present bill may become after it has been amended.

Mr. POWERS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TILSON. I yield to the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. POWERS. Does the gentleman propose to state that the only purpose of the committee was to make an improvement on the present law?

Mr. TILSON. It was our earnest purpose to make the greatest improvement we could. The gentleman is well aware that in any committee of this House, in the House itself, or in any other deliberative body, legislation or action of any kind as a rule is a result of intelligent compromise. The chairman of the committee was unusually successful in guiding to such a conclusion as to cause the entire membership of the committee to agree that it was better than the present law, hence a unanimous report. A few plans and numerous suggestions were submitted to the committee. The plan that received the greatest amount of notoriety was the one commonly known as the continental army plan. This plan was well and forcibly presented by the very able Secretary of War, Mr. Garrison. The trouble with it was that practically no one seemed to believe that it would work in normal times. It was said of it that its strongest advocates and most bitter opponents vied with each other in the strength of a common belief that it would prove a failure. The basic idea of this plan——

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. GARRETT). The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. KAHN. I will yield to the gentleman 5 minutes more, if he desires.

Mr. TILSON. The basic idea of this plan, the necessity of having a volunteer force under the control of the Federal Government was recognized; but that the continental army plan would produce any such force, or any force at all, was extremely doubtful in the minds of most of those who attempted to support it. It was believed besides that it would practically destroy the National Guard, which, after all, with all its faults and shortcomings, represents not only such military training as exists outside of our small Regular Army, but also the military spirit that has been kept alive during all the years.

The continental army plan having failed to attract support the attention of the committee was directed to the possibility of securing such a force by utilizing instead of ignoring or destroying the Organized Militia. Here was a force already in existence, had been in existence for more than 100 years, and was well understood, with all its history and traditions, as well as its shortcomings. It was conceded that in spite of all the difficulties under which the Organized Militia has labored a wonderful advance has been made in its discipline and efficiency, especially within the last 10 years. The object of the committee was to conserve this force. It was believed by the committee that it would be unwise to throw away, to sacrifice this force which had already proved itself able to exist, even under adverse circumstances, and to substitute for it something entirely untried, and which no one, either its friends or its enemies, believed would work.

Although I have been in the National Guard for a number of years, I speak now not as a National Guardsman but as an American citizen and as a Representative in the American Congress. My service in the National Guard has been a labor of love, because I have believed that such service was not only beneficial to the State in which I live but also to the Nation of which my State is an important part. I would not willingly or wittingly impose a single burden or hardship upon the National Guard, except such as I believe to be necessary for the higher duty of national defense. I believe that the National Guard should become a national volunteer force. [Applause.] I believe that it should come under the control of the National Government. I believe that under the Constitution the National Guard can be made such a national force, and if some of the Regular Army officers had spent more time in trying to show us how to accomplish it and less in trying to discover reasons why it can not be done they would have been more helpful. My own idea has been that it can be brought about by a dual enlistment—one with the State and another with the United States. There is nothing incompatible or unusual in such a status. It is not a case of serving two masters. We are all citizens of our respective States and at the same time citizens of the United Sates. Yet no one thinks of such a dual allegiance being incompatible. There was a question on this point in the minds of some prior to 1865. All doubt on this point was set at rest by the result of the war between the Sates. We are a Nation, and in questions involving national defense the power of the Federal Government is indisputably paramount. Therefore, when a man signs an enlistment paper obligating himself to serve the United States when called, or is commissioned as an officer by the Federal Government, I believe he is under the control of the Federal Government, and no authority which any State could or would exercise over him would in any wise interfere with his availability or usefulness for national service.

It is my intention to offer at the proper place in the bill an amendment which representatives of the National Guard believe, and which I believe, will completely and sufficiently federalize the Organized Militia. In a word, this amendment will embody my idea of the dual enlistment and dual oath of office. I am not going to dispute with the chairman of our committee as to whether the bill as it stands sufficiently federalizes the militia. My amendment will surely do so if adopted.

Fortunately the National Guard through numerous representative officers made it clear to the committee that they desired to become a national force and entirely under national control. Since the passage of the Dick bill they had regarded themselves as already a national force. Willingness to render service when needed by the Federal Government was the prevailing reason given for joining the National Guard in the first place, and thousands of officers and men have continued in the service year after year solely for this reason. Their representatives told us that both rank and file were ready and eager to go the limit of federalization. They appealed to us to place them under national control and permit them to become the national volunteer force which all agreed to be an essential in any adequate scheme of national defense, and for which no one else seemed able to provide. The fine spirit of loyalty and patriotism manifested by the National Guard made a deep impression upon the members of the committee. There was no division of opinion as to the utilization of this material thus presented to us.

If the War Department and the officers of the Regular Army, in whose hands such matters must be placed, will enter upon the task with a desire to make the plan a success and will deal with the National Guard understandingly and sympathetically there is every reason to believe that within five years the National Guard will more than double in numbers and efficiency, and become a great and dependable military force, national in control and character. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. DENT].

First, however, Mr. Chairman, after the gentleman from Alabama gets through, I will move that the committee rise, and then I will ask unanimous consent to continue the general debate until 6 o'clock and do away with the evening session. I just want to give that notice. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. DENT] is recognized for 15 minutes.

Mr. DENT. Mr. Chairman, there is no doubt that the public mind has been engaged in the discussion of preparedness for many months. This question has occupied the principal place in the newspapers of the country since the outbreak, I may say, of the European war. I have always believed that there could be no doubt that at least 95 per cent of the people of this country are in favor of military preparedness. But at the same time I am equally as convinced that at least 90 per cent of the 95 have no fixed opinion as to what preparedness exactly means. It was with this difficulty, then, that the Committee on Military Affairs of the House began its hearings upon this subject about the 1st day of last January. That committee spent seven solid weeks, holding morning and afternoon sessions, for the purpose of trying to determine exactly how far the country should prepare itself for war.

I said on the floor of this House a little more than a year ago, when the Army appropriation bill was up, that while we were all in favor of preparedness, nobody was able to tell us against whom we should prepare. I asked the question in my remarks then, Shall we prepare against Germany or shall we prepare against Japan? Shall we prepare against England or shall we prepare against the combination of the allies that are engaged in the European war? I asked the question if it was necessary to prepare only for war against Mexico. That question, Mr. Chairman, is still the predominant question when it comes to the proposition as to what preparation we shall make.

The committee heard those who were in favor of a large standing army, the committee heard the advocates of peace, the committee heard all sides of this proposition, and came out with a report that increases the Army by 40,000 men. It provides for a National Guard that in the end can be trained according to the discipline prescribed by Congress, and that will amount in its final consummation to something like 400,000 men as a second line of defense.

The committee became convinced that this country was not ready and willing to vote for a large standing army such as exists in the warlike nations of Europe. For that reason we increased the Regular Establishment so that we would have a nucleus from which we could build in the event of war, and we provided for a National Guard organization that will give them training under a discipline prescribed by Congress and regulations fixed by the War Department.

It is a remarkable fact—it is, indeed, a most remarkable fact—that 21 members of this committee of the House, representing every section of this American Union, after seven weeks of discussion and hearings on this subject upon all sides of the proposition, have been able to present to this House a bill which meets their unanimous approval. [Applause.] And I want to say here, Mr. Chairman, that I think, as a member of this committee, I would be derelict in my duty upon this occasion if I did not state to the House the fact that this committee has brought forward a bill with a unanimous report is due to the diplomacy, the fairness, the intelligence, and the ability of the chairman of that committee, the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HAY]. [Applause.] And I will go further and say that this result has been accomplished because the minority membership of that committee was led by the genial, fair-minded, honorable, and distinguished gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN]. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, I do not agree, and I do not believe that the country agrees, that we should have a large standing army in this country. I believe that the sentiment of this country is in favor of building up a second line of defense from the citizen soldiery of the country who mix and mingle daily in the business and social life of the people among whom they live. And it is for this reason that the committee has brought in a National Guard pay bill.

I have not the time, even if I had the inclination and the House were willing to listen, to discuss the constitutional aspects of that question. The report discusses it very fully. The committee has reached this conclusion, in which I absolutely and thoroughly concur, that under the Constitution of the United States Congress has the power—the absolute power—to federalize, or to nationalize, if you please, the militia—the State troops known as the National Guard—in every respect except as to the appointment of its officers. The only power, therefore, that the Constitution reserves to the States is the power to appoint the officers and to train the militia according to the discipline prescribed by Congress, and the best authorities agree that even that power is subject to the qualifications fixed by Congress. We propose in this bill to prescribe the qualifications of the officers of the National Guard.

That is what we have undertaken in this bill. That, Mr. Chairman, is what the National Guard has asked for. That, Mr. Chairman, is the popular idea in this country by which to build up a second line of defense.

I do not think that it is necessary for me to undertake to defend the increase that the bill proposes in the regular military establishment of this country. The war in Europe has made it necessary that we should do something. The Mexican situation, which has recently arisen, has made it more imperative.

And in this connection I wish I had the time to call the attention of the House to a report made to the Forty-fourth Congress on the Texas frontier troubles. Every Member of this House would be interested in this report which was made to the Forty-fourth Congress in 1876.

I have said from the beginning, and I repeat, that the bill that we bring in here is not a partisan measure; it is not a Democratic measure and it is not a Republican measure; and I want to go further and state—and the facts will bear me out—that the policy pursued by President Wilson in regard to Mexico is not a Wilson policy or a Democratic policy, but it has been the policy of the Government of the United States ever since these troubles began on the Mexican border. If you will read this report, you will realize how similar is its language to the criticisms now heard of President Wilson for not pursuing a more vigorous policy toward Mexico. This report is No. 343, Forty-fourth Congress, first session, made by a committee of Congress composed, of course, of Democrats and Republicans. How much time have I, Mr. Chairman?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has three minutes.

Mr. DENT. I will not undertake to read much of the report, but I want to call attention to some interesting features of it. I read from the report:

> The history of the present raids can be said to have commenced with the Cortina war in 1859 and 1860.
>
> But after the close of the war * * * commenced the pillaging on the Texas border. * * * It will be seen that the constant and immense robbery of cattle, which is the basis of this entire system of outrages, has, in the later statements, hardly been mentioned, as the murders and other crimes which have grown out of it overshadow it. The question with the people has become one of existence, not of pecuniary loss.
>
> From their entire immunity and the great attraction of the spoils, their numbers are continually increasing. From the oldest times, and among all people, punishment of crime has always been considered necessary to prevent its increase; but here we have the strange spectacle of a community openly subsisting on crime, while there is no punishment for them. Their own nominal Government is not strong enough to inflict it, while the Government of their victims—our own Government—from a highly refined sense of international politeness, has refrained from inflicting it.
> * * * * * * *
> This state of things is wholly due to the inactivity of our Government.

How strangely similar is that language to the language we hear to-day in criticism of President Wilson. This was written in January, 1876. I read further:

> A few years ago some energetic chastisement, convincing the plunderers that there was some danger connected with their trade, would certainly have checked it, but the impression that our troops dare not cross the river has made them feel at ease.

Does not that sound like present day history? I read further:

> When, after a hot pursuit, the robbers and their spoil reach and cross the river, and our brave troops stand helpless and overwhelmed with shame on the American side of a small river, and bear the taunts and insulting gestures of the escaped robbers and their friends, our Nation and its Government becomes in their eyes, as they do not study the subtle arts of diplomacy, an object of scorn and contempt.
> * * * * * * *
>
> All statements agree that the authority of the National Government of Mexico on the border is only nominal.
>
> Such is the insecurity of life that Capt. McNally, who appeared before your committee, a man of known daring and a bold leader in those border fights, declares upon oath that no compensation, however great, could induce him to incur the danger which every inhabitant of the country between the Rio Grande and Nueces incurs every day, and that he considers his life, as a man whose business is war, safer than that of any inhabitant of that district. Deliberately and with full conviction, as this opinion is stated by one who is familiar with that country and all the facts, as a perusal of his evidence will show, it is fearful in its weight, and should come home to the heart and mind of every American.

> In coming to the manner in which protection can be given, we must state it as the unanimous opinion of all military men familiar with that border that protection can only be complete if the commanding officer of our troops can, whenever he finds robbers in the act of carrying off their booty, follow them up, even across the river, punish or kill them, and retake the property of our citizens. They are unanimous in stating that a merely defensive policy would give imperfect protection, even if a large force were maintained there at great expense.

I might read more of this report, Mr. Chairman, because it bears upon this situation directly, but I mention it and call attention to it in connection with the fact that Mr. Wilson's policy in being internationally polite to Mexico, if I may so express it, was the policy of President Johnson, it was the policy of President Grant, and it was the policy of President Taft, whom President Wilson succeeded. So that it may be said to be a truly American policy.

But to-day we stand in a different situation. To-day we are confronted with the fact that a band of robbers and plunderers has not only entered the borders of our country from Mexican soil, but has actually attacked a town under the guard of United States soldiers, and has actually had a battle with them. I hope, and I believe that every American is with me in this proposition, that this incident will mean that these border troubles will and must be settled for all time to come. [Applause.]

Mr. BELL. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the address delivered by Speaker CLARK at the Washington Press Club last night be inserted in the RECORD. The subject is, "The making of a Representative."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BELL] asks unanimous consent that the remarks of the Speaker of the House at the Press Club last evening on the subject "The making of a Representative," be inserted in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. GARRETT, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 12766, the Army reorganization bill, and had come to no resolution thereon.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the general debate on this bill shall continue until 6 o'clock this afternoon, and that the provision in the rule providing for the session this evening be dispensed with.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HAY] asks unanimous consent that the general debate shall extend to 6 o'clock this evening on this bill, and that the night session provided by the rule for to-night be dispensed with. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

On motion of Mr. HAY, the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 12766) to increase the efficiency of the Military Establishment of the United States, with Mr. GARRETT in the chair.

Mr. KAHN. I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr WATSON].

Mr. WATSON of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I do not propose to speak upon any of the particular sections of the bill, but more especially on preparedness. I hope, however, that this measure will promptly pass.

One hundred and forty years ago a new Republic was formed on the North American Continent, a feeble union of States, with a system of government which all nations claimed could not continue.

But the world did not truly appraise the worth of those loyal patriots who pledged their lives, their fortunes, and their sacred honor for the freedom and independence of that Union.

This little Republic grew in strength, power, and wealth. In her development she has been zealously guarded by able and faithful men, who, constant to their trust as the northern star, have made that Republic, our country, to be the greatest Nation of all history. [Applause.]

It behooves us, whether in public or private life, to uphold the honor of our country as those in the past have done and bequeath its glory to the generation to follow. When the present conflict of nations has ended, which has paralyzed the doctrines of the Christian world, new social and commercial conditions will follow, which will extend to all civilized peoples of the universe. I do not know why the United States should be exempted from the sword. Wars may be the plan of creation, for history teaches us that nations have been blessed with but few years of continual peace from the memory of man down to the present hour.

The responsibilities of the United States Government increase as her wealth and power spread over her dominion, and Congress can not avoid them nor fail to prepare to defend the growing importance of our Nation.

No Member can prophesy, in these times, when Congress will be asked to declare war. Therefore I advocate increasing the Navy and organizing an Army not for aggression but to publish to the world that we will protect our rights and guard our citizens wherever they may be in the performance of their lawful and rightful duties. [Applause.]

I do not know the best course to pursue in order to increase the permanent efficiency of our Military Establishment, but I am confident that after this bill has been debated that we will have as perfect a system as it is possible to inaugurate at this time.

Our Nation is not prepared for the trials of war, and if an enemy invaded our country, compelling the President to issue a call for volunteers, an untrained Army would march to the front, only to meet death.

In all periods of our history, when grave international questions were to be solved, men who seemingly have been invested with divine power have safely defended our Nation's honor.

Again the country calls for men who are clear thinkers upon public questions, keen observers of human nature, to deal with the issues which now confront us, and the inevitable ones which will be daily manifested as the foreign war continues.

Every American citizen should stand by the President and assist him to preserve peace, and if peace can not be honorably maintained, then fight with him to perpetuate the dignity of our country. [Applause.]

In the early days men formed themselves into tribes for protection, and later nations were organized to protect tribes; thus the various Governments were established. A government, therefore, is a corporation for mutual protection, and it becomes the bounden duty of every able-bodied citizen to render military service to his country. In order to increase and permanently maintain a national defense it will become necessary to train our young men in military affairs, not only to prepare them for war, but to prevent the danger of the future generation becoming effeminate by the growing luxuries of the age. [Applause.]

I yield back the remainder of my time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman yields back two minutes.

Mr. HAY. I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DICKINSON].

Mr. DICKINSON. Mr. Chairman, I purpose to vote for the pending measure that comes from the Committee on Military Affairs with a unanimous report, much as I regret the necessity for increasing the Army and the resultant increased expenditures for military purposes. I have taken especial interest in some of the provisions of this bill, particularly that part of it relating to the federalizing of the militia forces or National Guards of the several States of the Union and making them available when necessary for war purposes instead of the continental-army plan, as first proposed. I was especially pleased with the action of the committee, through its distinguished chairman, in printing in and as a part of its report a most admirable and convincing brief on the "Power of the Federal Government over the militia under the Constitution," which brief is credited by the report of the committee and its real author to the military council of the State of Missouri, but which brief, in fact, was prepared by Gen. Harvey C. Clark, commanding general of the Missouri State Militia, and at the head of the military council of the State of Missouri and for many years a close personal friend of mine, and now a resident of Nevada, Mo., and a constituent of my distinguished and gifted colleague, the Hon. PERL D. DECKER, who represents here with marked ability the fifteenth district of Missouri.

The modesty of the author of the brief caused him to credit it to the general council of which he is a member. His modesty is only surpassed by his ability as a lawyer and his qualification and fitness as commanding general of the National Guard of Missouri. I thought it not inappropriate to disclose to this House the real author of this brief, which makes plain "the absolute power of Congress to provide for the organization, discipline, and control of the National Guard, and for its Federal service within or without the United States under the Constitution and the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States." I note in the public press that the National Guard of Missouri is ready for service. I read:

NATIONAL GUARD READY.

NEVADA, MO., March 11.

Brig. Gen. Clark to-day wired the War Department at Washington tendering the services of the National Guard of Missouri to President

34308—15333

Wilson in case it was deemed necessary to use them. Gen. Clark informed the War Department the National Guard of Missouri were in a high state of efficiency and ready to move within 24 hours' notice.

This is done without waiting for the passage of this bill, the occasion being the trouble on the Mexican border, and the sending of United States troops across the border into Mexico in pursuit of and for the capture of Francisco Villa and his bandits who had invaded the United States and attacked and killed citizens and soldiers of this country at Columbus, N. Mex. It was fitting that Brig. Gen. Clark, an officer in the Spanish-American War and the commander of the National Guard of Missouri, should tender to the War Department the services of this National Guard, now in a high state of efficiency and ready to move within 24 hours' notice. The report of the committee and the brief contained therein will satisfy, in my judgment, everyone with an open mind that Congress has the power by appropriate legislation to prescribe the organization, armament, and discipline of the militia and to govern and use the National Guard as an efficient force for all war purposes. The fact that Congress has not in the past deemed it necessary to exercise this power is not sufficient reason for failing to legislate now, when the militia, under the Constitution, by proper legislation can be made an efficient force for all needed war purposes. Why substitute a new and novel continental-army plan, a mere experiment and of doubtful success? When the Constitution contemplates the use of the militia of the several States, why seek to break down and destroy these great military State organizations by attempting to substitute new methods for Army purposes?

I quote from the brief and the Constitution. Section 8 of Article I of the Constitution of the United States reads as follows:

Congress shall have power to raise and support armies; to make rules for the government and regulation of the land and naval forces; to provide for calling forth the militia to execute the laws of the Union, suppress insurrections, and repel invasions; to provide for organizing, arming, and disciplining the militia, and for governing such part of them as may be employed in the service of the United States, reserving to the States, respectively, the appointment of the officers and the authority of training the militia according to the discipline prescribed by Congress; to make all laws necessary and proper for carrying into execution the foregoing powers.

Section 2 of Article II:

The President shall be Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy of the United States and of the militia of the several States when called into the actual service of the United States.

I have always been opposed to a large standing Regular Army in time of peace, and such has been the historic position of the country and of the party of which I am a member. If an increase is necessary at this time, because of changed and dangerous conditions, when possibly the Nation might be called to arms to protect its integrity and its sovereignty, it does appear that the increase provided for in this bill is not unreasonable. Many are urging a much larger increase. To my mind it is more important to have an efficient and well-equipped force than a very large Army in time of peace, to be largely increased, if necessary, for war. The present authorized Regular Army of 100,000, though in fact short by about 15,000, is scattered, doing service in the Philippine Islands, in Hawaii, in Porto Rico, in the Panama Canal Zone, and on the Mexican border and quartered in various parts of the United States, and only to a limited extent available now for pursuit of Villa and his bandit gang. If the full authorized quota of 100,000 were in fact in the Army and available for service, it would mean only one soldier for each 1,000 people of our 100,000,000 population. With an increase under this House bill of 40,000, making, in the aggregate, an authorized Army of 140,000 soldiers on a peace basis, it would mean about one soldier for every 700 population. That does not look very much like militarism—scattered, as it will be, to meet the necessities on the borders of our country, in our colonies and elsewhere, and as an efficient nucleus for a large Army when war comes. The bill, however, for war purposes, provides for a much larger force of Regulars, also to be added to by the various National Guards of the several States.

The increases in the Army and Navy will require legislation for increased revenues; and if these increases are made necessary by reason of extraordinary conditions growing out of the European war, that affects so seriously all the world, then additional taxation must be levied to meet these increases. The same influences that have made it necessary that these additional burdens be provided for have furnished extraordinary opportunities for large war profits. Those interests that reap these benefits out of the misfortune of this world war should bear their full share of these increased burdens and these war profits should, by appropriate legislation, be made to respond, so that these additional burdens should not rest heavily upon the masses, who reap no benefit from war conditions. The loudest cry for preparedness and for large increases in armament come from those most benefited by war, and it is entirely logical that those most benefited should freely contribute from their profits for this preparation for defense or war, if necessary.

But for permanent law, and particularly to meet the ever-increasing burdens of the Government, I would substantially enlarge the income-tax law. I would reduce the present minimum of exemptions and substantially increase the surtax, and thus have an income-tax law broad and comprehensive enough to meet the mandate of the American people that saw fit to compel an amendment of the Constitution of the United States so that great wealth and those enjoying large incomes and best able to pay should contribute a fairer share to the expenses and burdens of government. It is the fairest of all taxation, most easily paid, and the least burdensome, and paid by those who reap the greatest benefits of Government.

I stand with the administration and the country for all reasonable preparedness and for all reasonable increases of the Army and Navy and for such increases in taxation properly levied to meet these necessities growing out of changed conditions, having at all times a proper regard for the efficient use of all money appropriated, so that the money appropriated may be economically and efficiently used and so that efficiency may result and appropriations for worthy purposes be not squandered.

Every good citizen hopes that the time may come, and as speedily as possible, when war conditions will end, when disarmaments may come, when the necessity for large armies and large navies may no longer exist, when the internal affairs of our country may be our first care, and when the health and betterment of mankind everywhere may be the first care and desire of government, rather than war and the destruction of life and property; so that civilization may live and a Christian world be preserved rather than woe and sorrow and destruction be the heritage of every people on earth; when the cry for preparedness for war may not longer be heard in the land, but a preparedness for life's best interests and results.

I do not want to see this country grow war mad, nor do I want this country to be negligent in its duty to thoroughly prepare for its future safety and to be ready to meet every emergency that may come.

The patriotic citizens of the country will stand for all reasonable preparedness, but are not interested in war profits nor in the selfish interests that wax fat over the disturbed conditions of the earth which are encouraged in a degree by those who would reap large profits while the masses suffer. Efficiency in every business and walk of life is to-day the watchword and desire of all who love success and desire safety and prosperity and an advancement of our citizenship everywhere.

The country does not desire war, but, in my judgment, wants an efficient Army, large enough for all reasonable purposes, and a well-equipped Navy, large and strong enough to protect our country from attack from abroad and to protect our citizens and commerce whenever and wherever necessary. We want our coast fortifications, already strong, to be strengthened wherever needed.

We do not want war, but if any hostile nation should seek to invade our country, then a Nation of courageous and patriotic citizens will rise as one man, not only to repel invasion but to give the world such an object lesson of American valor that all nations will take heed and never again with hostile purpose attempt to set foot upon the sacred soil of this Republic.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. KINKAID].

[Mr. KINKAID addressed the committee. See Appendix.]

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. LONDON].

Mr. LONDON. Mr. Chairman, it is utterly impossible to treat the subject under discussion with any degree of adequacy in 10 minutes. In a previous address I dwelt at length on the fallacy and iniquity of the preparedness propaganda. The bill now before us provides for an unusually large increase of the Military Establishment. It carries with it an additional burden of taxes. And no matter upon whom the taxes are to be imposed in the first instance they will ultimately fall upon the shoulders of the workers, using the word "workers" in the broadest sense and including in the term all who earn their livelihood by useful service.

I suppose we all agree that the most charitable thing that can be said about the Army and Navy is that they are necessary evils. We do not want to increase the evil unless we must. In proposing an extraordinary addition to the Army we must first determine whether the increase is essential for the defense of a national policy. It is not claimed that it is necessary to suppress internal disorder. The advocates of the need of a large Army must convince us that the necessities and exigencies arising or about to arise from our international relations compel this disagreeable step.

The primary question, then, which we have to decide is, What is our national policy? Have we a national policy?

The fact that the Committee on Military Affairs brought in a unanimous report providing for an addition to the Army merely shows that both the Republicans and Democrats have surrendered to the clamor of the press. It means that the elected representatives of the people have suspended their judgment. Have abandoned the right to think for themselves, and have permitted two or three dozen individuals in the editorial rooms of the newspapers to fix the policy of the country. Who are these editors who cover white paper with all sorts of marks? What is behind them? Who dictates their pens? What determines their thoughts? To whom are they responsible? Who are their owners, and what are their interests?

Instead of a national policy, we have a national panic, and the national panic is particularly strong among Members of Congress. They seem to be scared out of their wits. With bulging eyes they scan the columns of the newspapers to find what the newspapers have to say about them. The papers take full advantage of this scare. Some of these newspapers were impudent enough to denounce as traitors the 147 men who refused to stultify themselves by again tabling the previously tabled McLemore resolution.

The apparent unanimity of the committee has also another meaning. The Democrats are happy in their belief that they have stolen the thunder of the Republicans. The latter rejoice that they have started the Democrats on the road to military expansion. Each side believes that it has fooled the other, and both are trying to fool the people.

With a definite national policy we can prepare adequate means to sustain it. No one will contend that the increased Army is intended for purposes of attack upon other nations. It is, then, to be used for defense. If for defense, then against whom? Is it not in order to ascertain from where and from whom danger threatens the United States?

There is one Member of Congress, besides myself, who is consistent. He is the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GARDNER]. He wants a big Army, a very big Army, one big enough to satisfy him. He fears "a rush of invasion," and he wants to be prepared to meet the invasion. For all that he knows some German scientist may invent a chemical substance by which the Atlantic will be dried up and the Teutonic Army will march upon Massachusetts. Its Representative prays for an Army big enough to defend his beloved State. He is logical. He would have every man prepare to meet the attack at once. He would have us train all the time for that trying moment. He favors universal compulsory training. He would change the song of the cradle into a martial song.

Some say that the lesson of the need for preparedness is being taught by the European war. I draw an entirely different lesson from this war. The war was prepared just as surely as an explosion is prepared when enormous quantities of dynamite are accumulated. It is the very maintenance of big armies that has made the war possible—nay, inevitable. Will anyone dare gainsay that we would all have been better off to-day if there were no armies in Europe in August, 1914? A distinguished Member of the House referred to the German Army as the citizen army of Germany. The Social Democracy of Germany, which represents the most advanced democratic ideals of that unfortunate people, did not think so. As a means of fighting militarism they vainly demanded the establishment of a citizen army. They never ceased to warn against the menace of large standing armies, notwithstanding thousands of years of imprisonment which were meted out to them by the militaristic elements which controlled German life.

Armies in Germany, armies in France, armies in Russia, armies in Italy, everywhere men trained to fight, seeking to realize their life's dreams on the battle field, and then we wonder there is war.

As long as the conflagration continues in Europe we will be talking preparedness here. It will require all the strength of strong men to resist the invasion, not of a foreign enemy, not of a great military force, but of militaristic ideas. As long as the war continues there will be men among us for whom no army will be big enough, who will always want more preparedness, more of an army, more of a navy—and the more they will get the more will they demand.

This bill provides for 40,000 additional men. You know you can not get men to enlist. We are now practically at war with Mexico. Men are not going to enlist for $15 a month, to act the part of professional butchers. You can get volunteers by the tens of thousands if you will arouse a patriotic fervor, if you will appeal to the deep sense of national honor, if you will call for self-sacrifice and martyrdom. In order to get these 40,000 men you will have to create a state of frenzy. You will have to prepare a state of mind which will impel men to join the colors. You will have to stimulate enlistments by holding over the heads of the people the threat of an impending war. You will have to lash yourselves into a state of madness which is the sure forerunner of war.

One of the gentlemen on the Republican side of the House, and who preceded me, went for his wisdom to a silly poem which appeared in a provincial newspaper, and one of the things he quoted from the supposedly satirical poem was the sentiment, "I don't want to prepare, because I do not know whom I am going to fight." The gentleman thought it was a silly statement. There is nothing silly about it. The question whom are we likely to fight will have to be answered before the people will shoulder additional burdens. The question will have be answered before the people will submit to the enlargement of the military forces of the country.

We are told that war is inevitable; that it can not be foreseen; that it comes with suddenness, and that it is a part of human nature. There was surely nothing sudden about the present war. Was not Europe preparing for a quarter of a century for this very war?

War is no more inevitable than the plague is inevitable. War is no more a part of human nature than the burning of witches is a typically human act. Men succumbed to the plague because they were ignorant. Men burned witches because they were ignorant. When men came to understand the cause of the plague, the plague became impossible. When men will understand the cause of war, war will be made impossible.

We need not go into ancient history. It will be more profitable to examine modern history. While the forces that shape the destinies of nations do not lend themselves to exact classification, we may still group the principal wars of modern times into four classes—religious wars, wars which were the result of dynastic ambitions, wars for the unification of national groups into large nations, and, finally, the modern war, which is purely and simply a war for commercial supremacy, for markets, for spheres of influence and spheres of interest. Wars are nowadays shopkeepers' quarrels.

We need not anticipate that nations will rush at each others' throats because of religious differences. The possibility that kings and monarchs will, in pursuance of dynastic schemes, plunge their nations into war becomes more and more remote because of the growth of democratic ideas.

For the first time in the history of the world rulers of nations were compelled to appeal to their peoples, not in the name of national honor, but in the name of self-defense. Kaisers, kings, and czars were compelled to recognize the existence of a public opinion which rebelled against the asininity and criminality of war.

The third group of wars within recent times were the wars between small States occupying contiguous territory and consisting of populations of the same racial stock and language. The friction between the various Italian sovereignties thus resulted in one united Italy. The contest between the numerous German groups ended in a united Germany. The conflict between the North and South ended in one big United States.

The Saxon, the Bavarian, and the Prussian fought one another with the same zeal with which they now fight the allies. The Saxon sacrificed his life for Saxony; the Bavarian for the success of Bavaria; the Prussian for the triumph of Prussia. The patriotism of each was limited to the small group of which he was a member and to the small territory which that group occupied.

The same is true about the Italian nationalities. It was but natural that national groups occupying adjoining territory and being close neighbors, possessing a language of the same origin, differing only in dialect, should find it necessary to coordinate their efforts in the direction of forming one strong and united political organization and that both their selfish and higher interests should demand the creation of strong States along national lines. To this group should be added the struggles of small nations for emancipation from the yoke imposed upon them by larger States and nations.

We come now to the modern shopkeepers' wars.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. LONDON. Will the gentleman allow me another five minutes?

Mr. EMERSON. Oh, give him five minutes more.

Mr. LONDON. Yes; you better do it.

Mr. KAHN. I do not know. I understood the gentleman was going to get some time from the other side. I will yield him five minutes more.

Mr. LONDON. Then I will take five minutes from the other side, as there is no one there. [Laughter.]

Mr. KAHN. I think it only fair to say to the gentleman that the chairman of the committee, Mr. HAY, has gone to the telephone temporarily on important business.

Mr. LONDON. Oh, I understand that; and then he may be exhausted by the great effort put forth in preparing the bill. There have been no great wars between 1871 and 1914. We have had a number of small ones. The big nations amused themselves by——

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LONDON. Yes.

Mr. KAHN. Does the gentleman consider the Japanese-Russian War a small one?

Mr. LONDON. I was just going to refer to that. I was about to say that the larger wars were conflicts of economic interests, the direct clashing of material interests. Outside of the Russo-Japanese War, in 1905, since 1871 you have had the big nations attacking the little ones. Take England, for example. The English people are a brave and noble people. But the English people have never within recent times taken any chances with any big nation. England looked for easy jobs. It is true the war with the Boers was not an easy one. England did not calculate that it would have to send four times as many soldiers as there were Boers in order to defeat them, but that is what it had to do, and then it had to give a greater measure of autonomy to the Boer Republic than to any other British colony. Egypt, Morocco, the Congo, and the other numerous colonies seized by the big nations of Europe in Asia, Africa, and Australasia tell the same story of the aggrandizement of the big nations at the expense of the little ones.

Mr. KAHN. Does not the gentleman think the war between Russia and Turkey in 1878 was a pretty large war?

Mr. LONDON. Yes; but I explained in the last address I made here that it was primarily the desire of Russia to get access to the sea and to obtain a warm-water port, which was and is essential to her economic development.

What I want to disabuse your minds of is that idea advocated by Bryan, and which appeals to old women only [laughter and applause], that the present war is a causeless one. His appeal in the name of Christian ideals and his argument that this war is causeless, necessarily fall upon their ears. Commercialism has never permitted religion to stand in its way. The war is not a causeless one but a senseless one. I proceed upon the theory that there can be in modern times no great war unless there is a deep, fundamental, and vital cause for it, a cause which involves the very existence of a nation, and I say that there is no real, deep, fundamental interest of the people of the United States which can clash with any other people of the world.

Perhaps I should revert for a moment to the Russo-Japanese War and point out to the gentleman from California that it was primarily due to the attempt of Russia to extend her influence in Manchuria and to her acquisition of valuable lumber interests in Korea, which directly collided with the interests of Japan. There was nothing spiritual about the causes of the contest. It had its origin in sordid commercial rivalry.

In a previous address I made clear the economic basis of the present war in Europe. The outstanding fact in the titanic struggle of the European nations is that at the bottom of it lies the contest for commercial supremacy, and then do not forget that the war is in the main conducted by nations occupying contiguous territory. There is not a single instance in the history of modern wars of a great industrial nation having been attacked by another nation separated by a great distance. The very idea that any outside power could attack the territory of the United States is too preposterous to be entertained by a sane mind.

The United States has no one to fear. It is invulnerable against attack. It is not in the increase of the Military Establishment that we shall place our hope for a greater and nobler America. Unless we are determined to become a world power in the sense of competing with other nations, by force of arms, for the possession of markets and for the extension of our colonial empire we need no increase of the Army and Navy. We are now a world power, a world power for good. The average American fails to understand to what extent this Republic has been a source of inspiration to all lovers of liberty all over the world. Let this Republic remain free from the contamination of militarist ideals.

Although I believe that the Committee on Military Affairs could have done a great deal worse, I feel constrained to announce that I will vote against any increase of the Military Establishment, as such an increase would mean that Congress has yielded to the false "preparedness" campaign.

Gentlemen, I thank you. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman yields back one minute.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HULL].

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman, I will say that I will charge myself with half the time yielded to the gentleman from New York [Mr. LONDON].

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, this bill to my mind is an answer to the question that is asked very often, What is reasonable preparation?

I desire to speak of two distinctive features of this bill, the utilization of the National Guard as the Federal fighting force of this Nation and the inclusion of a clause which will be the initial step toward the Government manufacture of arms and ammunition.

The principal opposition that was voiced during the last year against the so-called militarism program was not so much against preparedness as it was against the methods it was proposed that we use, to prepare.

The idea of a continental army was distasteful to the public mind, because it savored of the military tactics of Europe, and because it was, in the opinion of a large majority of the people, the first step in a system that would eventually lead to a predominance of the military over the civilian. The people were opposed to a policy that would centralize the military power of this Government in the hands of one or even a few men. They were opposed to a system that would create an immense standing army, the financial burden of which would increase year by year and necessarily impose upon them a perpetual tax.

Europe, now the greatest slaughterhouse the world has ever known, has unconsciously sent her message of warning across the sea. Europe has taught us that any program whereby civil life is subverted by the military must eventually lead to war. Europe's policy was originally a policy of defense; but gradually, as her army was increased—gradually, as the military gained the ascendency—so was her defensive policy merged into one of offensive. The greatest burden of recent years that Europe has had to bear is her army and her navy. Her greatest burden in the years to come will be the direct result of that army and navy. The continental-army scheme would have led us in the footpaths of Europe. With eyes across the sea, the people of this United States rose up, almost as a body, and protested against any form of preparedness that would result in such a catastrophe to the civil life of the Nation.

This was the inception of the peace propaganda; this was the cause of that wave of protest that swept across the country against the military program as it was originally outlined.

It is a significant fact that since the death of the continental army scheme, and since the public has come to know that the National Guard is to be utilized in our preparedness for defense, all these protests have died out.

The National Guard has long been the popular military body of the Nation. The reason for this is that it is a military system that can be coordinated with civil life; that, by its very nature, it is, and must always remain, subservient to civil life, and therefore is, and always will be, a military organization for defensive and not offensive purposes.

Until the present time the growth of the National Guard has been retarded because it has had no substantial support. No other motive but that of pure patriotism has been extended as an inducement to enlist; its soldiery has been asked to give its time and energy without thought of compensation, and its officers have been asked for their knowledge and ability without adequate return for the same. The different bodies of the National Guard have also lacked that cooperation which is necessary to build up a strong and effective military organization that could be utilized as a unit in case of national defense. All honor should be given to that small body of officers, and to that relatively small body of men who, under adverse circumstances, have made the National Guard what it is to-day, and should we in the near future be compelled to defend our honor or our country, I believe the National Guard would give excellent account of itself, and would be the nucleus around which we could build a forcible fighting army. In my opinion the National Guard must always be looked to as the military body to protect the Nation. It is the organization which this Nation must depend upon to preserve our national honor or to protect our borders if at any time we should be in danger of attack.

This bill, if it becomes a law, will do away with the principal defects that now exist in the National Guard. In the first place, it provides compensation for the soldier who enlists, small it is true, and inadequate compared to the time he will have to spend and the danger involved in placing himself at the disposal of his country. Yet the average citizen is willing to devote his time to his country if he is given a return, be it ever so small. It is not the money, the small sum that he will be given if he enlists as a soldier, but it is the fact that his country recognizes the spirit in which he enlists that will attract the young man to the National Guard. It must also be remembered that the National Guard is now, and always will be, recruited from that great body of men we call the laboring element. It is they who must furnish the brawn and the sinew to make up the fighting force. These men are, and will be, in a position where they can ill afford to give their time to the defense of the Nation without some little compensation for the same. This is true of the officers. We pay others who are employed by the Government, why should we not compensate these men who are giving their time and efforts to the Nation's work, that they might become efficient to defend their country? It is this clause, therefore, providing for pay, which, in my opinion, will prove the big incentive to enlistment in the National Guard and to building up this organization to the size and strength that is contemplated in the bill.

The provisions of the bill will, in my opinion, create a much greater degree of efficiency both among the enlisted men and the officers. With the provisions for pay comes added requirements. The great defect in the present organization is that there has been no incentive to drill, no incentive to become proficient. In many instances it has been a social rather than a military organization. Now all this has been done away with. The soldier boy must be a real soldier if he enlists. Attendance at drills is required, better discipline is provided, better officers are assured, and better military training will naturally follow. I see no reason why the National Guard, under the provisions of the present bill, should not become as effective a fighting force as the Regular Army of the United States. In fact, I think it would become more so, for the spirit that surrounds and goes with a Volunteer Army, sufficiently trained, is lacking in the Regular Army.

And I want to say right here that I am very much in favor of the idea of relieving the National Guard of police duty, but I think you all understand that will have to come from the State and not from this body.

This bill carried to its logical conclusion will, in five years' time, provide a minimum of 425,000 soldiers, members of the National Guard, all trained, efficient, ready, and willing to fight for the Government. It can provide more, and its maximum strength would be over 1,000,000 men. I think this body of trained volunteer soldiers will be adequate defense against any initial attack that might be made upon our honor or our border.

Another excellent feature of the bill is that which allows the State to retain control of its organization while the Government aids in preparing it in efficiency. This, of course, subject to the general provision that the Government can call the officers and the soldiers to Federal duties if war is imminent or is declared. In other words, all the efficiency of a Federal Army is secured without the flavor of miltarism that surrounds a large national troop, supported, maintained, and regulated by the Government. The National Guard will remain, as a body, in each State, practically as it is, the one material change being that the Federal Government will provide remuneration, and for this consideration will require of the States a much greater efficiency and the right to use these State organizations in time of war.

One cause for lack of efficiency in the present National Guard is the insufficient equipment that it has heretofore been provided with. Soldiers can not learn to shoot without having something to shoot with. Artillerymen can not become efficient unless they have had time and equipment with which to practice. All this has been provided for in the bill.

Since the general provisions of this bill have become known to the public I have been flooded with letters from my State and my district. All these have been commendatory on the steps that have been taken to utilize the National Guard with which to build up a Federal fighting unit for the protection of this United States. If I have judged the opinion of my district and of Iowa rightly, they will commend this feature of the bill, and I predict that in a year's time the National Guard of Iowa will be enlisted to its maximum strength.

In my mind there is no more important clause in this bill than section 21, which provides that the Secretary of War shall appoint a board of five officers of the Army to investigate and report the feasibility and practicability of the Government manufacture of arms and ammunition and equipment. I am for the Government manufacture of arms. I believe we should begin at once and manufacture a larger portion of the military necessities. I believe we should gradually and as rapidly as possible build plants and secure equipment, so that in the course of a few years we should be able to manufacture 90 per cent, if not all, of the things that are necessary in provisioning, equipping, and maintaining an army, both in time of peace and in time of war. I believe this Government could annually save millions of dollars by so doing. There is no doubt about the fact that private manufacturers annually reap a harvest of fortunes off the profits made to supply our Army and our Navy. They are growing rich—in fact, they have been made rich—from the money paid to them by the taxes levied upon the people. I believe that the profits made by these manufacturers in two years' time is sufficient to build all the plants and secure all the equipment necessary to manufacture sufficient supplies for an army of 1,000,000 men in peace or war. I believe these immense profits that would be made in years to come from the additional arms, ammunition, and equipment that must necessarily follow as a result of this tremendous increase in our Army and Navy should revert back to the people, and I am in favor of any law or any act that will bring this about. I have been giving the matter considerable study during the year in which I have been a Member of this body, and my observation has been that the Government can manufacture what is necessary for the Army and Navy just as cheaply as can the private manufacturer. Why, then, should we not save the profits that he takes as his legitimate share for furnishing the Government with these supplies?

There are many who differ with my views on the subject. I am willing to be convinced, and I give them credit for looking at the question with the same open mind as myself. It seems to me, then, that the only fair way of arriving at a conclusion as to the relative cost of manufacture is to appoint a board of investigation that this section provides for. This clause provides for five Army officers, men who are supposed to have knowledge of the things needed, and cost thereof, in the respective departments which they would represent. They should be able to arrive at a much more fair conclusion than men who are ignorant of these subjects. It seems to me that this investigation should be thorough in every particular and every detail, so that when the report is made we can tell exactly the cost to the Government, both in purchase and in its own manufacture. I believe that the Government should manufacture all its own Army and Navy supplies if it could do it at the same cost as the private manufacturers. Government manufacture of Army supplies would forever still that clamor of an ulterior motive that always arises when a report of war is heard. During the last years when the Mexican embroglio has been in progress, the constant cry has been that private parties have been urging the United States to intervene in Mexico that they might reap the profits from the added war supplies. Ever since the spector of our being involved in the European war has arisen, over the country has gone the rumor that private parties are urging on national discord in order that they might profit from the arms and ammunitions needed if we should be involved in war. Whether these rumors, these clamors are founded on fact, I will not undertake to state. This much is certain: That if the Government of the United States manufactured these things which are necessary for its Army and its Navy, either on a peace or a war footing, then this ulterior motive could be ascribed to no one. Then the peace, dignity, or safety of this Nation could not be jeopardized on account of a misunderstanding of the masses as to the motives behind such a movement.

There is another far-reaching argument in favor of Government manufacture. It is obvious right now. Suppose we should go to war with Mexico. We are short of machine guns. The Government has no plant equipped to manufacture them. Every private plant has contracted for months ahead to furnish machine guns to Europe. We could not buy them under private manufacture; we have no facilities to manufacture them ourselves. If the Government of the United States right now, or in the next few months was compelled to have a large quantity of machine guns in order to protect its borders or for use in its Army, its borders would have to go unprotected and its Army unsupplied, for we could not get them. This, to my mind, is an argument for Government manufacture much stronger than that of mere private gain.

I believe that we should be at all times equipped so that in case of necessity this Government should be able to manufacture such things as are absolutely needed by our Army in time of war.

Mr. KAHN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. I will.

Mr. KAHN. The gentleman, I know, has taken a deep interest in the manufacture of munitions in the Government arsenals. Is the gentleman sufficiently familiar with the difference in cost of production as between private manufacturers and Government arsenals, so that he could give those figures?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. That is one of the reasons why I want this clause inserted. I have my opinion. I believe that the cost is very much less when the Government manufactures Army supplies than when private parties sell them to the Government. In fact, we know that they are.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. I will.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. That has been proven in the case of the Frankfort Arsenal at Philadelphia in particular, and it is proven always, with the exception that no account is taken of the overhead charges, in which the Government seems to have an advantage, but there is not any question of doubt so far as the Franfort Arsenal is concerned that there has been a great saving in the manufacture of munitions, particularly in small-arms ammunition, over the cost of such munitions manufactured by private plants.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. I think the gentleman is correct, and I believe it is true that in the statement as to the cost they always say that they do figure the overhead expenses. Now, the overhead expenses is an unknown proposition, and everybody has a right to their own opinion as to what constitutes it. The gentleman understands that.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The facts, however, have been stated here of the importance of this matter.

Mr. TILSON. Does the gentleman have in mind the manufacture of arms and ammunition for peace only, or for war times?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. I have in mind the times of peace, and, as far as possible, in the time of war.

Mr. TILSON. Has the gentleman attempted to figure out how much it would cost to erect a plant sufficient to produce the necessary arms and ammunition for a large war?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. I have tried to figure it out, and I have tried to have others figure it out, and generally, I think, the figures are very, very misleading. That is just one of the reasons I want this clause in this bill. I want somebody who has authority to find out and report to the Secretary of War, and he to this Congress, the truth about this.

Mr. HICKS. Will the gentleman permit an interruption?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Certainly.

Mr. HICKS. Is it not a fact that when the Government figures the overhead charges in arsenals they omit the tax on those plants? I think that is a distinction; that they do not take into consideration all the taxes paid that a private plant will have to pay and the Government does not have to pay.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. I presume that is true. They do not pay the tax, and I presume they do not figure on it.

Mr. SLOAN. Will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Yes, sir.

Mr. SLOAN. You said something about the amount manufactured in case of war, and its expense, in response to the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. TILSON]. That amount would depend a good deal upon what particular adversary the Government would pick out to fight with, would it not?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. It certainly would. I might call your attention to one thing right here, and it will answer all these questions to some extent, even to the overhead expense. The question of aeroplanes is a pressing one with this Government to-day, and you have at Rock Island, although I was not going to mention it, because I wanted to be modest, a factory, and you have the power that is going to waste, and you might just as well be manufacturing aeroplanes at one-tenth the cost that you are paying for them to-day.

Mr. GORDON. Will the gentleman yield upon that point?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Certainly.

Mr. GORDON. The gentleman knows, perhaps, or recalls, that it appeared in evidence before our committee that these aeroplanes were largely covered by patents, and that it was a serious obstruction to the Government undertaking to engage in their manufacture?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Well, I have always heard that all these gentlemen were very willing to place at the disposal of this Government anything to protect its honor. I would like to see that put to the test.

Mr. KAHN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. I will.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman has given this matter a great deal of attention, and can he inform the committee how large a percentage of Army supplies the Government is buying at the present time? I would say, with reference to munitions?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. I can not. I have found no Member of this House who can accurately inform me, and I doubt very much whether there is any Army officer who can inform me. We have so many different committees appropriating for this and that, and different people buying, that there is a general impression—and it is very often stated—that only 10 per cent is ever bought. But that, I am sure, is not the truth. They are buying a good deal more than 10 per cent, but it is done outside of our committee.

Mr. BENNET. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. I will.

Mr. BENNET. Does the gentleman propose to offer any amendment to the bill?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Well, I have not decided; but I do not think I will. I am fairly well satisfied with the bill. It may be improved in some respects. It is a mighty good bill, I will say, in my opinion.

Mr. SLOAN. Will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Yes.

Mr. SLOAN. He says no Member of the House has been able to give this information. Would not the War and Navy Departments know precisely the relative amount produced by the Government factories and the amount produced in private concerns?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. I do not think you can find out without starting an investigation. If you can, I would be very glad if you would do so, and would come around to-morrow morning and tell me.

Mr. SLOAN. Have you inquired?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. I have, and I have found a great many people who say that it is only 10 per cent, but that does not take into consideration that there are other committees that make appropriations besides our committee.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Certainly.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Somewhere there would be an accounting of every dollar of Uncle Sam's money that is expended from the Treasury and what it goes for. Have you inquired from such a source what money has been paid out for munitions of war?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. No; I have not of them.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Would not that be the place to look for it before we began an investigation?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. That would be the place to go. And that is not all the investigation wants to do. These men want to do something else. They have got a lot of things to do.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. BENNET].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York [Mr. BENNET] is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. BENNET. Mr. Chairman, I had no intention of speaking on this bill, but it did seem to me that it might be proper to indicate to the House that my colleague from the twelfth district [Mr. LONDON] did not in his remarks represent the entire 43 Members from the State of New York.

I agree with him in one respect. I think that he and the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GARDNER], taking the gentleman from Massachusetts as a type, together sum up the question. Either you ought not to have any Army at all—just what my colleague [Mr. LONDON] desires—or you ought to have an efficient Army, which is what the gentleman from Massachusetts desires, and I am quite sure what the majority of the Members of the House desire.

Being largely Irish in my composition, I am pleased with the fact that the consideration of this bill was taken up on the 17th of March. As I listened to the Members of the committee, all of them saying how they "love their teacher," including the minority leader from California [Mr. KAHN], and what a grand bill it is, and how each of them would not have written this bill exactly this way if he had a chance, I was reminded a good deal of some of my Irish ancestors, who were quite wont to speak pleasantly to one they met, and keep the shillalah in their hands behind their backs. [Laughter.]

There are several parts of this bill. I have read the enacting clause, and I find it in excellent order. Therefore I am going to vote for what comes after, in order to get that clause through the House. I have read the title. It is not a title; it is not a description of the bill. It is a prayer, a hope, "to increase the efficiency of the Military Establishment of the United States." That is what we all want, and so far we all agree with the committee.

But after I have listened to different members of the committee I realize, when they really get down to serious business and get to talking about what they want, the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. TILSON] and the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HULL] and the gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN] and other gentlemen who really do not agree with this bill, either in whole or largely in part, that this bill is simply intended to rope off the arena in which the "scrap" is going to occur.

The debate this afternoon has convinced me of one thing, particularly the remarks of the recent governor of Nebraska [Mr. SHALLENBERGER]. I never heard a better speech in my life for universal military training. You can not follow his argument and escape that conclusion.

Mr. GORDON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from New York yield to the gentleman from Ohio?

Mr. BENNET. Certainly.

Mr. GORDON. Can you point out the difference between universal military training and universal military service?

Mr. BENNET. I do not know whether I could in five minutes.

Mr. GORDON. Gen. Scott, the Chief of Staff, who testified before our committee, said there was no difference between compulsory military service and compulsory military training.

Mr. BENNET. Then, if they are the same thing, that is what the argument of the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. SHALLENBERGER] applied to. When you say you are for putting a rifle of the latest and best pattern behind the door of every citizen, you can not escape the conclusion that when you have given every man a rifle it is your duty to teach him how to use it, and that is universal military training.

Now, I do not think this country is quite up to universal military training yet, but this bill is simply the start of an experiment, and a change from the system that we have now to the system that we are going to have sometime; and that reconciles almost anybody to vote for it.

It is not really necessary to read the bill. We are not going to make the bill here. We are simply going to pass it. In another place they are going to take the "innards" out of the bill and put in an entirely different set of works, and then we will appoint a conference committee, and they will change all that. We are simply the mechanics that are starting the operation. [Laughter.]

I just wanted to say in my five minutes that the great State which the gentleman from the twelfth district and myself and 41 others on the floor have the honor to represent here is for adequate national defense to the limit. [Applause.] The foreign born are for adequate national defense as well as the native born. Yesterday I received the following from a respected citizen of Italian birth in my district:

BRONX, N. Y., March 15, 1916.

Hon. WILLIAM S. BENNET, Washington, D. C.,
Congressman of Twenty-third Congressional District, New York.

DEAR MR. BENNET: I wish for you to support the national defense resolution adopted at St. Louis March 4, 1916, or something along that line, which would secure the liberty and peace of this great Nation of ours.

Wishing you health and prosperity.

Respectfully, yours, S. AMANNA.

Mr. Amanna is but typical of our foreign-born citizens.

Returning to the question of universal military training, I find the following arguments in its favor:

First. It is fair and democratic. The son of the millionaire and the son of the toiler by manual labor are placed on an equality.

Second. It is effective. It would give us a constant army of about 450,000 and an educated reserve of about 5,000,000. This would probably mean that we would be secure from attack.

Third. It is economical in a financial way. If we trained every available boy at, say, 19 for one year, we probably would not pay him wages. It would be his contribution to the country.

Fourth. It is economical of men. Fighting wars with untrained men is wasteful. We raised 527,000 men in this country to fight the War of 1812. Great Britain never had more than 16,000 men on this continent at any one time during that conflict.

Fifth. It would save tremendously on pensions. Our huge pension rolls result very largely from the fact that, fighting with untrained men, we have to have so many.

Sixth. A year of training would be good for most boys. Many wealthy men give their boys military training because they realize its worth. The sons of poor men would be benefited by the same opportunity.

Many other reasons could be given, but I am indicating rather than arguing.

On the other hand is the very real danger of developing a military class. No one wants that. We have now 5,300 officers in the Regular Army. I doubt if they have influenced us much toward a war-like spirit. To a war-like spirit a central permanent power devoted to its propagation is necessary, and that central permanent power can not exist in a President holding office for but four years.

My hope is for universal and lasting peace. In 1910 I introduced and had passed the following resolution:

Joint resolution authorizing the appointment of a commission in relation to universal peace.

Resolved, etc., That a commission of five members be appointed by the President of the United States to consider the expediency of utilizing existing international agencies for the purpose of limiting the armaments of the nations of the world by international agreement and of constituting the combined navies of the world an international force for the preservation of universal peace and to consider and report upon any other means to diminish the expenditures of government for military purposes and to lessen the probabilities of war.

President Taft never appointed the commission. I have always regretted that he did not. I have reintroduced the resolution in this Congress and intend pressing for its passage. It expresses my hopes and aspirations. But we are not yet at universal peace. Until we are we will need a national police force, and I am going to vote to make it an effective and efficient one.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MILLER].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. MILLER of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, prior to November 11 last I had received a great many letters from constituents on the question of preparedness. A great majority of them protested against a large expenditure in that direction.

We have in our county a company of the Sixteenth Regiment of the National Guard of Pennsylvania, and let me say that they have a most excellent and well-equipped armory in Grove City. I am well acquainted with Capt. Kennedy, the captain of Company M, and I wrote to him and asked him in my letter why it was not possible to have the National Guard constitute part of the Army of the United States, and suggesting that in case of war they could be utilized, instead of having this large continental army that was talked about in the newspapers. About that time I wrote a letter to the honorable Secretary of War, Mr. Garrison, on the subject, in answer to a circular that I had received from him, which I think was sent to me as it was to all other Congressmen, and I ask leave, without taking the time to read that letter, to insert it in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection that privilege will be granted.

There was no objection.

Following is the letter referred to:

MERCER, PA., November 16, 1915.

To the honorable SECRETARY OF WAR,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: I acknowledge the receipt of your "Outline of the Proposed Military Policy," dated November 1, 1915. There is much in the "outline" that I approve. It is possible that it is not in good taste for me, a civilian, to criticize what you propose, but the only way you can obtain the opinion of the general public, the majority of whom are civilians, is through one of their number.

I am in favor of reasonable "preparedness," although I do not think there is any danger within the next 25 years, at least, of the United States being engaged in war with any foreign nation, unless she is the aggressor. In every war that has occurred in which the United States was a party during the past 100 years, with a single exception, the United States brought on the war.

There are three classes of representative citizens who are in favor of "preparedness," and you could scarcely make the "preparedness" too large for them:

1. The professional politician.
2. The manufacturers of munitions, and allied manufacturers.
3. A large portion of the newspapers.

As a rule the common people are not in favor of "preparedness." They feel that they are already taxed in many ways that they never were before except in time of war. That already there is a large deficiency which can only be wiped out by increased taxation. That if preparedness is to be adopted on a large scale it means a bonded indebtedness in a time of peace for a purpose that they do not believe is necessary.

I believe that the officers and enlisted men in the Regular Army should be increased to at least 150,000, and I believe with this force and that of the National Guard the United States would have sufficient available force. The National Guard already consisting of 129,000 officers and enlisted men could, I think, easily be increased to 150,000 and possibly 200,000 men. To encourage this, in my opinion, the pay of the enlisted men and officers in the National Guard should be at least 20 per cent of the annual pay of the Regular Army, on condition that each officer and man drills each week an average of at least — hours, and that every officer and man be required to attend every drill, unless excused on account of sickness, and pass an examination each year. In my opinion the National Government should provide arms for this force, provide a full equipment of clothing, ammunition, etc., for the force, which should be stored and only used by the force when called out by the National Government, the National Government also to decide upon the nature and character of the organization and prescribe its discipline. I have no fear that in case of war between the United States and any foreign nation but what the National Guard would promptly respond to the call of the Government.

You will pardon my writing this letter. The probability is you will not have time to read it, but if one of your clerks reads it, it will not take him nearly as long to read it as I have taken to write it.

Yours, very truly,

S. H. MILLER.

Mr. MILLER of Pennsylvania. On November 17 I received a letter from Capt. Kennedy, of Grove City, in answer to the one I had written him on November 11, in which he stated that he heartily agreed with what I had written to him, and that he believed the National Guard would be a most efficient force if it were constituted as a part of the Regular forces of the United States. Without taking the time to read that letter, I ask unanimous consent to include it as a part of my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, it will be so ordered.

The letter is as follows:

GROVE CITY, PA., November 17, 1915.

The Hon. S. H. MILLER, Member of Congress,
Mercer, Pa.

MY DEAR SIR: Your letter of November 11 received, and it gave me more satisfaction to read same to the members of Company M than anything I have received for a long time. I am inclosing a pamphlet with a speech or lecture by Col. William Wallace that he gave us at officers' school last June at Mount Gretna that will be of use to you when some of the Army officers try to tell you that a continental army is the solution of our unpreparedness in the United States. Col. Wallace is one of the experts in the Regular Army, and he shows in this lecture that you can not make a first-class fighting man in two months' intensive training, as per continental guard idea. The bill for pay for drill in National Guard asks for pay for enlisted men and officers of 20 per cent of the annual pay of the Regular Army, which makes it possible for an enlisted man to earn $52 per year, and noncommissioned officers and commissioned officers in their several grades get from $80 to as high as $380 per year, provided they attend every drill and pass the examinations each year. This requires a man to drill each night 2½ hours and school 30 minutes one night per week, and I believe that if the bill gets through we will make the Regular Army go some to keep out of our road in efficiency. I am going to make it a point to have you attend our annual encampment next year and see for yourself the work that the Pennsylvania National Guard puts on. I believe that every live legislator like you should have a chance to investigate this question by seeing the work done. With kindest personal regards, I am,

Yours, very truly, J. A. KENNEDY.

Mr. MILLER of Pennsylvania. Capt. Kennedy inclosed with his letter a most excellent address on the question of military training, delivered by Maj. William Wallace, of the United States Army, at the camp of instruction at Mount Gretna, Pa., June 8, 1915, to the National Guard of the State of Pennsylvania. I ask leave to print that address as a part of my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, it will be so ordered.

The address is as follows:

MILITARY TRAINING.

[By Maj. William Wallace, United States Army.]

(Delivered at Camp of Instruction, Mount Gretna, Pa., June 8, 1915.)

"Military training is a term much in vogue to-day. Comparatively few of our people know in what such training consists or how absolutely necessary it is to the conduct of modern war. The antiquated idea that any man in a uniform with a gun is a soldier is distressingly prevalent. The fact is, that such a man without at least one year's solid and strict apprenticeship to the skilled trade of arms is very likely to be more of a drawback to his friends than a menace to any creditable foe.

"It is asked if a year is necessary for this training. It is all too short in which to learn and have confirmed the multitudinous details in which a trained soldier must be skilled. However, young Americans who have undergone the mental training of the average public school and who enter upon the duty earnestly and willingly will master the rudiments of soldiering in that time, provided they are properly put to it.

"To show the nature of the training necessary, we will suppose that 100,000 young men of the above description had volunteered and assembled for military instruction on one of our great Indian or forest reservations in Arizona or New Mexico, where outdoor work is possible the year round, and ask—

"'What course would they pursue?'

"Roughly this:

"The first month would be consumed in the recruit finding himself—a process having many of the aspects of losing himself. He must be divested of every ounce of superfluous baggage and be fitted and provided with uniform and equipment. An uncomfortable pack or pair of shoes are soul-destroying afflictions, where, if properly adjusted, they soon become matters of small concern. The care of himself, of kit, and equipment, when, where, and how these are obtained, their cost, his responsibility for them, and their arrangement for various instructions are all matters requiring time to learn. Then there are the Articles of War, the application of military justice, his relation to the Army, the Government, and to civildom to be learned. There are also the various fatigues—work required other than that which is strictly military—to be explained and performed. From the start 'setting-up' exercises and drills without arms must take place, and regularity and precision insisted upon.

"The second month the recruit should be given his rifle, and the handling and care of it taught. Squad, platoon, and company close-order drills, calisthenics, swimming, riding, etc., would fill each day with the physical instruction necessary. The study of the vital parts of Army Regulations, the duties of sentinels on various guards, the carrying and correct delivery of orders, and lectures on hygiene and sanitation would consume the rest of the time.

"The third month would advance into the battalion and regimental close-order drills and ceremonies, the physical exercises continued, and first aid, signaling, and how to cook for himself taken up. Lectures on simple tactics and the relation of the various branches of the service to each other should be given here, and, also, preparatory to the coming month, talks on camp expedients, marching, and the use of field ration.

"Altogether for the uninitiated no small three months' work. For the individual, if not the hardest, they are the most trying. Homesickness usually sets in, rendering mind and body sensitive and irritable, and, though the ills he is undergoing are mostly imaginary, they are to him none the less real for being so. For this reason these months should be spent in simple barracks and simple comforts provided. Also such barracks would prevent much of the disease usually attendant upon an abrupt change from home to camp life. A study of our concentration camps during the Spanish War shows that no effort should be spared to make the transition from civil to military employment as gradual as possible. Three months in airy barracks with an occasional camp won't prevent all sickness but will prevent much of it and lessen its severity.

"The fourth month would be spent in camp and all that goes to make such a life not only endurable but enjoyable put into effect. Extended order drills should be the rule, with the study and practice of patroling, scouting, road sketching, and general reconnoissance. Short marches without pack should be frequent, and lectures and examples given of simple entrenchments, the construction of obstacles, demolitions, the effects of rifle and cannon fire, the knowledge and use of cover, and the elements that enter into successful assaults.

"The fifth month should have longer marches, light packs and frequent changes of camp site. Simple tactical problems should be solved, with lectures and practice in advance and rear-guard actions, outpost, and convoy operations. The soldier must know and be familiar with the nature of the duty he is performing in order to act intelligently. For instance, what would be proper action, as the point of an advance guard might be suicidal with a convoy, and vice versa.

"The sixth month's operation should be by brigade and the marches and problems extended into a terrain of hills, defiles, and rivers. Map making, bridging, and construction of temporary and permanent entrenchment taught and put into effect through simple problems of offense and defense between brigades.

"The seventh and eighth months should be devoted to the division, that all-important tactical unit upon which battles today depend. Hard and zealous preliminary training by all of its components is necessary in order that the division may start unhandicapped. Here, in war, there is little or no time for individual training. Men, squads, companies, battalions, regiments, and brigades must know their business or confusion reigns, and order—that primary requisite of human as well as mechanical machines—fail and ruin results. Moreover, it is in division exercises that officers receive the experience to fit them for actual war. Here their commands become themselves, and they must shoulder the blame for all deficiencies in them, and in the life and death game of war censure for inefficiency is not likely to be long delayed or particularly pleasant when it comes. After a few division problems intelligent officers and men plainly see that they must keep themselves up to the top notch of efficiency if they are not only to win the cause but save themselves severe and needless suffering. It aids discipline by compelling it throughout all ranks, and discipline is to human masses what cohesion is to the atoms of materials, and as these are soft or hard, weak or strong, in accordance with the intensity of this principle, so are armies in proportion to the strictness of discipline that pervades them. Discipline is not instinctive, but rather a matter of habit, easily acquired and falling lightly on those who are amenable, but nettlesome, often beyond endurance, to the egotistical and the vanity stricken. From the very first, in the exactions of promptitude, precision, and close attention, it has been instilled with gradually increasing rigor, until in the heaving and straining of the great human mass—the division—it finally becomes confirmed. Discipline is absolutely indispensable to order, and no matter how intelligent or individually well trained a man may be, as a soldier he is worse than useless, a danger, until he has learned to obey unhesitatingly and without question the orders of his superiors. The superior is responsible, the subordinate isn't, and in divisions superiors are very likely to have the fact driven home.

"It is here also that officers have the opportunity to put into constant practice their absorptions of the classroom, and, weighing well their knowledge, to separate the essential from the mass of nonessential. In the military art practice is the only true knowledge producer. The division problems would call into play all the previous training of all the troops. Time off should be devoted to noncommissioned officers' schools for the purpose of familiarizing large classes with army administration, paper work, etc. Not a moment should be lost.

"The ninth month should see the command divided into opposing armies of some 50,000 each, operating against each other with all the particularity of actual war in an area large enough to make a small theater of war with bases, lines of communication, screens, using heavy and horse artillery, air craft, pontoons, the wonderful signaling apparatus, and the many other devices essential to modern warfare, and which can only be brought into play with great bodies of troops, and whose skilled handling can only be perfected in time of peace. This would be the hard month of forced marches, sleepless nights, of hunger and thirst and dirt, but altogether the most important and interesting, and, with the time which peace practice allows for corrections, before it is over the armies should move with clocklike precision. The lives and money this precision would save us in war would compensate the cost, trouble, and perhaps temporary hardships to attain it in peace, a thousand times over.

"The study and practice of shooting would occupy the tenth and eleventh months. The idea still prevails that shooting consists in hitting a big black spot on a big white piece of paper a known distance away. Of course this practice is essential in order to teach men the use of sights, positions of firing, and general familiarity with his weapon. Farther than that it is of small avail in battle firing. Here the target is rarely visible and the range problematical and to be figured by range finders and communicated to the firers by signals. Results are obtained here as everywhere else in militarism only by strict obedience—by discipline—and this is one of the main reasons for placing this part of the training last. Untrained men will not obey instinctively in the excitement of a field firing problem—not willfully disobey, but they will not have acquired the habit of attention so essential to intelligent and concerted action. Moreover, at first they would not have been familiar with the signals for movements and firing, and the voice can not be heard.

"As all can not shoot at once, much time during this month can be devoted to reviews of the subjects they have learned and imparting many things to the men which the curriculum of a soldier should include, the rules of warfare, for instance.

"In the twelfth and last month examinations should be held which, with due consideration of records made during the year should determine the standing of every member of the Army.

"After this the bars should be let down and civilians welcomed and entertained with games, festivities of all kinds, including military exercises and ceremonies."

Mr. KAHN. I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DYER].

Mr. DYER. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, the high esteem in which the chairman and members of this committee are held by this House insures the most earnest consideration for this bill. I believe that it will be enacted into law substantially as it has been prepared by this splendid committee.

With the increase provided for the Army, as set out in this bill, with the assistance that is given to the National Guard of the various States, as the bill provides, and with the men in our country who are now trained, who have had experience, and who are willing and ready to render assistance in time of need, I believe the country will be fully prepared for all possible conditions or emergencies that may arise which may call for the defense of our country.

One of the most agreeable things to me in this bill—and I know to a great portion of the American people—is the fact that the National Guard of the various States are to receive at last from the hands of Congress just recognition and consideration; and I am pleased to note, in the report of the committee, that they are fully satisfied that the Congress has the power and authority to make regulations and provisions for the efficiency of the National Guard. They set out in their report the opinion of the military counsel of the State of Missouri, which is a clear expression of the power of the Federal Government over the militia under the Constitution. I hope that the Members of this House will read that report with care, not only because it comes from Missouri and because some of you ought to be shown, but because it is a most splendid and clear expression of the law and the powers of the Congress under the Constitution respecting the militia.

Mr. Chairman, one of the things that the Congress ought to consider carefully in the enacting of legislation affecting the Army is with respect to the men themselves who go into the Army and who render the service that the Army is created to render to the country. There has been in the past not a too friendly spirit shown by the Congress for the men who have served well and faithfully. There has also been some lack and some neglect on the part of Congress with reference to providing for the men in the service, proper, just, and equitable rights with reference to retirement.

I have introduced a bill (H. R. 12956) upon that subject, "Creating an Army reserve," and I want to call it to your special attention. It is as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That an Army reserve be formed from the men who have served in the United States Army. Men who have served 15 years to retire on one-half pay of the rank and grade held by them at the time of retirement and the allowances as now provided by the law, and to serve with the reserves for a period of 15 years; men who have served 20 years to retire on two-thirds pay of the rank and grade held by them at the time of retirement and the allowances as now provided by law, and to serve with the reserves for a period of 10 years; men who have served 25 years to retire on three-fourths pay of the rank and grade held by them at the time of retirement and the allowances as now provided by law, and to serve with the reserves for a period of five years: Provided, That in computing length of service for retirement credit for double time shall be given to those who honorably served 90 days or more in the Army, Navy, or Marine Corps of the United States, either as a regular or volunteer, during the War with Spain or the Philippine insurrection or in China, between April 21, 1898, and July 4, 1902, inclusive, service to be computed from date of enlistment to date of discharge.

We have in this country a great many men who have seen service and who are able and willing to come to the rescue of the Government at any time when there is need. There are at least 50,000 members of the United Spanish War Veterans physically able and ready to serve their country again.

I beg to call attention to a letter from the Canal Zone upon this subject, as follows:

THE PANAMA CANAL,
DEPARTMENT OF OPERATION AND MAINTENANCE,
Cristobal, Canal Zone, March 1, 1916.

Hon. L. C. DYER,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR COMRADE AND COMMANDER IN CHIEF: You probably have been talked deaf, dumb, and blind on the subject of preparedness; but in looking over the different articles that have been submitted by various persons and associations it seems that the most practical solution to get a fair amount of men together who would be available at a moment's notice and who have all the requirements of the trained soldier and sailor could be found in the organization of the United Spanish War Veterans. This organization is composed of men who have had actual experience under fire, and as a body, on the whole, would probably represent a better force than the majority of our regular standing Army of to-day.

It would seem that the right road toward preparedness, to begin with, would be legislation whereby Congress would furnish the members of the United Spanish War Veterans with suitable meeting places, with sufficient arms from the surplus carried in the different arsenals, regulation uniforms, and a small monthly payment that would cover a small amount of traveling expenses, which would help a great many to join who are not members now who would require a small amount of travel. This amount would be payable at the expiration of each month on the proof of attendance of at least one evening a week at meetings. A part of the meetings would be given to certain instructions along military lines to refresh and put members in an up-to-date condition. It might also be a good idea to make it arbitrary that, if practicable, one day a month be used for outside practice drills, hikes, and formations.

Along these lines the Government would supply a sufficient amount of ammunition so that at least once a month a small amount of target practice could be carried on, and once a year each State would have at least two weeks of a general encampment to carry out military maneuvers, the expenses to be borne by the United States Government and to cover all expenses involved.

It is believed in most cases the ordinary lodge has a sufficient number of members to form a company. In case it is impossible to acquire enough for a company additional men of good standing in the community could be voted on to make up the deficiency and become a member of the different posts along the lines of an honorary member or such. Officers of the different posts would assume the relative position of officers of the company. It is believed that the different posts have the men for these different positions, and they should receive compensation from the Government to make it worth their while to keep interest up and to carry out such orders as are necessary to keep the company in a first-class condition at all times. Their reward would also be, in case they were called upon to serve, that they would be embodied in the Volunteer service with provisional appointments covering their different positions.

I have no statistics showing the membership of the organization of the United Spanish War Veterans, but I believe it is safe to assume that there must be at least 50,000 able-bodied men at the present time who would pass any medical examination required for such service. That would mean 50,000 men as good as they are to be found in the United States standing army of to-day, with the additional actual experience under fire that they have all had as a whole, whereas the standing army is continually being filled up with recruits.

If this thing can be put through, it is believed in 30 days thereafter 25,000 more men who are eligible to join would join, as now there are a great many who can not, as their means would not allow them to reach the various posts.

Yours, very truly,
C. C. SNEDEKER.

This matter of retirement is intelligently discussed in a letter to me from a soldier now serving in Hawaii. He writes me as follows:

The viewpoint of a Spanish War veteran, who is also a Regular Army man, on the bill H. R. 10412.

SCHOFIELD BARRACKS,
Hawaii, March 8, 1916.

To Comrade L. C. DYER,
Commander in Chief U. S. W. V., Washington, D. C.:

1. I have just seen a copy of H. R. 10412, a bill introduced by a Mr. DYER. I do not know if you are the author of the bill or not. I do know, however, that the provisions of this bill as regards credit for double time are not what the service members of the United Spanish War Veterans want. So I hope you will pardon me if I take the liberty of addressing you at some length on the matter (not as a soldier addressing a Member of Congress, but as a comrade, in good standing, of the United Spanish War Veterans addressing his commander in chief), and I shall be happy if you will attentively read what I have to say.

2. I am unable to say authoritatively just when or under what conditions retirement was first offered as an inducement to desirable enlisted men to remain in the service. It is a matter of historical record that as far back as the latter part of the eighteenth century officers and enlisted men who had rendered honorable service to the country during the Revolutionary and other wars were, upon their discharge from the service, presented by the Government with homesteads consisting of a stated number of acres of land as a special reward for their service in war. During the years following the practice of specially honoring and rewarding those who served the country in war was kept up under one form or another.

The first provision for the retirement of enlisted men of which I have found authentic record was made by an act of Congress approved February 14, 1885, which was published to the Army February 27, 1885, in General Order No. 18, Headquarters of the Army. The act is as follows:

"Be it enacted, etc., That when an enlisted man has served as such 30 years in the United States Army or Marine Corps, either as a private or as a noncommissioned officer, or both, he shall, by making application to the President, be placed on the retired list hereby created, with the rank held by him at the date of retirement; and he shall thereafter receive 75 per cent of the pay and allowances of the rank upon which he was retired."

This law continued to govern the retirement of enlisted men until 1890, when it was amended by act of Congress approved September 30, 1890, which act was published to the Army October 11, 1890, in General Order No. 121, Headquarters of the Army. The act is as follows:

"Be it enacted, etc., That chapter 67 of volume 23 of the Statutes at Large of the United States, being 'An act to authorize a retired list for privates and noncommissioned officers of the United States Army who have served as such for 30 years or upward,' approved February 14, 1885, be amended to read as follows: 'That when an enlisted man has served as such 30 years in the United States Army or Marine Corps, either as a private or as a noncommissioned officer, or both, he shall, by application to the President, be placed on the retired list hereby created, with the rank held by him at the date of retirement, and he shall receive thereafter 75 per cent of the pay and allowances of the rank upon which he was retired: Provided, That if said enlisted man had war service with the Army in the field, or in the Navy or Marine Corps in active service, either as a Volunteer or Regular, during the War of the Rebellion, such war service shall be computed as double time in computing the 30 years necessary to entitle him to be retired.'"

This, I believe, was the first enactment by Congress of a law allowing double time for war service. After this law had been in operation for some time the question was raised as to what constituted "war service" under this act. A decision was accordingly handed down by the Secretary of War on January 5, 1891, and published to the Army March 10, 1891, in Circular No. 2, Headquarters of the Army, to the effect that the War of the Rebellion began April 15, 1861, and ended August 20, 1866, and that all service rendered with the Army in the field between those dates was considered war service and would be doubled in computing the 30 years necessary for retirement—a total of 5 years 4 months and 5 days.

This retirement law was further amended by act of Congress approved May 26, 1900, and published to the Army in General Orders, No. 76, War Department, June 1, 1900, as follows:

"Provided, That hereafter, in computing the length of service for retirement, credit shall be given the soldier for double the time of his actual service in Porto Rico, Cuba, or the Philippine Islands."

The act of February 14, 1885, modified to embrace its several amendments, was published to the Army in General Orders, No. 140, A. G. O., War Department, 1901, as an amendment to paragraph 146, Army Regulations, as follows:

"When an enlisted man shall have served as such for 30 years, either in the Army or the Marine Corps and the Army, he may apply to The Adjutant General of the Army for retirement. Upon the approval of the application an order will be issued from The Adjutant General's Office transferring him to the retired list and directing that transportation in kind to his home and commutation of subsistence during the necessary travel be given him. Length of war service with the Army in the field, or with the Navy or Marine Corps in active service—either as Volunteer or Regular—during the War of the Rebellion, and actual service in Cuba, Porto Rico, and the Philippine Islands, will be doubled in computing the 30 years necessary to entitle him to be retired. In the computation of war service and service in Cuba, Porto Rico, and the Philippine Islands service as an enlisted man only will be counted."

The act of August 24, 1912, provides in part:

"That in computing length of service for retirement credit for double time for foreign service shall not be given to those who hereafter enlist: And provided further, That nothing in this provision shall be so construed as to forfeit credit for double time already accrued."

The act of February 14, 1885, with its various amendments, and other acts affecting credit for double time, are summed up in paragraph 134 of the Army Regulations, which is here quoted, in part:

"Service as a commissioned officer of the United States Volunteers, organized in 1898 and 1899, or of the Porto Rico Provisional Regiment of Infantry, or of the Philippine Scouts, will count for the purpose of retirement as an enlisted man as though rendered as such, and length of war service with the Army in the field, or with the Navy or Marine Corps in active service—either as Volunteer or Regular—during the War of the Rebellion, and actual service in China, Cuba, the Philippine Islands, the Island of Guam, Alaska, or Panama, or, prior to April 23, 1904, in Porto Rico, will, for men enlisting prior to August 24, 1912, be doubled in computing the 30 years' service necessary to entitle an enlisted man to be retired.

32. From the foregoing it will be seen that ever since the Army was organized Congress has given special recognition in some form or another to those soldiers who remained with the colors in time of war and fought their country's battles; the system of giving double time for service in war being first inaugurated by the act of September 30, 1890, under which law a period of five years four months and five days was doubled for the benefit of those who served in the War of the Rebellion.

4. From the wording of this bill (H. R. 10412) it is the evident intention to take away credit for all double time already accrued except for those who enlisted during the War with Spain. Under this construction a soldier who was already in the service at the outbreak of the war would get no double time. Taking my own case as an example, I was serving at the outbreak of the war on an enlistment entered upon in January, 1898; during this enlistment I served through the campaign at Santiago de Cuba and went back to Cuba the second time with the army of occupation, serving nearly two and one-half years in Cuba on this enlistment. Under the proposed bill I would not get a single day's double time; yet a man who enlisted after the outbreak of the war in an organization which never left its own permanent station would have his whole enlistment doubled for the purpose of retirement. Surely the injustice of such a provision must be apparent to all who give it serious thought.

Further, I believe it would undoubtedly work an injustice to take away any of the double time, credit for which has already been given; a consideration which the Nation's lawmakers enacted and ordained that we should hereafter enjoy; a consideration which, unquestioningly accepted by us in good faith, has caused a number of us to remain in the service and give to it the best part of our lives.

There is no doubt in my mind that as many veterans of the War with Spain have already been retired from the service as there are yet in the service who will attain the retired list. Those already retired did so with the help of the double time they had accumulated. They are no better men than their comrades still on the active list. The proposed bill, however, contains no provision to forfeit their double time and bring them back to the active service.

A large percentage of the men now in active service who served during the War with Spain have accumulated to their credit (counting their subsequent tours of insular service) from five to seven years' service which counts double for retirement. The proposed bill would require them to serve from six months to two years longer to earn their retirement than would be the case were no such bill enacted.

Probably of those who have earned credit for double time under the law not more than 1,500 to 2,000 will ever reach the retired list. It is not much in comparison with the hardships most of them have undergone to expect that faith be kept with them in the matter of double time already placed to their credit.

5. If the proposed bill were amended to something like this, it would be something like what the service members of the United Spanish War Veterans believe they have a right to expect:

Strike out beginning with fourth word, first line, second page, to end of bill, and substitute therefor:

"Provided, That nothing in this bill shall be so construed as to forfeit credit for double time already accrued."

6. In conclusion, I beg to assure you that I am not speaking for myself alone, but for a large number of service members of the United Spanish War Veterans whose views I have obtained on this subject.

Yours, in F. P. and H.,

E. J. McELLANEY,
Past Department Commander United Spanish War Veterans.

I have introduced a bill along this line that ought to be passed. It is as follows:

A bill (H. R. 8808) authorizing the issuance of arms to rifle clubs, and for other purposes.

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of War is hereby authorized to issue, under such rules and regulations as he may prescribe, such arms as may be available for the purpose to rifle clubs organized by posts of the Grand Army of the Republic or camps of the United Spanish War Veterans and Sons of Veterans, United States of America. Such clubs shall be designated by the name of the posts, camps, or garrisons organizing them.

SEC. 2. That such clubs shall consist of 10 or more native or naturalized citizens of the United States of America of ages between 18 and 45, inclusive, and who are physically fitted for service in the field. They shall be enrolled for a period of six months and take an oath of allegiance to the United States as against all enemies and opposers whatsoever, foreign or domestic.

SEC. 3. That on the first day of each calendar month the commander of such club shall transmit to the War Department a report of these enrollments, with a description of each individual; also all changes in the membership and the attendance at all meetings and exercises of the club. Such reports shall become part of the records of the War Department.

SEC. 4. That such clubs shall be encouraged to unite with other similar clubs in contiguous territory to form companies and regiments. Upon request the Secretary of War may assign officers of the Regular Army on the retired list to commands in such organization.

SEC. 5. That six months after enrollment and after having made a record of attendance upon 75 per cent of the meetings and exercises a member may withdraw and receive a certificate of service. The Secretary of War may prescribe a score of efficiency. Members not attaining this may be dropped upon notice being given.

SEC. 6. That the Secretary of War is authorized to establish a bureau of rifle clubs, to be administered by an officer of field rank, whose duty it shall be to keep the records, direct the organization, furnish the supplies, hold accountability for the same, and have periodical inspection of all clubs organized under this act.

I believe, Mr. Chairman, that the boys of our country should be taught military tactics and things that will go to make them good and efficient soldiers when the country needs their services. We ought to have a better and a larger trained body of men in our citizenship than we have had in the past.

Some of you gentlemen of the House recall the condition in which we entered the War with Spain. You will recall that it was necessary for the President to call for volunteers to be hastily organized and brought together without training, without experience, and without equipment. That was due to the fact that our Army was so small and it was necessary to have the volunteers at once. You gentlemen will recall the fact that the men who had charge of organizing regiments were largely unable and unfitted to do the work, and the result was that men went to the camps without equipment, and without medical or other officers in charge competent and qualified to look after the men.

The result of that course was that many of the men lost their lives because of the fever-stricken camps, real pest holes, such as Chickamauga and other camps in this country. Hence it is no wonder that many men sickened and died from exposure in many of these camps. That, gentlemen, ought never to have been permitted in a great country like this. Men who come forward to serve their country—full of patriotism—ought to have every consideration that will make it possible for them to retain their health.

I believe, Mr. Chairman, that the men who enlist in the Army should receive more consideration than they have received in the past. I am glad therefore to see in the bill some provisions intended to improve the service, all of which will encourage young men to enlist and serve their country. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE].

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, an appeal from the Christian ministers of Philadelphia has been forwarded to me, and it has so direct a bearing upon the problem now under discussion that I ask unanimous consent to extend it in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly, the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. GARRETT, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (H. R.

12766) to increase the efficiency of the Military Establishment of the United States, and had directed him to report that they had come to no resolution thereon.

SENATE CONCURRENT RESOLUTION REFERRED.

Under clause 2, Rule XXIV, Senate concurrent resolution 16 was taken from the Speaker's table and referred to its appropriate committee, as indicated below:

Senate concurrent resolution 16.

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That there be printed and bound, under the direction of the Joint Committee on Printing, the proceedings in Congress, together with the proceedings at the unveiling in Statuary Hall, upon the acceptance of the statue of Henry Mower Rice presented by the State of Minnesota, 16,500 copies, with suitable illustration, of which 5,000 shall be for the use of the Senate and 10,000 for the use of the House of Representatives, and the remaining 1,500 copies shall be for the use and distribution of the Senators and Representatives in Congress from the State of Minnesota—to the Committee on Printing.

DIPLOMATIC AND CONSULAR APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. FLOOD, chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, by direction of that committee, reported a bill (H. R. 13383, H. Rept. 372) making appropriations for the Diplomatic and Consular Service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1917, which, with accompanying papers, was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. MANN reserved all points of order on the bill.

DISPOSITION OF USELESS PAPERS.

Mr. TALBOTT, from the Joint Select Committee on Disposition of Useless Papers in the Executive Departments, reported that that committee had examined the useless files and papers in the following departments and found that they are not needed in the transaction of current business of such departments and bureaus and have no permanent value or historical interest, and submitted reports thereon, which were ordered to be printed:

Treasury Department (H. Doc. 363, H. Rept. 373);
Post Office Department (H. Doc. 523, H. Rept. 374);
Department of Commerce (H. Doc. 613, H. Rept. 375);
Navy Department (H. Doc. 675, H. Rept. 376);
Department of Labor (H. Doc. 662, H. Rept. 377); and Department of the Interior (H. Doc. 649, H. Rept. 378).

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 55 minutes p. m.) the House under the rule adjourned until tomorrow, Saturday, March 18, 1916, at 11 o'clock a. m.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PUBLIC BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII, bills and resolutions were severally reported from committees, delivered to the Clerk, and referred to the several calendars therein named, as follows:

Mr. CARAWAY, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to which was referred the bill (S. 377) providing for the establishment of a term of the district court for the middle district of Tennessee, at Winchester, Tenn., reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 370), which said bill and report were referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. OGLESBY, from the Committee on Patents, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 11798) providing for the temporary employment of typewriters in the Patent Office, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 371), which said bill and report were referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXII, committees were discharged from the consideration of the following bills, which were referred as follows:

A bill (H. R. 7469) granting a pension to J. L. Smith; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions discharged, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

A bill (H. R. 10930) granting a pension to Moses A. Coleman; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions discharged, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

PUBLIC BILLS, RESOLUTIONS, AND MEMORIALS.

Under clause 3 of Rule XXII, bills, resolutions, and memorials were introduced and severally referred as follows:

By Mr. EDMONDS: A bill (H. R. 13339) to establish a fish hatchery on the lower Delaware River; to the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries.

By Mr. JAMES: A bill (H. SENATE.

SATURDAY, March 18, 1916.

The Chaplain, Rev. Forrest J. Prettyman, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, our fathers trusted in Thee and were not confounded. The ministry of Thy grace has come to us through the influence of the faithful and the achievements of those who have trusted in Thy holy name. The light of Thy glory has not grown dim with the ages. When we have doubted it has been by the influence of the things which we doubt; when we have mistrusted God it has been by the ministry of the things which we ourselves have mistrusted.

Grant us to-day a clear and personal vision of Thy face, that we may know Thy glory, and may know that over all there is a hand that guides and governs and rules, the hand of our God. Let Thy blessing abide with us to this end. For Christ's sake. Amen.

NAMING A PRESIDING OFFICER.

The Secretary (James M. Baker) read the following communication:

UNITED STATES SENATE, PRESIDENT PRO TEMPORE,
Washington, D. C., March 18, 1916.

To the Senate:

Being temporarily absent from the Senate, I appoint Hon. LEE S. OVERMAN, a Senator from the State of North Carolina, to perform the duties of the Chair during my absence.

JAMES P. CLARKE,
President pro tempore.

Mr. OVERMAN thereupon took the chair as Presiding Officer and directed the Secretary to read the Journal of the proceedings of the preceding day.

The Secretary proceeded to read the Journal of yesterday's proceedings, when, on request of Mr. MARTIN of Virginia, and by unanimous consent, the further reading was dispensed with and the Journal was approved.

NATIONAL DEFENSE.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President, I give notice that on next Thursday I shall submit some remarks on the subject of preparedness for peace.

STRATEGICAL IMPORTANCE OF NAVAL STATIONS (S. DOC. NO. 344.)

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have the article I send to the desk printed as a public document. It was prepared by Admiral John R. Edwards, and sent to the United States Naval Institute in competition for a gold medal given by that body. I heard of it and asked to see it, and Admiral Edwards kindly sent it to me. Its viewpoint is so different from that of the average naval officer at the department and so much in consonance with my own ideas and belief that I want to give it the widest possible publicity; or, at least, put it in the archives of the Government so that it can not be lost. Whether the policy he advocates be followed or not, those who read it now or in future years must realize the breadth of view and the patriotic statesmanship he has shown in writing it.

For the purpose of letting people know who Admiral Edwards is, as he is very modest and not self-assertive at all, I will state that he is a retired admiral of the United States and is an accomplished engineer, and that he graduated at the Naval Academy in the engineer force in 1874. He has been at sea on all sorts of naval vessel 16 years, all told. His shore duty has also been varied, and while serving for three years as professor of mechanical engineering at the South Carolina University, where I first knew him, he graduated in law. He was assistant for six years to Admiral Melville, who everybody in Congress knows was a very able engineer. His extensive travel and habit of reading give him very wide acquaintance with all activities connected with our own and foreign navies. He served for two years as president of the Board of Inspection for Shore Stations, to which he was appointed by Mr. Meyer. This specially fits him for discussing the matters in the article mentioned. He takes a broader view and one more philosophical than many naval officers far more prominent in naval circles. Although born in the North he has not allowed sectionalism in any way to interfere with his study of the Navy's needs, from a southern as well as a nothern standpoint.

The most striking thing about this article is his antithetical statement that the advocacy of preparing a great fleet involved as a necessary corollary the provision of yards, piers, and so forth, to repair that fleet and take care of it in war and peace. To prepare and not provide for repair is in his judgment short-sighted and dangerous. His only fault as a writer is his anxiety to "tell it all," which makes him use too many words; but the wheat is there—lots of it—so I advise anyone, in the Navy or out of it, who wishes to study this last proposition to read this article. It will amply repay perusal two or three times.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to printing the article indicated by the Senator from South Carolina as a public document? The Chair hears no objection, and it is so ordered.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by J. C. South, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. 11471) to amend an act entitled "An act to reduce tariff duties and to provide revenue for the Government, and for other purposes," approved October 3, 1913, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

The message also announced that the House disagrees to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 562) to amend the act approved June 25, 1910, authorizing a Postal Savings System, asks a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. MOON, Mr. FINLEY, and Mr. STEENERSON managers at the conference on the part of the House.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. NORRIS presented memorials of sundry citizens of Crawford and Burkett, in the State of Nebraska, remonstrating against the enactment of legislation to make Sunday a day of rest in the District of Columbia, which were ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. GRONNA. I present a resolution adopted by the Minnesota Conference of the Augustana Synod, favoring the placing of an embargo on munitions of war. I ask that the resolution be printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

There being no objection, the resolution was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE LUTHERAN MINNESOTA CONFERENCE OF THE AUGUSTANA SYNOD,
Minneapolis, Minn., March 13, 1916.

Senator ASLE J. GRONNA,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR:

Since it is the sense of the 100,000 citizens represented by the Minnesota Conference of the Augustana Synod that the sale of munitions of war to belligerent nations is not in harmony with our Nation's prayer for peace nor compatible with true humanity; and

Since the United States having de facto discontinued to exercise its rights to carry on its commerce with the central powers, and thus by partisan dealings with the belligerent nations threatens to drag our country into the European war: Therefore,

Resolved by the Minnesota conference in session assembled, That the Representatives and Senators of the United States be most earnestly requested and urged to empower the President to place an embargo on munitions of war and to warn our citizens against traveling on belligerent ships: Be it further

Resolved, That the secretary of the conference send a copy of these resolutions to all the United States Representatives and Senators of the States of Minnesota, North and South Dakota, and Wisconsin within which States said conference carries on its manifold branches of work.

Yours, very truly,

JOHAN B. A. IDSTRÖM,
Secretary of Conference.

Mr. GRONNA presented a petition of the Commercial Club, of Larimore, N. Dak., praying for an appropriation to put in commission the superdreadnaught North Dakota, which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

He also presented a memorial of the Louisiana Division of the Farmers' Educational and Cooperative Union of America, remonstrating against certain provisions of the so-called cotton-futures bill, which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

He also presented a petition of the National Education Association, the American Federation of Labor, and the American Home Economics Association, praying for Federal aid for vocational education, which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. BRANDEGEE presented petitions of the Woman's Christian Temperance Unions of East Haven and Plainfield, in the State of Connecticut, praying for Federal censorship of motion pictures, which were referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

Mr. ROBINSON presented a petition of sundry citizens of Alexander, Ark., praying for the placing of an embargo on munitions of war, which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. SIMMONS presented petitions of sundry citizens of North Carolina, praying for national prohibition, which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. TOWNSEND presented petitions of sundry citizens of Michigan, praying for national prohibition, which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented a memorial of Local Union No. 228, Musicians' Protective Association, of Kalamazoo, Mich., remonstrating against the adoption of certain amendments to the copyright law, which was referred to the Committee on Patents.

He also presented a petition of Local Union No. 130, Cigar Makers' International Union, of Saginaw, Mich., praying for the enactment of legislation to further restrict immigration, which was referred to the Committee on Immigration.

Mr. DU PONT presented petitions of sundry citizens of Wilmington, Dover, Leipsic, and Wyoming, all in the State of Delaware, praying for national prohibition, which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. GALLINGER presented a petition of Merrimack Lodge, No. 5, International Order of Good Templars, of Manchester, and the petition of A. M. White and 6 other citizens, of East Rochester, all in the State of New Hampshire, praying for national prohibition, which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. KENYON presented a memorial of sundry citizens of Iowa Falls, Iowa, remonstrating against the enactment of legislation to fix a standard price for patented and trade-marked articles, which was referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

He also presented a memorial of sundry citizens of Moulton, Iowa, remonstrating against the enactment of legislation to make Sunday a day of rest in the District of Columbia, which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. HUGHES presented petitions of sundry citizens of New Jersey, praying for national prohibition, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. PHELAN presented petitions of Local Union No. 108, International Brotherhood of Stationary Firemen, and of Local Union No. 228, Cigarmakers' International Union, of San Francisco; and of the Amalgamated Sheet Metal Workers International Alliance, and the Bridge and Structural Iron Workers and Pile Drivers, of Los Angeles, all in the State of California, praying for the enactment of legislation to further restrict immigration, which were referred to the Committee on Immigration.

He also presented a petition of General Guy V. Henry Camp No. 3, United Spanish War Veterans, of Oakland, Cal., praying for the enactment of legislation to grant pensions to widows and orphans of veterans of the Spanish-American War, which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also presented a petition of Camp No. 1673, United Confederate Veterans, of Visalia, Cal., praying for the enactment of legislation to grant pensions to veterans of the Confederate Army and to widows of such veterans, which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming presented a petition of sundry citizens of Torrington, Wyo., praying for national prohibition, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented petitions of sundry citizens of Lander and Rawlins, in the State of Wyoming, praying for an increase in armaments, which were ordered to lie on the table.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEE ON POST OFFICES AND POST ROADS.

Mr. BANKHEAD, from the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, to which were referred the following bills, reported them severally without amendment, and submitted reports thereon:

S. 4884. A bill for the relief of the estate of A. B. Denton (S. Rept. 267);

H. R. 8592. An act for the relief of the heirs of C. S. Barbee (S. Rept. 268);

H. R. 9291. An act for the relief of the estate of Thomas J. Mellon (S. Rept. 269);

H. R. 8787. An act for the relief of the heirs of Hundley V. Fowler, deceased (S. Rept. 270);

H. R. 9458. An act for the relief of the heirs of Santos Benavides (S. Rept. 271);

H. R. 9459. An act for the relief of the heirs of S. P. H. Williams (S. Rept. 272);

H. R. 9555. An act for the relief of the estate of Thomas N. Aaron (S. Rept. 273);

H. R. 9556. An act for the relief of the heirs of John Faulkner (S. Rept. 274);

H. R. 9635. An act for the relief of the estate of Williamson Page (S. Rept. 275);

H. R. 5986. An act for the relief of the heirs of the late Peter Deel (S. Rept. 276);

H. R. 10933. An act for the relief of the estate of Paul A. Swink (S. Rept. 277); and

H. R. 3447. An act for the relief of the legal representatives of the estate of Robert B. Pearce (S. Rept. 278).

TOMBIGBEE RIVER BRIDGE.

Mr. SHEPPARD. From the Committee on Commerce I report back favorably with an amendment the bill (S. 4603) to authorize the Jackson Highway Bridge Co., its successors and assigns, to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge across the Tom Beckby, commonly called "Tombigbee," River at Princes Lower Landing, near Jackson, Ala., and I submit a report (No. 266) thereon. I ask for the present consideration of the bill.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The amendment was, in line 8, page 1, before the words "Princes Lower Landing," to insert "or near," so as to read "at or near Princes Lower Landing."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Bills were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. CULBERSON:

A bill (S. 5120) to provide punishment for assaults and threats against the President of the United States and his potential successors in office; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. TOWNSEND:

A bill (S. 5121) for the relief of Emma M. Gordon (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. KENYON:

A bill (S. 5122) granting an increase of pension to Samuel B. Swift (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. SHAFROTH:

A bill (S. 5123) granting a pension to Caroline M. Clancy;

A bill (S. 5124) granting an increase of pension to George A. White; and

A bill (S. 5125) granting an increase of pension to Sadie M. W. Likens; to the Committee on Pensions.

AMENDMENT TO LEGISLATIVE APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. BANKHEAD submitted an amendment proposing to increase the salary of the clerk to the Senate Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads from $2,500 to $3,000, intended to be proposed by him to the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill (H. R. 12207), which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

SWISS MILITARY LAW (S. DOC. NO. 360).

Mr. LEE of Maryland. I desire to submit a resolution providing for the printing of the Swiss military law, with an index. I think it will be very valuable to the Senate at this time.

Mr. SMOOT. I should like to ask the Senator about how many pages the document will contain.

Mr. LEE of Maryland. Between 50 and 75 pages, I should say.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

The resolution (S. Res. 138) was read, considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That the manuscript entitled "The Military Law and the Efficient Citizen Army of the Swiss Republic" be printed as a Senate document, together with the index.

OSAGE OIL LANDS.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I submit a resolution and ask that it lie on the table and be printed.

The resolution (S. Res. 137) was ordered to lie on the table and to be printed, as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Indian Affairs of the Senate, through a subcommittee of five members to be chosen by it, be, and it hereby is, authorized and directed to fully investigate all matters connected with the leasing of the oil lands of the Osage Indians in Oklahoma, the methods of producing, controlling, and marketing the oil production of said lands and all affairs in relation thereto, and that said committee be empowered to send for persons, papers, and books, and to subpœna witnesses, to administer oaths, and to sit during the sessions of the Senate and during vacation; and said committee shall make full and complete report, together with its recommendations thereon to the Senate. The necessary expenses of said investigation shall be paid out of the contingent fund of the Senate.

That pending investigation by the Committee on Indian Affairs of the Senate and further action by Congress, the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, requested to make no sale of oil leases and to make no oil leases on the lands of the Osage Indians in Oklahoma for a period exceeding 10 years.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

H. R. 11471. An act to amend an act entitled "An act to reduce tariff duties and to provide revenue for the Government, and for other purposes," approved October 3, 1913, was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Finance.

POSTAL SAVINGS SYSTEM.

The PRESIDING OFFICER laid before the Senate the action of the House of Representatives disagreeing to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 562) to amend the act approved June 25, 1910, authorizing a Postal Savings System and requesting a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I move that the Senate insist upon its amendments, agree to the conference asked for by the House, the conferees on the part of the Senate to be appointed by the Chair.

The motion was agreed to, and the Presiding Officer appointed Mr. BANKHEAD, Mr. SMITH of South Carolina, and Mr. TOWNSEND conferees on the part of the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The morning business is closed.

NATIONAL DEFENSE.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. President, I do not propose to-day to enter into anything like a general discussion of the question commonly and generally known as "preparedness," although I will take this occasion to say in a general way that I am heartily in favor of a reasonable program on that subject, fully adequate to meet the necessities of the present situation and fully calculated to put this country in a position to successfully defend itself against any possible foe, to assert and enforce its rights, and to protect and defend its people.

To that end, I am fully prepared to vote any reasonable increase for our Navy, for the correct American view has always been that a strong, well-balanced Navy is our strongest weapon both for offense and defense. I believe, however, that a great deal of misapprehension exists among the people as to the real strength and relative rank of the American Navy. Without undertaking now to specify the authority upon which it is based, although it is most respectable and reliable, I venture to express the opinion that the American Navy already, in gun power and tonnage displacement, ranks third among the navies of the world and is destined to take the second place in the event the German Navy suffers materially from the present war; and also that our Navy is, man for man, gun for gun, and ship for ship, the best in the world. That it is somewhat top-heavy with battleships I believe; but that Congress may provide a proper and well-balanced plan to increase its efficiency by providing the necessary submarines, tenders, coalers, aircraft, and other auxiliary service, as well as provide some way of securing the necessary men to man the ships, is both my hope and belief. A reasonable plan to increase the strength and efficiency of our Navy in a well-balanced, rounded way is or ought to be the task of the immediate present, with a view of putting that Navy indisputably in the second place among the navies of the world as to size and strength and first among them as to efficiency and morale.

In addition to this program, I believe that our coast defenses should be materially improved and strengthened and that a reasonable increase in the size of our standing army is desirable.

It seems to me, also, that the one important consideration in connection with both our military and naval establishments that has been most sadly neglected has been the development of an adequate and efficient corps of aeroplanes, and since as a Member of the other House of Congress I have long urged increases in this branch of the service, which I regard as all important in these days of modern warfare, I earnestly hope this particular phase of the question of preparedness will be given the most careful consideration by the Congress and that such action may be taken in respect to it as to bring us up to the standard of the most efficient armies and navies of the world.

Of course, Mr. President, even such action with respect to our Navy, our coast defenses, our standing army will still leave to us the settlement of one of the most troublesome as well as the most important questions connected with preparedness, namely, How and exactly in what manner shall we make provision for a reserve military force for our country?

The opposition of the people to a large standing army and to compulsory military service, with the tremendous expense and burden to business and industry incident thereto, is not only deep-seated and general but also, in my opinion, well founded and insuperable.

The happy geographical isolation of our country and the democratic and peaceful instincts of its people seem to render it unnecessary for us to embark in the European policy of maintaining an enormous military establishment, and that we are exempt from any such necessity has always been justly esteemed as one of our greatest blessings.

I do not believe that the present situation in any way necessitates or justifies any abandonment of this traditional American policy.

"Peace at any price," can never be the motto of a great nation, or the doctrine of a brave and self-respecting people, but peace, so long as it can be preserved with honor, is the greatest blessing that can come to and remain with a people, and I am confident that no American President or Congress will ever lightly or carelessly involve this country in war with a foreign power.

Prior to the summer of 1914 it seemed incomprehensible and unbelievable that the great Christian powers of the world should become involved in a great war with each other, so great had been the apparent progress, and so wide had been the general spread of both Christianity and education, but on August 2, 1914, the world awoke to the realization that, after all, a reversion to the primitive was not impossible, even with the most highly civilized peoples of the earth, and realizing that war, on a great scale, may come at almost any time, to any nation, our own people have, I think, pretty generally come to the conclusion that it is not only wise, but also absolutely necessary for us to put this country in a position where its people can successfully defend it against any foreign foe.

What plan, then, can we adopt that will least offend against our democratic principles and institutions, will least burden the business and industry of the country, and will, at the same time, give to large masses of our citizens the necessary training that will enable them to render efficient military service for the protection of their country if the unfortunate necessity therefor should arise?

Compulsory and general military service? The very genius of our institutions and the very instincts of our people forbid, unless the stern necessities of a great war should absolutely require it.

Can we, then, make the militia of the various States, sometimes improperly call the "National Guard" the basis of our reserves?

To some extent, yes. I favor increased appropriations to promote their efficiency and to make service in these organizations as attractive and popular as possible, for no one with even a superficial acquaintance with American history can deny that our "citizen soldiery" has made a brilliant record in every war in which this country has been engaged, but there are at least two strong objections to the policy of relying entirely upon these forces for our reserves.

First. The State troops owe allegiance first of all, and properly so, to the various States under whose laws, and by whose authority, they are organized. In times of peace the Government of the United States can exercise little or no real control over these State troops, and whatever influence it can exert must be done in an indirect and awkward way, through holding out the reward of promised appropriations, or the threat of withdrawing appropriations already made.

Second. Under the Constitution of the United States, Congress alone has power to call the State troops into the service of the General Government, and then only "to execute the laws of the Union, suppress insurrections, and repel invasions."

While Congress may, if it chooses, provide for "organizing, arming, and disciplining the militia," it may "govern" only "such part of them as may be employed in the service of the United States," and even as to the militia employed in such service, "the appointment of the officers" is "reserved to the States."

These quotations, from Article I, section 8, paragraphs 15 and 16 of the Constitution, simply state and mark the difficulties that Congress and the President would have in relying solely on the State militia as the second line of our National Army.

We can, and I believe Congress will, make further and more generous provision than we have in the past "for organizing, arming, and disciplining the militia," but after all it must be always remembered that they are primarily the troops of the State and owe their primary allegiance and obedience to the State, and, so far as war with a foreign power is concerned, could be used only to "repel invasion," even though a situation might arise in which a sharp and vigorous offense would be the most effective defense of our country.

In this situation I have prepared a bill which I have recently introduced in this body and which has been referred to our Committee on Military Affairs.

Let me now invite the attention of the Senate, and particularly of Senators who belong to that committee, to its provisions and to some of the reasons that prompt me to believe it deserves the most serious consideration both of Congress and of the country and ought to be enacted into law:

"Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Secretary of War is hereby authorized and directed to detail, for service as instructor in military tactics, one or more commissioned officers of the United States Army to every college and school in the United States in which there are as many as 50 male students 15 years of age and over in all cases where the college or school authorities make application for said detail, under the provisions of this act, and accompany such application with a statement signed by 50 or more of such students that they desire to become a part of the reserve forces of the United States Army, under the provisions of this act.

"SEC. 2. That upon the filing of an application, as provided for in the preceding section of this act, the Secretary of War shall detail a representative of the War Department to personally examine into the merits of such application to ascertain whether the facts therein stated are true, and also whether the parents or guardians of any minor students of such school or college have assented to such minor students entering into the agreement hereinbefore provided, and all other facts in connection with the advisability of granting or rejecting the application, which he shall report to the Secretary of War, who shall thereupon determine whether or not said application shall be granted.

"SEC. 3. That in case the said Secretary of War determines to grant the application of such school or college, he shall require such male students, 15 years of age and over, who are to receive the benefits of the training herein provided, to sign such papers as he may prescribe and determine, agreeing and obligating to enlist as a part of the reserve forces of the United States Army for and during the term of their connection with such school or college, including vacations, and in no event for less than 12 months. Such students shall not be subject to active military service, except in connection with their training and except in connection with such mobilizations as may be had during school vacations, for which latter service they shall be paid at the same rate that officers and men in the Regular Army of corresponding grades and ranks are paid: Provided, That in the event the United States becomes engaged in war or it should become necessary to use troops to repel invasion, suppress insurrection, or maintain peace and order under the Constitution and laws of the United States, then the President of the United States is authorized to call into active military service the whole or any part of the reserve forces herein provided for a period not to exceed 12 months.

"SEC. 4. That the Secretary of War is hereby authorized to prescribe all necessary rules and regulations for the honorable discharge of members of the reserve force from the service upon the completion of their terms of service as hereinbefore provided, and in such other cases as may seem to him reasonable and just, and to provide for the enlistment from time to time of additional students at every school or college where such application is granted.

"SEC. 5. That the Secretary of War is hereby authorized and directed to furnish to all of the reserve forces organized under this act similar arms and equipment to those furnished to the Regular Army of the United States.

"SEC. 6. That if it should become necessary, in order to carry out the provisions of this act, the President of the United States is authorized to provide by appointment a sufficient number of suitable and capable officers of the United States Army to be detailed for duty under the terms of this act.

"SEC. 7. That the sum of $20,000,000, or as much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby appropriated, out of any funds in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to carry out the provisions of this act."

According to the census of 1910 there were attending the schools and colleges of the United States 1,948,398 males of all classes, 15 years of age and over. Of this number 1,782,300 were whites, 153,769 were negroes, and 12,329 were Indians, Chinese, Japanese, and others.

Military training in connection with the schools and colleges is so desirable and so beneficial that a large percentage of well-to-do parents send their boys to schools that afford such training.

The bill I offer does not make it compulsory on any school or college to accept its benefits, and no school or college can do so unless it has at least 50 boys 15 years of age and over who are desirous of accepting it, and agree with the full consent of their parents or guardians to do so.

If the bill should be enacted into law, I believe, and no man can do more than predict until we try it out, that a considerable per centum of all the schools and colleges will accept instruction, arms, and equipment under the terms of the bill.

If we get even 25 per cent of the boys attending the schools and colleges to join it, then we would have a magnificent reserve force of 500,000 men for our second battle line.

The military training and discipline that these young men would receive would be incalculably valuable to them physically, mentally, and morally, and as each class graduated from school or college its members would go out into the walks of civil life with enough military training and knowledge to render them able to give efficient service to their country if need should arise. At the same time there would be no burden upon the business and industry of the country.

As each class graduated the ranks would be filled by the younger boys coming on, so that we would have in this country a constantly increasing number of young men with some military training who were capable of defending the country, without a correspondingly increasing public expense.

These young men could be drilled and disciplined during school days and on Saturdays, and could be mobilized into regiments, brigades, and even larger units during their vacations. For this latter service I think they should receive small compensation, corresponding to the pay of Regular troops. They could be called into active service only at the instance of the President of the United States himself and only in the event that the United States became involved in war, or needed them to "repel invasion, suppress insurrection, or maintain peace and order under the Constitution and laws of the United States."

Mr. President, the system I suggest is, it seems to me, the real solution of the troublesome question that confronts us.

It does not offend against our democratic institutions and instincts, because it has in it not the slightest trace of enforced or compulsory military service. It will afford to our country an insurance policy of constantly increasing value, as year by year it increases the number of our young men who are made capable of efficient military service and who could really and effectively aid in the defense of the country.

The expense that it entails would be strictly measured and exactly limited by the results it produces. For if, as I believe, a large number of young men in our schools and colleges are willing, indeed anxious, to receive the benefits of this training, then, while the expense of officering, arming, and equipping them will be admittedly large, it will only be large in exact proportion to the number of reserves it will furnish.

Comparatively, it will cost far less than any other efficient system that can be devised.

If, on the other hand, we get small returns in the number of reserves, the cost will be small and in exactly corresponding degree.

These young men would be already mobilized in large numbers at every great American city. For instance, it is estimated that New York City would have at least 50,000 reserves, constituted of her own boys, Chicago would have more than half as many, Atlanta probably 2,000 or more. Every American city of whatever size would have already mobilized and concentrated within its own limits a reserve force composed of its own boys proportioned to its population.

Mr. President, these young men would constitute our first battle line, in any event, if this country had a war with a power of the first magnitude. That being true, how much better it is for both the country and themselves to give to them, certainly to all of them who wish to take it, all possible preparation and equipment for the efficient discharge of the first and foremost duty that every patriotic citizen owes to his country if war should come to it.

At this time I shall not trouble myself or fatigue the Senate with a discussion of the details of the proposition. They are unimportant and can be modified to meet any good objections that can be urged to them or to any of them.

But the suggestion itself, the plan it proposes, the system it would establish, is, I believe, of far-reaching importance to the country, and I earnestly hope that it may receive now or in the near future the serious consideration of our committee and of the Senate itself.

PROHIBITION IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, I had given notice that to-day I would follow the Senator from Georgia [Mr. HARDWICK], but I understand the Senator from Oregon [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN] would like to have taken up the bill for an increase in the number of cadets at West Point that was under consideration yesterday, and which will probably only take a few moments. I understand also that the Appropriations Committee would like to have the urgent deficiency appropriation bill passed. I will yield for that purpose, unless the measures to which I have referred consume too much time, in which case I shall ask for recognition.

INCREASE IN NUMBER OF CADETS AT WEST POINT.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, I should like to have the Senate take up and act upon the bill (S. 4876) to provide for an increase in the number of cadets at the United States Military Academy.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill named by the Senator from Oregon? The Chair hears none.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 4876) to provide for an increase in the number of cadets at the United States Military Academy.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I believe the Senator from Kentucky has an amendment which he desires to present.

Mr. JAMES. Mr. President, I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Kentucky will be stated.

The SECRETARY. In line 4, on page 1, after the word "two," it is proposed to strike out the word "from" and to insert the word "for"; in line 10, on page 1, after the words "of the," it is proposed to strike out the words "congressional or."

Mr. JAMES. That amendment, Mr. President, provides that a Representative who has not an eligible in his district for appointment as a cadet at West Point may, if he so desires, appoint a young man from another congressional district in his State.

Mr. REED. I am unable to hear the Senator from Kentucky.

Mr. JAMES. Under the law as it now exists a Representative can only appoint a young man from his own congressional district as a cadet to West Point, but in some of the districts there are no applicants. This amendment proposes to make it permissible, if the Representative desires to do so, for him to appoint a cadet to West Point from some congressional district in the State other than his own. I think it is a wise amendment, and that it should be adopted.

Mr. GALLINGER. Let the text be read as it will read if the amendment be adopted.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The language will be read as proposed to be amended.

The SECRETARY. As proposed to be amended it will read:

That the Corps of Cadets at the United States Military Academy shall hereafter consist of 2 for each congressional district, 2 from each Territory, 4 from the District of Columbia, 2 from natives of Porto Rico, 4 from each State at large, and 60 from the United States at large. They shall be appointed by the President and shall, with the exception of the 60 appointed from the United States at large, be actual residents of the Territorial district, or of the District of Columbia, or of the island of Porto Rico, or of the States, respectively, from which they purport to be appointed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the adoption of the amendment proposed by the Senator from Kentucky.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, I desire to say that, since the Senate adjourned, I have taken up this matter with the Judge Advocate General and asked his opinion as to the propriety of accepting the amendment and whether it would meet the objections which were made by a number of Senators yesterday, notably by the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. LIPPITT] and the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. JAMES]. The Judge Advocate General thought the amendment would meet those objections and relieve some trouble that the department has had in dealing with the subject.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President, let me ask the Senator from Kentucky whether he thinks he has made it perfectly clear that the appointees for the congressional district must come from the State in which the congressional district is situated?

Mr. JAMES. Undoubtedly that is clear, Mr. President, because it provides that they shall be from the Territorial district or the District of Columbia or the island of Porto Rico or from the States, respectively. There are two appointed for each congressional district.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I caught the reading rather imperfectly and perhaps my impression is an erroneous one.

Mr. JAMES. Provision is made for the appointment of two from each congressional district, and of course they are appointed by the President on the recommendation of the Representative from the district.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. The language is that they shall be "actual residents of the States"——

Mr. JAMES. Respectively.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. "Respectively, from which they purport to be appointed."

Mr. JAMES. That is the provision.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I doubt very much whether the language is such as to make the intention perfectly clear.

Mr. JAMES. I will state to the Senator that I submitted the amendment to the Judge Advocate General of the Army, who said that it met the objection and was the proper way to remedy the situation.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I suggested a form of amendment yesterday which, it seems to me, made it clear. The amendment was to strike out the clause which reads "two from each congressional district," so that it would read:

Two from each Territory, 4 from the District of Columbia, 2 from natives of Porto Rico, 4 from each State at large and in addition 2 for each congressional district within the State, 60 men from the United States at large—

And so on. That form of amendment, it seems to me, would make it clear that the cadets appointed for each congressional district must come from the State in which the respective district may be located.

Mr. JAMES. I do not think there can be any doubt about that under the amendment I have proposed. It provides for the appointment of two cadets for each congressional district, and that they shall be actual residents of the States from which they are appointed. Of course, when a Representative makes an appointment—say, he is a Member of Congress from Utah, his appointee may be from one or the other of the congressional districts of Utah, but he must be a resident of the State of Utah. That is what the amendment means.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. If the Senator is satisfied with the language employed and the Judge Advocate General thinks it is sufficient, I will offer no objection.

Mr. JAMES. I think it is perfectly satisfactory. In this connection I ask leave to have printed in the RECORD a letter from the Judge Advocate General in regard to the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. In the absence of objection, it is so ordered.

The letter referred to is as follows:

WAR DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF THE JUDGE ADVOCATE GENERAL,
Washington, March 17, 1916.

Hon. OLLIE M. JAMES,
United States Senate.

MY DEAR SENATOR JAMES: In response to your telephone inquiry of this afternoon I quote below the law governing the appointment of cadets to the United States Military Academy:

"The Corps of Cadets shall consist of 1 from each congressional district, 1 from each Territory, 1 from the District of Columbia, 2 from each State at large, and 30 from the United States at large. They shall be appointed by the President, and shall, with the exception of the 30 cadets appointed from the United States at large, be actual residents of the congressional or Territorial districts or of the District of Columbia or of the States, respectively, from which they purport to be appointed. (Sec. 1315, R. S., as amended by sec. 4, act of June 6, 1900; 31 Stat., p. 656.)

Very truly, yours,

E. H. CROWDER,
Judge Advocate General.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Kentucky.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, there is one other amendment which I desire to propose. It has been suggested to me since the discussion yesterday that there are two or three, and possibly more, young men in the academy whose status is sometimes questioned because of the fact that they may have been appointed from some other State than the State in which they then lived or possibly from some other congressional district. It seems to me there ought not to be any question about that, and I thought it might be well to amend the first section by adding a proviso as follows:

Provided further, That the appointment of each member of the present Corps of Cadets is validated and confirmed.

Mr. President, from my viewpoint I hardly think such an amendment is necessary, because I do not construe the preset statute as the War Department does nor as my friend from Kentucky construes it; but however that may be, the amendment which has already been adopted cures what some Senators regarded as a defect, and in order to remove any doubt concerning the matter to which I have referred I move that section 1 be amended by adding the proviso which I have just read and which I send to the Secretary's desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will state the amendment.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to add, at the end of section 1, the following proviso:

Provided further, That the appointment of each member of the present Corps of Cadets is validated and confirmed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I call attention to section 2, which reads as follows:

SEC. 2. That the President is hereby authorized to appoint cadets to the United States Military Academy from among enlisted men of the Regular Army, between the ages of 19 and 22 years, who have served as enlisted men not less than one year, to be selected under such regulations as the President may prescribe, at the rate of one for each regiment of the mobile army.

I move in that section, at line 12, to strike out the word "one" and insert the word "five," so that instead of one man being eligible from each regiment for West Point, five shall be eligible. I hope the chairman of the committee in charge of the bill will accept the amendment.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I did not hear the amendment.

Mr. REED. If the amendment should be adopted, the President would be authorized to appoint to West Point not to exceed five men from each regiment instead of one man, as the bill now reads.

I desire to offer a few observations in support of the amendment.

I think the one matter that holds back the recruiting of the Regular Army and that has a tendency to keep the more ambitious young men out of the Army are the difficulties in the way of any real advancement. I think that no class of men will do the best work of which they are capable unless there is some incentive to effort. A great many young men who have an ambition along military lines would join the Army if they could see a way to an education and promotion. The amendment I offer will give only about one man to each two companies. If I could have my way, I would arrange so that the United States Military Academy would be open to every soldier of the United States Army who could qualify himself for admission and who came within certain age and physical limitations. I would hold the door for promotion wide open to him, and by doing that I think encouragement would be given to the young men in the Army to study and to work in order to fit themselves for advancement. Besides, great encouragement would be given to them to enter.

I can see no reason why we should not introduce that much of the merit system into our military plans for the future. I have made the number five because I do not want to be immoderate or to ask anything that is radical; and yet I am certain that it would be wise to open the doors of the Military Academy to every soldier who could qualify and who would come within prescribed limitations as to physical and mental attributes.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. REED. I do.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I do not know what the amendment of the Senator is.

Mr. REED. In line 12 of page 2——

Mr. NORRIS. The Senators must mean line 14.

Mr. REED. In the copy that I have it is line 12.

Mr. NORRIS. In the copy that I have line 12 says that the President can appoint enlisted men who have served not less than one year. The Senator's amendment would make that read "who have served not less than five years."

Mr. REED. Oh, no. The copy that I have reads as follows. I will read it to the Senate:

SEC. 2. That the President is hereby authorized to appoint cadets to the United States Military Academy from among enlisted men of the Regular Army between the ages of 19 and 22 years who have served as enlisted men not less than one year, to be selected under such regulations as the President may prescribe, at the rate of one—

Which I change to "five"— for each regiment of the mobile army.

Mr. NORRIS. There must be more than one print of the bill, then.

Mr. REED. My attention is called to the fact that there are two prints, and that the calendar print has the word "one" on line 14, as the Senator suggests, whereas the committee print has it on line 12. I therefore desire to have my amendment apply to the word "one" in line 14.

I should like to get some expression from the Senate on this subject. I really think if we opened the United States Military Academy to every boy in the Army who came within certain physical and mental qualifications it would be a great step in advance.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, does the Senator, then, increase the number that go to West Point?

Mr. REED. Yes.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Or does he take these additional four from the congressional recommendations?

Mr. REED. No; they are to come from the Army. This is the clause of the bill that applies to promotions from the Army. The bill, as drawn, limits the President to the appointment of one from each regiment. Under the bill, about one out of a thousand will have a chance to go to West Point. I suggest five.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Now the Senator increases it to five?

Mr. REED. To five. At the same time I frankly state that I would like to have it so that every boy in the Army who can qualify mentally and physically and morally may be permitted to enter West Point. Upon that question I very much desire to secure the views of Senators.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I should like to ask the Senator what he would think of taking those additional four, if there is not room for more than the bill provides, from those recommended by Senators and Congressmen? I am thoroughly in favor of taking every man we can from the ranks and sending them to West Point, and giving him the preference over congressional recommendations or any other kind of recommendations.

Mr. REED. I do not know whether it is necessary to cut down those who are recommended by Congressmen and Senators; but, so far as I am concerned——

Mr. JAMES. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Kentucky?

Mr. REED. Permit me to finish my sentence, I then will yield. So far as I am concerned, I do not believe we can ever build up the Army until we democratize it——

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I sympathize with the Senator's views.

Mr. REED. And until we hold the prize of promotion and advancement before the young men who enter the Army.

Mr. JAMES. There is nothing in the law, however, that would prevent a Member of the House or of the Senate from appointing one of these men from the Army.

Mr. REED. Oh, that is true; there is nothing to prevent it; neither is there anything to prevent that being done under the present law; but will somebody tell me what Member of Congress has done so? I do not know of any such appointment having been made.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. REED. I do.

Mr. SMOOT. I will say that I am in sympathy with the position taken by the Senator from Missouri; but I wish to ask the Senator if he has figured what increase in the number his amendment would make?

Mr. REED. No; I have not. The bill has just been called up, and there has been little opportunity for me to examine its terms.

Mr. SMOOT. I will say to the Senator that off-handed, as I figure it, it would be about 240; and I was wondering, with the increase we already make in the bill, whether the additional increase of about 240 could be taken care of at West Point under the present conditions.

Mr. DU PONT. Mr. President, I should like to say to the Senator from Utah, if the Senator from Missouri will permit me, that as the Army is now constituted it would mean something like 275 or 280, and if the Army should be increased, we would have 500 or 600 under the new bill.

Mr. SMOOT. I was speaking, Mr. President, of the Army as it is now constituted; and, just figuring roughly, I thought it would be about 240. The Senator from Delaware may be right. It may be 275.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I am not sure that I understand the logic of the objection, if it was meant as an objection.

Mr. SMOOT. No, Mr. President; I do not want the Senator to take it as an objection. I wanted the Senator to consider, if he had not already done so, if the increase is made, where or how the increase could be taken care of.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, if the Senator refers to the housing of the men at West Point, then my answer to that is that the difficulty must be met just as we must meet all the other questions touching the increase in our Military Establishment. If we need larger quarters, we must build them. They need not be so expensive as to be either burdensome or prohibitive.

Mr. SMOOT. I will say to the Senator that with the increase in the bill as reported, as I understand, will require three cadets to live in one room. With the additional increase, I was wondering whether the Senator had asked the officials of the War Department whether temporary arrangements could be made to house them.

Mr. REED. So far as that is concerned, it would take about 90 days, if we proceeded in governmental matters as we do in private affairs, to build all the quarters necessary; and the appointments by the President could be held up until such time as, in the President's judgment, the quarters were adequate.

May I ask the attention of the Senate just a moment on this matter? I give it as my very humble opinion that you will never build up the military spirit and military knowledge among the masses of the people until you have made it so that an entrance into the Army affords a reasonable opportunity for advancement, education, and general improvement. Will somebody tell me what reason there is to-day for a young man to enter the Regular Army, at $15 a month, on a long term of service that takes the very best years of his life from him; that affords practically no room for intellectual improvement; that teaches him no trade or occupation; that turns him out at the end of that period without money in his purse, without business acquaintance, without any of those attributes which are being acquired and cultivated by the ordinary young men of the country who are not in the Army?

Create a system under those conditions and it inevitably results in what? In the unfortunate going into the Army because he can do nothing better; in the man of slight attainment or slight ambition going into the Army because he can not do better outside. Under such conditions you can not secure the best material for the Army. I say that without desiring to reflect on the rank and file of the Regular Army. I speak of the system and do not refer to the personality of the men.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. REED. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I wish to call the Senator's attention to the fact that this bill carries an increase, if all the places are filled, of 566 men at West Point. It is questionable whether West Point can handle more, or whether it is desirable to more than double the number at West Point to meet the increased demand.

Now, I want to make this suggestion to the Senator, and ask his consideration of it: Why not let all of these 566, the entire increase, be promoted from the young men who volunteer in the service, instead of having congressional and senatorial nominations? Why not use that entire number for promotion?

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, will the Senator permit me a moment?

Mr. REED. Certainly.

Mr. GALLINGER. The very suggestion the Senator from Georgia has made I was intending to make myself. The appointment of these young men upon recommendation of Members of this body and the other House is a burden rather than otherwise, very much like getting offices for clerks and others, if we could get them. Our troubles begin just when we get the appointments. For myself, I should be very glad to surrender the two appointments that I will have, if this bill goes through, and the two that I have in the Naval Academy, and turn them over to these young men who have enlisted, and give them a better opportunity to achieve success and to get proper promotion. I think it is a wise suggestion.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I should be gratified to have the increase go by way of promotion from the young men who volunteer into the service; and I would also gladly give up the present privilege of nomination and let all of the nominations to West Point go in the shape of promotions from young men who volunteer in the service.

I agree with the Senator from Missouri that the men in the ranks—he did not say that, but I do—have not had proper treatment in many ways, and that is why volunteering has been so slow. If we will give proper recognition to the private soldier, to the man with the colors; if we will undertake, in addition to the military training, to make part of the training at least an average of several hours a day training for civil life, and then give these promotions from the private soldiers to West Point, as suggested by the Senator—I am going to vote for his provision of five if it takes a reduction of the others under the assignment—if we will give them that opportunity enlistment officers will not be going over the country and striving to get volunteers; we will be called on to classify them and limit them from the States to their proper proportion.

Mr. REED. The Senator from Georgia has anticipated me. He has said in a very much better way than I could some things I intended to say.

I am firmly convinced, Senators, that we never will have a great body of trained men in the United States, even in a Regular Army, unless we do something to bring the traditions and customs of military service up to at least within 300 years of the twentieth century.

I will relate this incident, which I read the other day in a magazine. In the English Army they have adhered to the old class distinctions between the enlisted man and the officer. The article referred to stated that there were two sons of a nobleman in the English Army, one an officer, the other a private. It happened recently that both were wounded and were at the same time furloughed home. The regulations required them, as this article stated, to wear their uniforms when at home. The result was that these two brothers, who were affectionately attached to each other, could not in their own mother's house sit together at the same table.

Now, I am not a military expert, and there may be a great many things necessary to be done in the way of disciplining an army that I do not know about, but under a system like that no red-blooded man is willing to be an enlisted man, unless it be when his country's peril is such as to call for great sacrifices. We teach our youth pride of character; we teach the doctrine of equality; we teach every man to believe that he is as good as any other man and "a little better." That is the best spirit ever instilled in a people. Pride of character is the mainspring of ambition, sacrifice, fortitude, courage, and all other attributes which constitute together nobility of mind.

When, therefore, you ask men to enlist and say to them, "You will get $15 a month while you are here, but you must understand that there is an impassable line drawn between you and a commissioned officer that divides you from him socially and morally," the result inevitably is that you do not get that class of men who could under different circumstances be obtained.

On the other hand, if we say to every boy who enters the Army, "There is not alone here a chance to make a living, but there is, in addition, the opportunity to acquire an education and to graduate from a great military college where you may acquire not only a military education but a splendid general education that will fit you to be an engineer or to enter a counting house or to fill other honorable and remunerative avocations," then you will draw into the Army hundreds and thousands of young men who will enlist because the Army is the open door of opportunity.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. REED. One sentence, and then I shall gladly yield. Now, it will not only be the five men who gain appointments who will be bending to their tasks and improving their minds, but it will also be a large number of aspirants who will vastly improve their usefulness, even though they may not succeed in passing the prescribed examination. So there will be a large number of men who may never enter West Point who will be better fitted for citizenship. I yield to the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I sympathize with the purpose of the Senator's amendment, and if a deduction could be made from the appointees by Senators and Representatives I should favor it, but I wish to ask the Senator what he proposes to do with these additional officers when they graduate at West Point?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Is it true that if the number——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Let the Senator answer my question.

Mr. REED. I am going to answer it.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I was going to suggest——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Nebraska has the floor.

Mr. REED. I have the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Missouri yielded to the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. REED. I yielded for a question. Does the Senator from Georgia desire to ask me a question?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I do.

Mr. REED. I yield for that purpose.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Missouri yields to the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Would not the amendment, merely placing the figure 5 in place of the figure 1 from each regiment, reduce the number that each Senator and Representative could have? It does not increase the total number at all. If we place the figure at 5 in place of the figure 1, as suggested by the Senator from Missouri—I have just been studying the bill to see if it would not be true that we would still have but the 2 for each congressional district and 2 for each Senator.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. That is not my understanding of the bill. My understanding is that those whom the President appoints are in addition to those whom Senators and Representatives appoint.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. The 60 would be; but if we had the provision of 5 from each regiment, without providing in the earlier part of the bill for an increase, the additional men from each regiment must come out of those provided for generally in the bill, and thereby reduce the number of congressional and senatorial appointments.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. No; I think the Senator is entirely wrong. As I figured it up hastily, the amendment of the Senator from Missouri would add about 800 students to West Point. It may be that we can accommodate under the new bill that we are about to pass——

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

Mr. HITCHCOCK. If the Senator will permit me to continue, it may be possible that we can add 500 or 600 or 800 students to West Point, but when those students graduate they will be officers, and I ask the Senator what he then is going to do with those additional officers?

We certainly have already, as I consider it, a top-heavy condition of the Army, and I believe that the bill as now proposed by the Committee on Military Affairs will render that top-heavy condition still more top-heavy. The amendment of the Senator, unless it is modified, will, in my opinion, add a good many hundred officers to the permanent list of officers of the Army. I ask what are you going to do with them?

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I shall try to answer with entire frankness. I remark, in the first place, that the President is only "authorized," not commanded, to appoint cadets from the Army. The language of the bill is that the President "is hereby authorized to appoint one from each regiment." The proposed amendment would make the bill read that the President "is hereby authorized to appoint five from each regiment." So, if a top-heavy condition should be created, the President, I take it, would not have to make the appointments.

But I remark, in the second place, that the Senator is mistaken or else I am mistaken about the proposition that a graduate of West Point becomes an officer. I understand that he is qualified for an officer and a long custom has resulted in his being commissioned. I may be in error.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. The Senator is in error. After a man graduates at West Point or Annapolis he can only retire from the Army or Navy by resigning and having his resignation accepted. As I recall it, when he enters West Point or Annapolis he signs a pledge not to retire within eight years.

Mr. REED. Yes; but he is not a second lieutenant when he comes out of the academy until he has been duly commissioned. I think that is correct.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. The Senator is mistaken there. Upon graduation he becomes a second lieutenant.

Mr. REED. You will find he has to have his commission. But I do not care to discuss it; it is aside from the issue.

The real issue raised by the Senator's question is, What will we do with our graduates if we have more than we need for officers? I have answered that in one way. I suggest a further answer: If the time comes when we find that these young men—and it will be three years from now when they can be graduated—are likely to become too numerous, it is easy enough when that condition arises to pass a statute reducing the number of cadets.

I remark, in the third place, that if we are proceeding along sound lines, if there is any reason for an increase in the Army and Navy of the United States, that reason will in all human probability continue and grow greater during the next two or three years, and the place we will be weakest will not be in the number of enlisted men we can obtain, because we can obtain enlisted men in case of danger almost without limit. The main difficulty will be to get officers to train those enlisted men.

I call the attention of the Senate to the fact that military matters have been absolutely revolutionized in recent years.

Time was when the staunch yeomanry of our land could seize their rifles and give battle to the best-trained soldiers of Europe. The frontiersmen at Lexington beat back the British Regulars. The men in coon-skin caps at Concord routed their trained antagonists. The riflemen of Jackson decimated and dismayed the flower of Wellington's veterans.

But this was because the antagonists were equally armed. The rifle of the woodsman was as efficient as the musket of the soldier. The patriotism of the citizen fighting for liberty rose superior to the training of the hired Hessian. If the armies of to-day fought with rifles, then I would not hesitate to declare that the volunteers of America, standing upon their seagirt shores, could hurl back into the ocean the combined soldiery of Europe.

But there has been a revolution in all things mechanical, which has nowhere been so complete as in the machinery of war. A century of progress is behind us. The pack horse has given place to the power truck and the lightning express, the horseback courier to the winged telegraph and telephone. Time has been obliterated, distance annihilated. The hand loom, the scythe, the sickle, and the cradle are now curiosities upon which we gaze with mingled mirth and pity. The age of machinery has driven out the crude implements of our fathers. Vast factories rear their gigantic smokestacks in all parts of the land. Armies of men and women work beneath a single roof. The miracle of web and loom perform tasks which the toiling fingers of hundreds were wont to do. Flying shuttles move with a rapidity that defies the eye. Delicate nerves of steel control machines with a combined power of 10,000 men. The forces of nature harnessed by the genius of man are driven by the invisible threads of the intellect.

In this great industrial and mechanical race America has kept pace, nay, outdistanced competition. But it has not been so in the art of war. While our genius has bent to the problem of industrial and mechanical supremacy, the brains of Europe have been employed in producing a titanic machinery of destruction. They have invented cannon that will hurl a shell weighing a thousand pounds more than 20 miles.

Before modern artillery fortifications regarded as eternal dissolve as mist before the summer sun.

The alchemy of hell has distilled vaporous poisons that like myriads of serpents creep along the surface of the earth to burn with deadly breath the lungs of men.

Assassins of the seas hide beneath the waves and lie in wait to murder unsuspecting passengers on ships.

The air is filled with flying dragons that vomit fire and death upon the peaceful homes where wives and babies sleep.

Ships of war have been transformed to mighty floating fortresses that cross the Atlantic in five days of time.

Wisdom demands that we shall recognize the cold, brutal fact that power and force rule in this grim old world.

The handling of this machinery requires long training and the highest technical skill, the same long course of study that is required by a man who is to master electrical engineering, the same long experience that is required to fit a man to handle a locomotive, the same kind of patient preparation necessary to fit a man for one of the learned professions. If we have war, our greatest weakness will be in the lack of military experts. We must strengthen ourselves in that respect if we are to meet on equal terms the armies of Europe.

Now, we are creating this army for some purpose. It is not created merely for amusement; it is created in the hope that we may have eternal peace, but it is created in the belief that we may some time have war; and if war comes, I say to the Senate of the United States what we shall most need will be experts. You will get plenty of men who can handle a rifle; there will be no lack of brave boys who will expose their bosoms to the storms of war, lay down their lives in defense of home and country. But, sir, we must have machinery and we must have men who can intelligently handle that machinery. So I insist that the objection that we may have too many men in West Point in the next two or three years is not a sound objection.

If we ever are involved in a great war—which God forbid—instead of mustering our men in by the thousands we shall muster them by the hundreds of thousands. Instead of an Army of two or three hundred thousand men we will find ourselves massing two or three million men. Such an Army will be at less than one-tenth of its possible efficiency unless there be men who can skillfully handle batteries of cannon, unless there be men who can manage the delicate and intricate enginery of destruction with a skill equal to the best genius of our antagonist. So I say to the Senate that an increase of three or four hundred cadets need not be feared. We ought rather to court such an increase. I thought my little amendment was so modest it would be accepted.

I am going to say another word while I am speaking regarding the democratization of armies. The French have adopted a different system than has heretofore been in vogue. Again, I do not profess to be an expert, but, if my reading has been correct, the line between the French volunteer and the French officer is very shadowy. Upon the field of battle or in the hour of danger military discipline fixes its iron rule and absolutely gives the officer dominance; but when that particular duty has been ended the officer and the enlisted man meet much more nearly on a level than they do in the armies of other nations. Who is it to-day can challenge the success of that system? I make no invidious distinction when I declare that the world has never furnished a higher example of devotion and of deathless courage than is being displayed every day in the month-long battle now raging before the fortress of Verdun. If we are ever going to have a great army in the United States—I refer not to an army of regulars, but to that greater and more efficient army upon which we must ultimately depend in time of danger, namely, the common people of the land—if we are to have a mighty body of trained citizens, we must make it so that a man can enter the Army as a private and yet remain and be treated as a gentleman.

What is the effect of permitting a number of promotions from the ranks? I appeal to Senators to think of the matter, and I believe they will see it as it comes to me. The officer having under him an enlisted man and knowing that the private has the opportunity under the law to enter the list of commissioned officers and to pass with him in any place whatsoever, to be received in his home, to be his associate in the council tent, will instinctively begin treating that private with a more kindly consideration. Upon the other hand, the private who understands that he will have an opportunity to some day associate with the officer will be inclined to fit himself for the higher walks of life that are usually trod by the officer. He naturally will cultivate the amenities and the kindlinesses which he hopes will be the foundation for a future association.

It seems to me beyond all question, if the Republic is to have a great military force—and I do not speak of the Army; I speak of the country at large—then we must make soldiering respectable, and to accomplish that we must encourage the enlisted men to train themselves for a higher service.

Permit me while I am on my feet to add another thought. It is this: I do not believe we ought to have long-term enlistments. I believe it ought to be so that a young man, even a young man out of work, temporarily could enter the Army for 12 months of time, and having served out his short enlistment, go back into civil life. If we had such a system I believe there would be thousands of young men who would enter the Army because, perhaps, they were temporarily out of employment; others would enter for the experience to be gained. Deny it who may—and I know the ordinary Army officer is on the other side of the question—but deny it who may, I say that an ordinary American boy, with 12 months' of training, will make a first-class soldier; one who can be relied upon to do his full duty upon the bloody field of war.

So I am in favor of encouraging men in the ranks; I am in favor of hanging prizes before them, and I think we can well afford to offer five prizes each year to 5 ambitious boys out of each 1,000, and that we shall not thereby overburden our Government.

Mr. HARDING. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. REED. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. HARDING. I should like to ask the Senator from Missouri if he contemplates a change in the regulations of the Military Academy so that an educational test shall not be necessary to enter it?

Mr. REED. Oh, no. This bill requires the educational test. The man, in order to enter, must qualify physically and mentally; he must pass identically the same examination that is passed by a boy who is appointed by the President at the request of a Senator.

Mr. HARDING. Then, I should like to ask the Senator if he believes it is possible to secure these entries for West Point from the ranks of the Regular Army?

Mr. REED. I certainly believe it. The bill contemplates it; the bill contemplates that we can get one, and if we can get one I think we can get five; but if the men do not qualify, then, of course, they will not be appointed.

I will say to the Senator from Ohio—who, I think, came in after the discussion began and probably did not hear quite all of it—that the bill contemplates an increase by appointment and it also contemplates the appointment of one man from each regiment, who shall qualify. I simply propose to change the figure "1" to the figure "5," so as to offer that many more men an opportunity.

Mr. HARDING. Mr. President, will the Senator from Missouri allow me to interrupt him further?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Missouri further yield?

Mr. REED. Yes.

Mr. HARDING. I do not want my attitude misconstrued; I rather like the idea proposed by the Senator from Missouri; but it seems to me that such a step as this which is now proposed will require an extended reorganization of the present plan of educating officers. I should like to support some practical measure that will carry out this idea; but I am not quite content to believe that this number is available from the Regular Army as now constituted.

Mr. REED. If they are not available they will not be appointed. The bill calls for the appointment of one, if one shall qualify.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. REED. I do.

Mr. VARDAMAN. I should like to suggest to the Senator from Missouri that, if this bill passes with his amendment, it would be the duty of Congress—and I dare say it would be done—to make provision for the maximum number of cadets that may be appointed under the bill.

Now, if the Senator will pardon me, I am very much in sympathy with the purpose of his amendment, but I do not think that we ought to go wild upon the question of creating officers for the Army now. I desire to say that when a young man is so much in earnest that he adopts the Army as his career and will join the Army as a private, it is pretty good evidence to my mind that he is going to try to make good. If the cadets to West Point should be taken from the Army, from that class of meritorious young men who are willing to work their way through, instead of giving their nomination to Representatives and Senators, I should very much favor the amendment offered by the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Why not, then, instead of increasing the number which Senators and Representatives may nominate, leave the number just where it is and provide that this entire increase shall be promoted from the ranks?

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President, personally I do not think we need any of it. The whole scheme and plan is premature. I think this question of preparation has now become largely a fad—it has really, I am told, entered the social life of Washington. But if you are going to increase the number of cadets at West Point, I would rather have a young man come from the ranks of the Regular Army—one who was there with a serious purpose—and it would be an inducement, which the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] has so eloquently and clearly outlined, to these young men to do right, to live the sort of lives that would develop their minds and qualify themselves for the duties of the soldier. I have had some little experience, and I know what——

Mr. HARDING. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] has the floor. He yielded to the Senator from Ohio and then yielded to the Senator from Mississippi. Does the Senator from Missouri yield further to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. HARDING. I thought the Senator from Mississippi had concluded his remarks.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President, I will not trespass further upon the time of the Senator from Missouri. What I was about to say is probably of no especial concern anyway.

Mr. REED. I am glad to yield to the Senator.

Mr. VARDAMAN. I appreciate the Senator's courtesy, but I will not interrupt him further at this time.

Mr. HARDING. Mr. President, I wish to say, by the courtesy of the Senator from Missouri, that I am cordially in sympathy with the suggestion he makes, and I think it ought to be practical to harmonize his idea along the lines suggested by the Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH]. I would very gladly surrender the nomination of cadets on the part of Members of Congress, and I am wondering if there could not be worked out a scheme, preserving the apportionment of the several States, but requiring that the nominations made by Members of the House and Senate be taken from the Army. If such an amendment could be perfected I should very cordially support it. In other words, Mr. President, if the Senator from Missouri will allow me, I should like to see a provision adopted whereby the new nominations on the part of Members of Congress shall be taken from the Regular Army on some sort of recommendation properly provided for.

Mr. HUGHES. Mr. President, it seems to me that the difficulty in a plan of that kind would be the character of the admission examinations to the Military and Naval Academies. You would find very few men in the ranks, I venture to say, who would be able to pass the examination with the marks requisite to entitle them to admission to either of the academies. Therefore a necessary supplement to any such proposition as that, it seems to me, would be a plan to afford educational facilities in the Army or the lowering of the standards of the entrance examination at both academies or the establishment of preparatory schools to which boys could be sent at an earlier age.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President, I should like to say to the Senator from New Jersey, with the consent of the Senator from Missouri, that there are a great many instances where men are commissioned now from the ranks and they have to stand quite as rigid an examination as they would if they undertook to enter West Point.

Mr. HUGHES. I am not speaking about that. That proposition is, to a greater or less extent, taking care of itself now. Any young man who is in the Army and who desires to study and prepare himself for a commission is afforded certain facilities. The number is limited, and necessarily limited, because in the very nature of things not very many men can take advantage of it.

Mr. VARDAMAN. If the amendment proposed by the Senator from Missouri should be adopted, there would be company schools or regimental schools established where young men could take a course of study, and provision should be made so that whenever the door of opportunity is open you can rely upon proficient and worthy young men entering it.

Mr. HUGHES. As I caught the suggestion of the Senator from Ohio [Mr. HARDING], it was to make the selections for admission to the academy from men now in the ranks?

Mr. REED. Mr. President, the Senator, I think, came in during the debate. The bill, in section 1, provides for doubling the number of men who are to be appointed by Senators and Representatives. It also increases the number, I think, who are to be appointed by the President. The bill, in section 2, authorizes the President to appoint to the Military Academy one cadet for each regiment, who shall qualify mentally and physically, and so forth. I simply propose to make that "five" instead of "one."

The Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH] and other Senators have suggested that we ought to take from the Army the whole number of additional cadets authorized by this bill. I do not know but that suggestion may have great virtue in it, but I submit that it might not work out. Is it not better now to proceed gradually? For instance, some Senator has suggested that we might not have the men who could qualify at all from the Army; that it would require the inauguration of an educational system. If that situation should eventuate, we might find ourselves confronted by a dearth of cadets.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President, will the Senator allow me to interrupt him for a moment?

Mr. REED. Let me finish this theme, and then I will be glad to yield to the Senator.

It may be that the class of young men now entering the Army could not furnish even five from each regiment who could qualify for admission to the academy. It might be, on the other hand, if we were to provide that young men could only enter the Military Academy after serving a year in the Army that all the ambitious young men who are now pestering the life out of Senators and Representatives for appointments would enter the Army and serve a year in order to get into the Military Academy.

I do not know, Mr. President, which way that might work out. It is one of those problems that it is very difficult to solve in advance. It seems to me, therefore, that the wise thing to do is to continue the system of appointment from civil life and at the same time to authorize an increase of cadets from the Army. I think five for each regiment is very moderate. Let us try it. If it works and works well, it probably will result in ultimately every cadet being taken from the Army; but is it just the wise thing to make so radical a change as is suggested and to do it all at once?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I wish to make a suggestion to the Senator, with his permission.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. REED. I do.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. With reference to the ability of young men in the ranks to stand this examination, I wish to say that if you make the number five from each regiment, then a young man who wishes to go to West Point and who is prepared to stand the examination, if there are but few who can stand it, is so much the more encouraged to volunteer, because, perhaps, there will not be more than five in each regiment who can stand the examination, and it is an invitation to join the regiment. The less the number who can stand the examination, the greater the inducement to those who can stand it to find their road to West Point by enlistment. There will be enough enlist if this provision is adopted to fill the five places.

Mr. REED. I am inclined to think that is correct; but I do not know.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President——

Mr. REED. I told the Senator from Texas [Mr. SHEPPARD] that I would yield to him.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. The Senator from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD] has asked me where the qualified young men would come from. I have a list of 25 young men in my own State to-day who desire to have the opportunity to go to West Point. I am sure a sufficient number of those would be willing to serve a year in the ranks as private soldiers so as to have the opportunity from their regiments to take the examination to fill these places.

Mr. REED. But the trouble is this: Under the present law they have to enlist for three years.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Oh, but when we come to that let us just absolutely stand against any three-year enlistment. I, for one, can not vote for a bill that requires a three-year enlistment.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President——

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Let us fight for a short-time enlistment. While I am on my feet, if the Senator will pardon me, I want to say that our Committee on Military Affairs have shown more progress along these lines than ever has been shown before. They are reducing the length of enlistment. They are reaching out in the direction of encouraging the private soldier, and I believe that when they find that the Senate is ready to back them they will go still farther on the same line.

I know the spirit of the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs. I know he wishes to go just as far in that direction as he possibly can go. I believe that when he sees that the Senate is ready to back him we will find that the chairman of the committee will be glad to lead us even farther than he has so far gone, because I know that his spirit is in favor of going just as far as possible to develop the private soldier during his service with the colors for a return to civil life.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Wyoming?

Mr. REED. I yielded to the Senator from Texas. He asked me to yield some time ago.

Mr. WARREN. I only wanted to ask a question now.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. To whom does the Senator yield?

Mr. REED. For a question, I yield to the Senator from Wyoming.

Mr. WARREN. I have been waiting, because I wished, in my own time, to follow the Senator's argument with a few words; but since the Senator has adopted a system of interspersing speeches of all of the other Senators, I will not interrupt him at this time; but a little later I may ask his indulgence.

Mr. REED. I was ready to sit down some time ago, but this questioning has kept me on my feet. I yield to the Senator from Texas.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I want to ask the Senator if he knows what proportion of the officers now come from the ranks?

Mr. REED. I do not know the proportion, but it is quite small.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I will ask the chairman of the Senate Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. What is the question?

Mr. SHEPPARD. What the proportion is now of officers who come from the ranks, and not from West Point?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I can not say what the proportion is, but quite a number of officers are now so selected.

Mr. WARREN. More than half of the present Army officers are not graduates of West Point.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. They are taken both from civil life and from the Army.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I wanted to bring that out, in order to emphasize the argument of the Senator, that the men in the ranks are capable of taking the necessary examinations. I understand that at least half, or probably more than half, of the present officers of the Army have come up from the ranks or from civil life.

Mr. REED. They qualify under a special examination. They never have the advantages of West Point. This bill proposes to open the doors of West Point to the private soldier who can pass an examination. It is a different proposition, as the Senator will see, because it gives the private the opportunity to acquire the superior advantages of West Point.

Mr. President, I beg the pardon of the Senate for so long trespassing, and I think the implied rebuke of the Senator from Wyoming was well merited.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, I assure the Senator that I did not mean any implied rebuke. The Senator has made a very interesting speech. I agree with much he has said and with much the Senator from Georgia has said, but I do not quite agree with the proportions proposed for consideration at the present moment.

I wish to assure both the Senators, the Senator from Missouri and the Senator from Georgia, that I have always been favorable to the advancement of the private soldier. I have every reason to feel that way. I myself served through part of the period of the Civil War as a private soldier, and I know the kind of material the Army contained in the rank and file then, and I have watched it closely since. I know a great many who have been promoted from noncommissioned officers and private soldiers to commissioned officers, and I do not believe any of them suffered from social ostracism such as it has been indicated might occur. I never have heard a complaint, and ever since I left the Army I have lived near Army posts and have seen more or less of the Army and of its officers. In times of peace officers and men are doing different duties—one class commanding, the other obeying in drill work. When out in camp, in times of war or peace, there is a comradeship that denotes closest sympathy and union of purpose. Social distinctions, mentioned by the Senator from Missouri, do not spring from the thoughts or actions of commissioned officers or enlisted men. Quite the contrary. But in cities and towns society people are sometimes guilty of thoughtless snobbery.

The present law provides that, first, we commission the cadets graduated from West Point; second, we commission all the private soldiers who have applied for and received and successfully passed an examination and are fitted to become officers. That would be the law without any further amendments. Then, following them, come the honor graduates from the civilian military schools. Now, I would as soon have five from a regiment as one, if I thought we were prepared for it at the present time, and if it did not serve to cut out some of those whom we desire to encourage in other quarters, and, in fact, cut out private soldiers themselves and noncommissioned officers who are seeking to get commissions in the Army.

Mr. REED. If the Senator will pardon me, how does it cut them out?

Mr. WARREN. I will tell the Senator in a moment. The man who goes to West Point must have a college education, or very nearly that—a complete high-school or preparatory course—in order to pass the examination as per curriculum now in use.

Mr. REED. Why, Mr. President——

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. A first-class high-school education is sufficient.

Mr. WARREN. I say, or an advanced or complete high-school education.

Mr. REED. They are admitted now upon a certificate that they have passed a high-school examination.

Mr. WARREN. The Senator is mistaken about the certificate having any reference to a high-school education or a college education. It is simply that they possess the necessary knowledge, wherever they have acquired it; and as interpolated by the Senator from Georgia, high-school students do get in sometimes, but very many of them do not.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, will the Senator, on that point, permit me?

Mr. WARREN. Certainly.

Mr. REED. Either the Senator is in error or I am; but I have understood that there are at least certain high schools in this country whose diplomas—certificates of graduation—are received as the equivalent of the West Point examination——

Mr. WARREN. In what way, and where?

Mr. REED. So that they are admitted upon them. If that is not so, I have had some very bad information from Army headquarters.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. We have some, I will say to the Senator, from particular classes of schools, and I will give them to the Senator in the course of his argument.

Mr. WARREN. Of course I have said that the honor graduates from military schools, who have passed and received their education under the instruction of Army officers, are admitted. That is a class which I would not like to cut out. That is one of the classes which we do not want to cut out by stating that all of the West Point cadets may be selected from the ranks of the Army.

Now, we have at West Point very expensive quarters as to some of the buildings, but we have not present accommodations sufficient for so many as we would have to provide for if we should undertake to cover the ground which the Senators wish to cover; that is, five from each regiment.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Wyoming yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. WARREN. I yield.

Mr. NORRIS. For information, I wish to inquire of the Senator, referring now to the bill, on page 1, line 4, where it provides "that the Corps of Cadets * * * shall hereafter consist of 2 from each congressional district, 2 from each Territory, 4 from the District of Columbia, * * * and 4 from each State at large," how many, under the present law, are there? Just half that number?

Mr. WARREN. Under the present law, it is easy to approximate it. One for each Representative and Senator is something over 500.

Mr. NORRIS. I meant, referring to the bill now, how much of an increase does the bill make?

Mr. WARREN. The bill makes an increase of one for each Representative and each Senator?

Mr. NORRIS. Then, under the present law, as I understand, there is one from each congressional district?

Mr. WARREN. Well, we double that.

Mr. NORRIS. I understand. I want to get what the facts are.

Mr. WARREN. Yes.

Mr. NORRIS. Under the present law, then, there is one from each congressional district and two from each State at large. Is that right?

Mr. WARREN. Yes; two at large from each State and one for each Representative or district.

Mr. NORRIS. The law does not provide that it shall be one for each Member and one for each Senator, does it?

Mr. WARREN. The law does not provide anything except that the President shall appoint one——

Mr. NORRIS. Yes; and this bill just doubles that?

Mr. WARREN. Yes.

Mr. NORRIS. Suppose that we adopt the amendment of the Senator from Missouri, which is one that appeals to me as being the proper thing to do. That would, as I understand the Senator from Wyoming, give such a large number of cadets that we would not have place for them or use for them. Why not leave the law as it is now, and, in line 4, page 1 of this bill, strike out "two" and insert "one," and, where it provides four at large from each State, strike out "four" and insert "two," and then adopt the amendment of the Senator from Missouri? How would that do?

Mr. WARREN. I was about to reach that point, if the Senator will permit me to go on a little.

Now, just a moment as to the two schools. We have the school at Annapolis, the terms of which I am not so familiar with, but some one will correct me if I am wrong. For a number of years there have been two for each congressional district and four for each State at large, which would be, with the present strength of Congress, something over 1,000, and then the additions of the President's appointees, and so forth. Now we have passed the third one, which carries it up to beyond 1,500. Of course the rank and file of the Navy probably will be less than half of what it will be in the Army; but they have had a system heretofore, a so-called "plucking system," by which every year they discharge enough, added to those who have resigned, to reduce the total to a certain number. We did away with that. Now, in this bill as it is presented we will have the same number as the Navy formerly had—that is, somewhere about 1,100—and then we would have appointed from these regiments at present, say, 66, and with the advanced forces which I hope to see authorized in the measure we would have probably over 100, allowing one cadet for each regiment. If we would add, say, 5 for each regiment it might reach about 330 cadets from the Army at large, and it would be about 550 under the Chamberlain bill as reported to the Senate. As to the figures given by the Senator from——

Mr. DU PONT. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Wyoming yield to the Senator from Delaware?

Mr. WARREN. I do; but I will get to that in a minute.

Mr. DU PONT. I was going to ask the Senator whether he refers to the present or to the future when he says 330?

Mr. WARREN. I am referring to the present Army strength, with five. Now, it would be something over 500—approximately 560, with five members, if we should pass the Chamberlain bill on Monday, which I hope we may, and that carries it up to something over 1,500.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. WARREN. Just let me finish the sentence. Then we must have room to recognize not only the honor graduates from schools, but to recognize others in other schools who have military ambition. We want a citizen soldiery. I should like to see the bill go through with one or possibly two for each regiment now, with the terms as they are here; and then I should like to see, when that has been put in operation, whether we will receive readily, or will not receive, applications from the ranks to go into West Point, and how successful the applicants may prove to be; and then we may increase it if circumstances warrant. But I do not believe, because we are now moving forward, that we ought to rush away from certain standards which we must keep in sight; that is to say, to have the interest of the entire citizenship of this country in West Point and in the Army.

One moment more. As I have said before, shortages now are filled from the ranks. Many officers' sons enlist in the ranks and serve there with the purpose, after their education is acquired, of passing through the examination there. When the examination is made of the private in the ranks, there is some difference between that and the curriculum that he is met with at West Point, because he has already shown his fitness, his adaptability, and his constitutional and physical conditions; and if he falls short in some particular study, in English or something of the kind, he is allowed to go through. So we really open the door wider; we have opened it wider; we are now opening it wider to the ranks to let them go in from there without going through West Point than to confine it to West Point, and the more we put in West Point the fewer we probably will take from the ranks.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. What I want to ask the Senator before he sits down is this: What is his objection, instead of making the increases for which we provide subject to congressional and senatorial recommendation, to providing some kind of method that would require that all of these additional appointments should go from the regiments, if there are men there of proper age, as provided by this bill, who can stand the examination, of course? I am not now suggesting exactly the way; but why not let this increase go from men who have volunteered, if they can stand the examination, instead of under the old plan?

Mr. WARREN. I will say to the Senator that I do not think we can afford to commit our whole expectations of filling West Point, and immediately commencing the education of these young men, to the readiness with which we may be able to find a sufficient number that can pass through into West Point. If they can not pass through with the present standard of examination, shall we reduce that standard or not? That has been a matter of comment and discussion for a number of years, and the decision always has been to preserve the present high grade.

I do not wish to delay the passage of the bill, so I shall yield the floor, as it is nearly 2 o'clock.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I should like to ask the Senator one more question. How far could we afford to go, in the Senator's opinion, beyond the one? The Senator said two. Does he not think we could at least go to three from the regiments?

Mr. WARREN. I do not. I do not believe we could do so and protect other classes that are just as valuable and just as necessary to be encouraged that they also may reach the Army.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Would not this help us out: Will it not be probable that all of the required number will not come by recommendations from the districts, and all of the regiments will not be able at once to furnish three who can stand the examination, and, if we took at least the three now, that there would be no burden?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED].

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, I ask the Senator whether he will accept this amendment to his amendment? Add, at the end of the paragraph:

Provided, however, That the number thus selected by the President shall not exceed 300 at any one time.

Mr. REED. I will accept the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is upon the adoption of the amendment as amended. [Putting the question.] By the sound the "ayes" seem to have it.

Mr. SWANSON. I ask for a division.

There were, on a division—ayes 14, noes 14.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The vote is a tie.

Mr. KENYON. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Fall	Lee, Md.	Smith, Ga.
Bankhead	Gallinger	Lippitt	Smoot
Beckham	Gore	McCumber	Sutherland
Brandegee	Harding	Myers	Swanson
Broussard	Hardwick	Norris	Thomas
Catron	Hitchcock	Overman	Tillman
Chamberlain	Hughes	Pittman	Townsend
Chilton	Husting	Reed	Underwood
Clapp	James	Robinson	Vardaman
Clark, Wyo.	Johnson, S. D.	Saulsbury	Wadsworth
Colt	Jones	Shafroth	Walsh
Cummins	Kenyon	Sheppard	Warren
Curtis	La Follette	Sherman	Works
du Pont	Lane	Simmons

Mr. JONES. I desire to announce that the Senator from Vermont [Mr. PAGE] and my colleague [Mr. POINDEXTER] are necessarily absent on business of the Senate.

Mr. THOMAS. I wish to announce the necessary absence of the senior Senator from New Jersey [Mr. MARTINE]. I will let this announcement stand for the day.

Mr. ASHURST. I wish to announce that my colleague [Mr. SMITH of Arizona] is absent on official business of the Senate.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I desire to announce the necessary absence of the senior Senator from Maine [Mr. JOHNSON] on official business of the Senate.

Mr. PITTMAN. I desire to announce that the Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE] is unavoidably absent and that he is paired with the Senator from Maine [Mr. BURLEIGH]. I will let this announcement stand for the day.

Mr. CHILTON. I wish to announce that my colleague [Mr. GOFF] is absent on account of illness. I wish also announce the absence of the following Senators on official business:

The Senator from Indiana [Mr. KERN], the Senator from Arizona [Mr. SMITH], the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS], the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. HOLLIS], the Senator from Maine [Mr. JOHNSON], the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. STERLING], the Senator from Kansas [Mr. THOMPSON], the Senator from Washington [Mr. POINDEXTER], and the Senator from Vermont [Mr. PAGE].

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair announces that 55 Senators have answered to the roll call. A quorum is present. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. A bill (H. R. 408) to provide for the development of water power and the use of public lands in relation thereto, and for other purposes.

Mr. MYERS. I ask that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Montana?

Mr. JONES. It appears to me that the measure which has been before the Senate is likely to take all the afternoon.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I hardly think it will take very much longer. It has taken two hours longer than I had any idea it would take. However, the Senator has been so kind to us in the matter, having had the right of way here, that I feel disposed to let him proceed.

Mr. JONES. I do not want to delay the measure which has been before the Senate, and I think I will not object to proceeding with it. I shall try to get recognition in my own right later.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I think it will not be very long.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED], as modified by the amendment of the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK].

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, I desire to ask a question. Is there unanimous consent that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There is.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, I did not intend to say a word about this bill, but so many Senators are now present who were not here when the subject was under discussion, I desire to express the hope that the Senate will not adopt the amendment offered by the Senator from Missouri or the amendment thereto.

This bill, Mr. President, goes further than any measure ever went to recognize the enlisted man. Not only have we done it in this bill, but we have done it in the Army reorganization plan; and, strange as it may seem, in the efforts we have made in the Army reorganization plan for recognition of the enlisted men we are getting protests from all over the country against the provision which is intended to recognize him and give him a standing in the Army as well as before the departments of the Government.

I am going to take just a minute to say to the Senate that we propose to recognize the enlisted men here to the extent of 64 men under the present organization of the Army and 136 men under the organization as it is proposed by the plan which the Senate Committee on Military Affairs has introduced.

Mr. President, if we go further than that the result will be that the efforts we are making to open the door of opportunity to the enlisted man will be closed against him, I am sure, because the bill will probably be defeated in the House of Representatives. We have attempted just as little as possible to change the present law with reference to appointments to the academy, and if we go further than we have gone I think instead of assisting the enlisted man we will really impair his opportunity.

I am in accord with the view of the Senator from Missouri. If I had my way, I would absolutely democratize not only the Military Academy at West Point but the Naval Academy as well, and not allow anyone to be admitted except young men who had served one year of enlistment. We can not do that at one fell swoop, Mr. President. We have crowded this thing as far as we could in order to admit enlisted men to the academy and as far as it was possible to do with the accommodations we have there. I hope the Senate will vote down the amendment.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, as I intend to vote for the amendment offered by the Senator from Missouri, and as a number of Senators were not present when he so ably presented his views upon the subject, I wish to say just a word in explanation of the amendment.

The able chairman of the committee has stated that he would go a great deal further toward democratizing the Army if he could, but he fears that he will not succeed. I read with a great deal of interest the debate yesterday in the House upon the Army bill, and I found a great many Members of the House are earnestly in favor of making the status of the private soldier vastly better than it is to-day. I think that the chairman of the committee is unnecessarily timid about action on our part on those lines. I believe it will be received and sustained in the House. The least we can do if we believe in it is to urge it.

It is true that the bill which he has presented goes further in behalf of the private soldier than anything now in existence. The Senator says he has received protests against going so far. When the bill comes up I hope we shall hear from whom those protests come.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Not on this bill.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. No; I said against the other bill, and I said when that bill comes up I hope we will hear from whom the protests come.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I do not mind telling the Senator right now. We undertook to admit enlisted men, after serving a certain number of years in the Army, to employment in the War Department and other departments here without standing a civil-service examination, and every civil-service institution in the country is opposing it.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I am not so much interested in that part of it. I do not think admission into the civil service is the greatest boon that can come to our average men. I am very anxious to see the Army bill, before we pass it, substantially amended. I hope we will be able to cut the enlistments down to two years and adopt the policy of admitting to the position of private soldier a man who is not to be permanently in the Army, but who enters upon the theory that he will not be there longer than two years; that he will not permanently become a part of the Military Establishment or of the official family, but that we shall endeavor to give him, while he is a private soldier, a number of hours each month of training preparatory to civil life. It is done in a number of other countries, and it is done successfully. There is no reason why we should adhere to the old plan of receiving the character of men we have been forced to receive as private soldiers.

If we will make the opportunity for a private soldier something really inviting, if we will make it a training school for two years for him, we will find that bright boys from the country, who have finished their grammar school education but have not the opportunity of a broader education, will come into the position of private soldier, serving two years, and there receiving a training in matters other than military affairs.

We ought to give the private soldiers 96 hours a month—that will be 4 hours a day—in training for civil life. We ought, if necessary, to add some civilians to the list of teachers.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. With pleasure.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Do I understand that this amendment proposes that the cadets appointed from the Army are to pass the same mental examination for entrance to West Point that is now required?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Yes.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Does the Senator believe that grammar-school students could pass that examination and enter the academy?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. No.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I so understood the Senator.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Not at all. I did not say that. I did say if we gave that status to the private soldier, if we added a course of preparation for civil life to the work of the private soldier, there would be splendid young graduates all through the country who had had no opportunity beyond a grammar school who would volunteer as private soldiers to have the benefit of the two years' experience which they would receive as private soldiers, drilled in military affairs, and taught also the civil responsibility; taught also, I trust, in vocational work, as well as from the ordinary course in books, and those boys would be able to go back to their homes, and their badges as members of the national reserve for four years will be badges of honor, for they will be capable of taking leading positions at home, instead of occupying positions as retired private soldiers, who are usually looked upon askance by nearly everybody.

The amendment offered by the Senator from Missouri is along this line. The bill as it comes to us doubles the number to be admitted to West Point. It provides that the President shall name one from each regiment to go to West Point. These would have to stand the examination to enter West Point. Of course I do not mean that the ordinary grammar-school graduate could stand the examination, but there will be boys who have finished the high school who are ambitious to go to West Point who would be willing to serve a year as a private soldier to have the opportunity to stand the examination and win a place at West Point.

There are many more boys willing to go to West Point than we can send there. I have within the past few days had to select for an examination for Annapolis, and I had over 25 for either Annapolis or West Point from my own State. Most of them could stand the examination. If you provide that five boys from each regiment may be named for West Point by the President, boys will enter the regiment who have finished high school and who can stand the examination, and it will help to elevate the standing of the private soldier. It will help to elevate the standing of the officer, because if we require our officer to recognize the private soldier with less caste and as being more his equal it will broaden the officer when he realizes that the service of the private soldier is not limited to military affairs, but that he is to carry a part of the responsibility for the civil life of the country. The greatest generals have usually been great civilians as well as technical soldiers.

I intend to vote for the amendment, and I only wished to give briefly the reasons that are moving those of us who will so vote. The Senator from Missouri accepted the amendment of the Senator from Nebraska providing that the total should in no case exceed 300 who are named by the President.

Mr. JAMES. Let me ask the Senator, Why confine the selection by the President to the Regular Army? Why discriminate against the National Guard? Why not give some of those bright young fellows this chance which the Senator so eloquently pleads shall be given to the rank and file in the Regular Army?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I will answer the Senator. The National Guard gets them through the nomination of Congressmen. The National Guard is at home and close to the Congressman, and whenever a particular man in the National Guard wants to take an examination he is usually the man who will be named. But the boys who enlist as privates are not so close to their Representatives and Senators. Again——

Mr. JAMES. Mr. President——

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I have not finished my answer. I want to answer before I yield again. The boy in the National Guard is not giving 12 months of solid time to the Government; he is not becoming a member for four years of the reserve soldiery; he is contributing nothing like as much to the military preparation of the country as the boy who enlists as a private soldier in the Regular Army. I want to give the 300 appointments to that class of boys, because otherwise they would not have a chance, and because they are contributing more than the boys in the National Guard.

Mr. JAMES. But if the Senator will permit me, under the new scheme which is proposed we are going to require more service from the National Guard. They are going to do much more work; they are going to give more of their time. As to the National Guard being close to Congressmen, I doubt if the Senator can call to his mind a single member of the National Guard who has been appointed solely because be was efficient in the service as a soldier. Of course he is at home; he has friends at home, and so have those in the Regular Army friends at home. They are not as closely allied with home affairs perhaps as the members of the National Guard; but as to the National Guard, the States are depending upon the National Guard for service. It has a dual duty, first to the State and next to the Government. We are going to require the National Guardsman to give service to the Nation; and I do not see any reason why, if we are going to give these appointments to the Army in such a large degree, we should not give them to the soldiers of the State, they being a part of the soldiery of the Nation.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. If the Senator from Missouri will yield to me a moment further, I wish to make this suggestion. If the Senator from Kentucky is so much interested in the National Guard at home, and will add an additional proviso that Representatives and Senators must make their nominations from the National Guard, if eligible, I will vote for it; and that will give the National Guard three times as many as I am asking for the private soldiers.

Mr. JAMES. Before the Senator leaves that, I will say that I am perfectly willing that the National Guard shall be recognized in that way. I think while we are recognizing the Army we ought to recognize also the National Guard. Why should you make one provision apply to the National Guard and another provision apply to the Army?

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

Mr. JAMES. As far as I am individually concerned, if there is any private soldier in the country who can stand the examination—mental and physical—required, I should be very glad to have him appointed, and I shall support any amendment to that effect.

Mr. REED. I should like to ask the Senator from Kentucky if his objection to the amendment is that it does not go far enough.

Mr. JAMES. No; my objection to the amendment is that you do not give to the soldiers of the State in the National Guard the same opportunity that you give to the soldiers in the Regular Army.

Mr. REED. Do I understand that the Senator's objection, then, is simply that the amendment does not go far enough and take in enough—that is, that it does not take in the National Guard along with the Army?

Mr. JAMES. Let me say to the Senator, I believe it would be much better if you did include the National Guard, because I seriously doubt whether under the requirements existing now as to the mental examination, you can find five enlisted men in a Regular Army regiment who could stand that awfully hard mental test, I think too hard, upon those who seek admission into the Military Academy. But if you enlarge it and provide that they may be taken also from the National Guard it would be easier for the President to find those necessary to make up the required number.

Mr. WARREN. Whenever there is a private in the ranks who has sufficient education to enter West Point, the way is open to him now after two years' service. In two years he can be commissioned an officer from the ranks, whereas it takes four years for the course at West Point.

Mr. JAMES. He has a better advantage. That is an additional argument why the National Guard should be included.

Mr. REED. If the Senator will pardon me he either argues too much or too little. Is it an advantage to go through West Point? If it is, it is proposed to extend that advantage to one man in each regiment. I have ventured to suggest that instead of giving the opportunity to one in a thousand we give it to about one in two hundred. It is true that men can now go into the Army and pass an examination and serve a certain length of time and get a commission. If all they want is the commission, of course that answers the question. That seems to be the attitude of the Senator from Wyoming, I, however, contend that it will be very much better for the country if the men are given the right to be examined and get a commission without going through West Point if they desire to take that course, and that they also be given the opportunity to be examined and get a commission by going through West Point, thus gaining the additional benefit of a West Point education, which is a very great advantage.

The question of extending the act to the National Guard and a lot of propositions are brought forward. The bill is here. I did not draw it. It simply proposes that one man from each regiment shall be given the opportunity to go through West Point. I moved to make it five and the Senator from Nebraska by an amendment to mine puts the total limit at 300. I ventured to advance the argument that if we offer the opportunity to more men in the ranks to enter West Point, we thereby hang that many more prizes before the eyes of the boys in the Army and that two results will happen. First, more men will enter the Army in the hope of getting to West Point through that means; and, second, the ambition not only of the five men who get in will be aroused but a large number who may not succeed in passing the competitive examination will improve their knowledge.

I want to do something for the private soldier, so that we shall get a better class of men, so that we can get our Army filled up quickly when it is necessary to have men to meet an emergency. The truth is the Government has been obliged to spend hundreds of thousands of dollars to induce men to enlist. It has established numerous recruiting stations and advertised extensively, and yet the Army has been short of men. If we will but afford some reasonable chance for a young man who enlists to obtain a thorough education at West Point, then I think we will get many young men of superior character who will not now enter the Army. There are 40 or 50 applications for appointment to West Point at this moment on my desk. I would be glad to be able to say to those young gentlemen, "Go into the Army and if after a year you can pass an examination you can get in yourselves." I think this is a very important question that we are discussing.

I am surprised that the chairman of the committee takes the position that there have been protests against changing the present law touching the present question. I venture to say there is not a protest that has ever been made or will ever be made against giving an opportunity to a boy who enters the Army and who serves a year to take an examination for West Point, except the protest comes from some Regular Army officer. Regular Army officers have never liked the idea of the opportunity being given to an enlisted men to rank with them. I do not say so out of a desire to criticize our Army officers; they simply follow the traditions of their craft. It is a part of the system that I discussed at some length a while ago.

Mr. JAMES. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Kentucky?

Mr. REED. I do.

Mr. JAMES. Will the Senator accept this amendment, "providing that the President shall be authorized to appoint cadets to the United States Military Academy from among the enlisted men of the Regular Army and the National Guard of the States"?

Mr. REED. Does that fit into the language of the bill? The amendment calls for men who have served not less than one year.

Mr. JAMES. I understand that.

Mr. REED. A member of the National Guard has not served in the same sense that the enlisted man has served. The enlisted man has given all his time. The National Guardsman can give only a part of his time.

Mr. LEE of Maryland rose.

Mr. REED. Does the Senator wish to ask me a question?

Mr. LEE of Maryland. The enlisted man in the National Guard enlists in the same way. I had proposed to offer that very amendment. I think it an admirable amendment.

Mr. JAMES. I understand the Senator will accept the amendment?

Mr. REED. I would be glad to accept it if I did not think it would jeopardize the amendment. I will vote for it if the Senator will offer it as an independent amendment. I shall be glad to support it.

Mr. JAMES. I offer as an amendment to the amendment, after the word "Army," in line 8, page 2, the words "or the National Guard of the States."

Mr. LEE of Maryland. Permit me to suggest to insert also those words after the word "Army," in line 12.

Mr. JAMES. That is right. The words should also come in after the word "Army" in line 12.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read the amendment and the amendment to the amendment.

The SECRETARY. The Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] offers the following amendment: On page 2, line 14, before the words "for each regiment of the mobile army," to strike out the word "one" and to insert "five"; also, in line 17, after the word "hereafter," to strike out "one representative" and to insert the words "five representatives."

To that the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK] has proposed an amendment to add, at the end of section 2, the following proviso:

Provided, however, That the number of cadets at West Point thus selected by the President from enlisted men in the Army shall not at any one time exceed 300.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the adoption of the amendment offered by the Senator from Nebraska to the amendment of the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. REED. The amendment of the Senator from Nebraska was accepted.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Missouri accepts the amendment.

Mr. JAMES. What amendment is that?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment offered by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK] to the amendment of the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, that amendment was accepted.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There seems to be some objection.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, there was not any objection. The amendment was accepted long ago and passed over.

Mr. SMOOT. As I heard the amendment read, it contained the phrase "cadets at West Point." It seems to me, in order to conform with the bill, the language should be "the United States Military Academy." I simply suggest that to the Senator from Nebraska.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair now understands that the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] accepted the amendment proposed by the Senator from Nebraska as a part of his amendment.

Mr. REED. I did so long ago.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the adoption of the amendment offered by the Senator from Missouri as modified by the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I suggest that the amendment suggested by the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] ought to be agreed to. The substitution of the words "United States Military Academy" for "West Point" should be made to conform to the remainder of the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, that will be done. The question is on the adoption of the amendment offered by the Senator from Missouri as modified.

Mr. CUMMINS. I should like to hear the amendment reported as it now stands.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will now read the amendment as modified.

The SECRETARY. The amendment of Mr. REED as modified is as follows: On page 2, line 14, to strike out "one" and to insert "five"; in line 17, to strike out "one representative" and to insert the words "five representatives"; and at the end of the section to insert the following: "Provided, however, That the number of cadets at the United States Military Academy thus selected by the President from enlisted men in the Army shall not at any one time exceed 300," so that if amended it will read:

At the rate of five for each regiment of the mobile army and equivalent units of organization of other arms, and the Corps of Cadets is hereby increased to the number necessary to provide for maintaining hereafter five representatives of each organization as herein prescribed: Provided, however, That the number of cadets at the United States Military Academy thus selected by the President from enlisted men in the Army shall not at any one time exceed 300.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. To that amendment the Senator from Kentucky offers the following amendment.

Mr. JAMES. I do not know whether or not I have before me the proper print of the bill, but in section 2, on page 2, line 10, after the word "Army," I move to insert "or the National Guard of the States."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Kentucky offer that as an amendment to the bill or as an amendment to the amendment of the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED]?

Mr. JAMES. I offer it as an amendment to the amendment offered by the Senator from Missouri. I wish to amend also on line 12 of the same section——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Ought that not properly to come in as an amendment to the bill, rather than as an amendment to the amendment of the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. JAMES. I am perfectly willing to offer the amendment which I have proposed in either way.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair thinks it should be offered as a separate amendment, because it does not at all amend the amendment proposed by the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Kentucky yield to the Senator from New York?

Mr. JAMES. I yield to the Senator from New York.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I suggest to the Senator from Kentucky that the amendment which he proposes to offer had better be offered as a separate amendment, because some of us, I am quite sure, would be willing to vote for his amendment who would not be willing to vote for the other amendment.

Mr. JAMES. Then, I will withhold the amendment for the present.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the adoption of the amendment proposed by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] as modified.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I do not feel inclined to support the amendment offered by the Senator from Missouri; and inasmuch as my interest in the enlisted man is, I think, as great as that of any other Senator, I must state very briefly why I can not support it. I do not believe that it is the way in which to promote the interest of the enlisted men. If I could change the bill to suit my view of the matter, I would decrease rather than increase the number of cadets at West Point. I would do it in order to give a better opportunity for promotion from the ranks to the class of officers in the Regular Army. There are but few enlisted men who could take advantage of the opportunity to enter West Point, but there are a great many enlisted men who, through study and experience, are competent to command; and, I think, there ought to be by far a larger proportion of the officers of the Regular Army taken by promotion from the ranks than we now find.

When we come to consider the bill providing for the reorganization of the Army, I intend to do what I can do to make it easier for the enlisted man to receive an examination and a commission for command in the Regular Army.

Mr. REED rose.

Mr. CUMMINS. Just a moment. As the law now is, the graduates from West Point have the first right; and it so happens, through the influence of men high in office in the country, that many civilians are taken for examination and for commission as second lieutenants, and comparatively few enlisted men are so examined and so promoted.

I believe that as good an officer as can be found will often be discovered in the ranks of the enlisted men; and if we enlarge, as we propose to do—I do not intend to object to it as it was originally brought in—but if we keep on enlarging the number of men who are graduated from year to year at West Point, we will make it substantially impossible for enlisted men to be promoted from the ranks to commissioned officers.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield to the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. REED. The Senator from Iowa wants to give the enlisted man a chance to become an officer. There is a way provided now by which he can pass an examination, and thus get a commission. This bill proposes, in addition to that right, to allow one man to have the privilege of going through West Point. It does not take away the enlisted man's opportunities, but it affords him two roads, instead of one. My amendment is to offer that opportunity to five men, instead of to one man for each thousand, or substantially for each thousand. Now, how can the Senator from Iowa say that that is taking away the opportunity from the enlisted man, when it is simply giving him an additional opportunity?

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I know very well that the Senator from Missouri has nothing but the good of the enlisted man, as well as the good of the country, at heart; but it must be obvious to him that when he is opening one door he is at the same time closing the other. As I said a moment ago, the men who are commissioned as second lieutenants when they graduate from the academy at West Point have the first right to command in the Regular Army. I believe that is right, for, other things being equal, the chances are they are more competent. But it must be apparent that if we graduate from West Point a number of officers sufficient to supply all the places for command there will be no opportunity whatever for the enlisted men to be promoted through the ranks of noncommissioned officers and finally to reach the rank of commissioned officers.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield.

Mr. REED. The Senator says that the West Pointer gets the preference, and thus crowds out the enlisted man. Now, I am offering to allow the enlisted man to get that preference by allowing him to go to West Point. The Senator certainly does not think that it is a detriment to the enlisted man if we shall give him the opportunity to go through West Point, for the Senator says West Point makes a superior man of him as a military man.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I recognize that it gives five men in a regiment the opportunity to be examined for appointment to West Point, limited by the provision offered by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK]; but the Senator from Missouri must recognize the difference between promotion for excellence as a soldier, as well as reasonable competency in the technical knowledge of military affairs, and the requirements for entrance to West Point. A man must be right from school, with all his learning at hand, in order to be admitted to West Point. I have the gravest doubt whether half of the officers who are now enjoying the rank of captain could undergo the examination that would admit them to West Point, simply because they in their practical affairs have forgotten the things that one must know in order to be admitted to the school.

I remember very well when I was governor of Iowa, a committee appointed to examine certain applicants for the bar came into my office. It happened that the committee showed me the list of questions which they were about to propound to the young men who were ambitious to be admitted to the bar. I looked the list over, and I recall very well what I said to the members of the committee. It was: "It is very fortunate for you that you are already at the bar, because there is not one of you who could successfully pass the examination that you are now about to impose on these young men." Just so it is with all men when they pass the period of preparation and training and enter the actual affairs of life.

I think that the enlisted men ought to furnish a greater number of the officers of the Regular Army. We can not bring about any such reform or change as that immediately, but that ought to be the ultimate purpose of Congress in endeavoring to enlarge or reorganize our Regular Army. The mere fact that five men or boys from each regiment will have an opportunity to be named by the President as candidates for West Point will not furnish the motive which I think ought to be given to all the enlisted men; and because I believe there ought to be a readjustment of the rights of the enlisted men in that particular, so that they can rise from the ranks, not because they are great scholars, but because they are good soldiers, I am not willing to further close the door of opportunity by enlarging the number of graduates from West Point.

May I say again there seems to be a feeling that the school at West Point should be regarded as a general training institution for civil life. I do not think so, and I intend to offer an amendment to this bill before it shall have passed the Senate which will prevent resignations, save for two reasons. When an officer is educated at the expense of the Government, having dedicated in a sense his life to the service of his country, and when the Government undertakes to compensate him throughout his entire life for that service, he ought not to abandon the service because civil life is more alluring or more profitable. There are schools in which men can be educated for the industrial affairs of the country. He ought to be permitted to resign, if once he has received his commission, only for one of two reasons: First, that he has become mentally or physically incapacitated to discharge the duties of an officer of his rank, and, second, that there are more officers in his rank than are required for the service of the Army.

I want, by proper and fair limitation upon the number of cadets at West Point, to give the utmost opportunity for the recognition of good service in the ranks, the utmost opportunity for that reward which comes after good service, namely, promotion to a higher place in the Army.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the adoption of the amendment proposed by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] as modified.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Washington.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, I am convinced that I was right awhile ago when I said that I thought this bill would not be disposed of to-day, or at least not until the greater part of the afternoon had passed, and I think that I shall now claim the floor.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me to ask the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs a question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Alabama?

Mr. JONES. I yield to the Senator for the purpose of asking a question.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President, I should like to have the attention of the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs for a moment. I confess I do not quite understand this question and I do not quite understand the provisions of this bill and what their effect is to be. I want to ask the chairman if it is not true that a man must be 21 years of age before he can enlist in the Army, unless he has the written consent of his parents?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. That is correct, I will say to the Senator.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Then, I want to inquire if 22 is not the age limit for admission to West Point?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Yes, sir.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Now, the question I want to ask the chairman of the committee is this: If a man must be 21 years old before he can enlist, if he can not go to West Point after he is 22 and must serve in the Army a year before he can go to West Point, how many enlisted men does the Senator think would get to West Point under the provisions of this bill?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President——

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, I did not yield for a discussion of the matter; I merely yielded for a question.

Mr. REED. I suggest to the Senator from Washington that he let the Senator from Oregon clear that matter up.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Oregon?

Mr. JONES. Yes.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I will answer in just a word. Most of the enlisted men in the Army now are under the age of 22. They have gone into the Army with the consent of their parents. It is the purpose of this bill to admit to the Military Academy that class of young men who have been willing to go into the Army under 21 years of age with the consent of their parents.

PROHIBITION IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, I would not do anything to delay the pending bill, but I feel satisfied that, after this amendment is disposed of, if it ever is disposed of, there will be other amendments presented which will create discussion, and so I think I shall proceed with what I wanted to say about a matter which is of very much interest to the people of the District of Columbia, and concerning which meetings are being held almost every night. Were it not for this situation, I would not take the time of the Senate to discuss it; and I will say to Senators who are here that I shall probably occupy about an hour, possibly longer, and after that they may come back and we can pass the pending bill.

Mr. President, Congress is now confronted with the question of prohibition for the District of Columbia. In my judgment, this would not have been presented so seriously except for the influence of the liquor traffic in practically nullifying the Jones-Works excise law passed a couple of years ago for the better regulation of this traffic in the District.

The law was a model regulatory measure, and if properly administered would have been abreast of the general public sentiment in the District. It provided for an excise board to be appointed by the President in the hope that, realizing the great moral interest over which such a board would exercise control, he would select men who would enforce the plain provisions of the law and wisely and justly use the discretion vested in them to conserve the public welfare from the baneful effects of a traffic from which no good comes to anyone.

It was hoped that political influences would not control in the selection of these men, and that special consideration would be given to their selection, with the sole purpose that the law should be fairly and impartially enforced.

MALADMINISTRATION OF JONES-WORKS LAW.

Three men have been appointed, who so maladministered the law as to lead to an investigation last Congress by a special committee of the Senate, which made a unanimous report on the part of those Members who took part in the investigation. The committee found nothing to commend in the administration of the law by the excise board, but it did find that the law had been nullified in its plain provisions in the interest of the saloons, and that in the exercise of its discretion the board had always favored the saloons and had resolved every doubtful question in their favor.

It found that the plain provisions of the law prohibiting the issuance of a license to a hotel with less than 50 bedrooms had been evaded and violated by the granting of hotel licenses under the name of restaurants; that the plain provision of the law prohibiting a license for a barroom on any side of a street with less than 50 per cent of its frontage used for business purposes other than saloons had been violated, and that the board, in order to favor the granting of saloon licenses, provided in its rules that this positive restriction in the law should not apply to hotels and clubs; that the board by the adoption of a rule unauthorized by the law had permitted minors to enter stores where intoxicating liquors are sold contrary to the positive provisions of the law; that while the law requires every barroom to be closed between the hours of 1 o'clock a. m. and 7 o'clock a. m. and on Sundays, the board by rule permits the saloons to be opened from 6.45 a. m. and on Sunday between the hours of 10 a. m. and 12 noon under the excuse of cleaning up; that the board by rule authorized receivers, trustees, and other representatives of licensees to conduct the business of the licensee for a period of 60 days from his death without any authority of law for so doing; that while the law placed the maximum number of barroom licenses at 300, the board had not exercised its discretion for a smaller number, but that the testimony showed it to be the opinion of the board that it should keep the number at 300; that while the law expressly prohibits the establishment of more than one bar under a license, the board had permitted the violation of this provision in at least two instances; that while the law provides that no more than one entrance should be permitted from the street to a barroom unless the board shall specially permit an extra entrance, out of 39 applications for extra entrances 38 were granted; that while the law expressly provides that no license shall be granted west of the western line of the fire limits "as now established," meaning at the time of the passage of the act, the board licensed two saloons which were beyond the line when the law passed but which were included by a subsequent change of the line made before the law took effect, and evidently for the express purpose of defeating the law, which facts and conditions were brought to the attention of the board before it granted the licenses.

I might add here, Mr. President, that this matter finally reached the courts, and the court of appeals have affirmed the decision of the lower court holding that the granting of these licenses was illegal. The committee found further that, while the law expressly provides that no more than three saloons shall be permitted on one side of a block, the board has permitted four saloons on one side of one of the principal business blocks of the city; that while the law prohibits the location of a barroom within 300 feet of an alleyway occupied for residences except upon unanimous vote of all three members of the board, the board granted licenses in practically every instance where applied for within 300 feet of these places, and in some instances permitted three or more barrooms to be located within 300 feet of an alley; that while the law prohibits the location of a place where liquor is sold at retail or wholesale within 400 feet of a schoolhouse or a house of religious worship, measured between the nearest entrances by the shortest course of travel, the board has adopted a system of measurement by the longest usual course of travel, so that in many cases where the shortest course of travel which pedestrians would naturally and conveniently take would prevent the granting of licenses, the board has resorted to square-corner measurement so as to permit the saloons to operate, but worse than all that, the committee found that the board had permitted plain attempts to evade the law by the construction of parkings and other obstructions for the evident purpose of making the distance greater than 400 feet; that wherever a building is not used exclusively for religious purposes, the board held that it is not a place of religious worship or school within the meaning of the law, as in several instances the board granted licenses within 400 feet of a building where large schools are conducted and large congregations carry on religious worship; that while the law prohibited the granting of a license to a hotel the character of which or the character of the proprietor of which is shown to be objectionable to the board, the board granted a license to the proprietor of the Grand Hotel, notwithstanding he had been convicted of selling liquor to a minor girl and that his license had formerly been canceled, and that he had organized a corporation which he controlled, in whose name he was applying for a license, and that a strong report was made against him by the police, and that other hotels which had been conducted in a disreputable manner were granted licenses; that the board had refused licenses to properly conducted barrooms and had granted licenses to disreputable places in the same neighborhood over strong protests; that while the law provides for the transfer of licenses of deceased licensees by their personal representatives, the board permitted the widow of a licensee to operate a barroom long after her husband's death, although the corporation counsel had given it as his opinion that the bar was being operated contrary to law, and that the board did not stop such violation until pressure was brought to bear upon them through one of the District Commissioners; that the provision of the law requiring the interior of a barroom when selling is prohibited to be exposed to full view from the street is almost wholly disregarded; that plain violations of the provision of the law requiring 50 per cent of the frontage of a block to be used for business purposes before a license can be granted have been permitted by allowing saloon entrances to be changed from one side of a square to another without any change in the saloon itself, and in some cases by a mere change in the number without changing even the entrance, and that in some cases, where it is plainly apparent that buildings of a very unsubstantial character were constructed for the sole purpose of making business frontage in order to secure saloon license, the board has approved such action by granting the license; that in the case of the Hotel Thyson, which is located just across P Street from the Polk School, while it was apparent that additional rooms were constructed in an attempt to technically comply with the law, the board, notwithstanding such plain purpose to evade the law and notwithstanding the fact that it was just across the street from a public school, granted the license; and that the board in the exercise of its discretion granted licenses to at least four saloons within from 403 to 436 feet of the Polk School and the McKinley Manual Training School, attended by hundreds of boys and girls of the city. That in practically every case where the board issued a license under circumstances that constituted a violation or evasion of the true purpose and spirit of the law, all phases of the situation were brought to its attention before the issuance of the licenses, and the special Senate investigating committee closed its report with this language:

The committee believes, however, that a careful and dispassionate review of the evidence before us as to the conduct of the board in the administration of the excise law shows that it has disregarded the underlying purpose of the law, that it has nullified its most beneficial features, and that it has encouraged and approved plain evasions and perversions of the law. It is the judgment of the committee that the board has resolved practically every doubt as to law or fact in the interest of saloons. It has shown no proper comprehension of its duties in the execution of a law framed in the interest of morality and good government. The policy of the board in fostering the liquor traffic to the fullest extent permitted by the law, and in many instances at the expense of both its spirit and its letter, is fraught with increasing danger to the health, peace, and morals of the people of the District of Columbia.

Notwithstanding this report, the President of the United States reappointed Mr. Robert G. Smith president of the board when his term expired. There is nothing in any of the hearings showing that Mr. Smith ever opposed any action taken by the board, and he himself states that he never opposed the granting of any license which was granted. His nomination has been reported adversely to the Senate, and the people of the country will watch with much interest to see whether or not the Senate of the United States will approve the reappointment of a man who has so signally failed to respect the law and safeguard the welfare of the people. The issue involved is a higher one than that of prohibition itself. The real issue is whether laws passed by Congress shall be executed or not.

If the liquor traffic had been willing to accept a fair and reasonable interpretation and enforcement of the excise law, they might not now be confronted with a serious attempt to secure prohibition for the District of Columbia. They were not. By methods known only to them they have shown friends of regulation that regulation is a failure and that prohibition is the only way to deal with a traffic which evades, nullifies, and defies the law, and for which no one has a good word.

The Senator from Texas [Mr. SHEPPARD] early in this session introduced a prohibition measure for the District. It has been reported to the Senate without recommendation. It is no secret that the committee was equally divided upon the general issue of prohibition and so the question has been submitted to the Senate for its decision.

LIQUOR FORCES NOT MEETING ISSUE SQUARELY.

What is now proposed? Is it proposed to meet the issue squarely? No. The liquor interests will never meet an issue squarely unless they think they can win. They doubt their ability to defeat prohibition in the Senate, and so they seek to divide their enemies. They hope to avail themselves of the votes of those who, if forced to vote squarely upon the issue, would be against them. They submit another proposition. What is it? A referendum to the people of the District of Columbia. Since when have the liquor interests favored the referendum? The real enemies of prohibition are not in favor of the referendum as a general principle. They are for it in the District of Columbia now simply because they think they have a better chance to win that way than in any other way. They never have been, they never are, and they never will be in favor of the referendum, except when they think they will be the gainers by it. I do not blame them. That is natural. They are selfish, like the rest of us. They are looking after their own interests; but it should cause every friend of prohibition to hesitate before joining forces with them simply because the principle of a referendum is involved. Every opponent of prohibition is now for a referendum in the District of Columbia. Possibly some friends of prohibition may now be for a referendum, and it is because they hope to avail themselves of this aid that the liquor interests are for it. A referendum in the District of Columbia is especially favorable to the liquor interest. There is a large class which is most susceptible to the influence and methods of the traffic and those who look after its interest. The great mass of people here has had but little, if any, experience in voting. There is no machinery in the District of Columbia for such an election. There are no safeguards against fraud, intimidation, and corruption, and there are forty or fifty thousand of the best citizens of the District who, if they voted at such a referendum election, will run the risk of disfranchising themselves at their legal residence in the States from which they came. It is no wonder that the interest, which is fighting with its back to the wall, should welcome any method that may bring delay and possibly salvation for it.

The friends of the referendum principle should consider thoughtfully whether they want the principle used under such unfavorable conditions, as well as for such a purpose.

The elections laws of to-day are an evolution based upon the experience of years. Many explicit and stringent provisions have been found necessary to prevent fraud upon the part of the voters and by election officials. Severe penalties have been provided against fraud and corruption, and the strongest safeguards made to secure secrecy of the ballot and to protect the voter in the exercise of his franchise privilege. Practically no discretion has been left to election officials and their course has been mapped out in great detail. This has been found to be necessary in the conduct of ordinary elections, and how much more so is this necessary in an election of this character? The issue is of such tremendous import in every respect that every possible safeguard against fraud and corruption should be specifically provided for in any law calling for an expression of opinion by the citizens of any political unit.

In behalf of the continuation of this traffic will be marshaled all that is vicious, vile, corrupt, and intimidating, together with some that is honest, moral, and respectable. Coercion will be practiced through great and powerful influences. Past masters of trickery, bribery, and corruption from every quarter of the United States will marshal themselves about the National Capital like vultures about a dead carcass. Such a corruption fund will be used here as the wildest cupidity never dreamed of, and the National Capital will be made a stench to all decent people. Everybody knows that this but fairly expresses what will actually take place upon a referendum of this issue in the District of Columbia.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator if an amendment proposing this referendum has been introduced?

Mr. JONES. Yes. I will come to that in just a moment.

Mr. KENYON. Does it cover the equal-suffrage proposition?

Mr. JONES. No; it provides for a very unequal suffrage.

In the States, with all the up-to-date safeguards thrown around these referendum elections on the liquor question, and with a standard of integrity in their citizenship which will average that in the District, corruption and bribery have been in evidence, and it has been charged that the public will has been defeated by the corrupt use of money.

CORRUPTION IN ELECTIONS.

In the Texas election, involving this question, vast sums of money were used. More than a year after the election, when the attorney general seized the books and files of one brewery, it disclosed the fact that fabulous sums of money were spent in the election. In the letter files were found letters signed by Adolphus Busch, of St. Louis, showing still further the vast sums of money used in these contests. Here are two illuminating excerpts from them:

It may cost us millions and even more, but what of it if thereby we elevate our position?

I will not mind to give one hundred thousand extra if necessary.

I mean to say by the above that everyone interested in the business should be willing to sacrifice all and everything he possesses to save our business from being ruined by a fanatical part of the people. Besides losing our business by State-wide prohibition, we would lose our honor and standing of ourselves and families, and rather than lose that we should risk the majority of our fortunes.

With all sincerity, your friend,

ADOLPHUS BUSCH.

At Terre Haute, Ind., the corrupt use of money in elections involving the liquor traffic and officers who deal with the liquor traffic is a matter of common knowledge throughout the Nation.

Sixteen guilty parties have been sent to jail or the penitentiary, and the mayor of the city has four years more of sentence before the expiration of his time.

The investigation now on at Pittsburgh, according to newspaper reports, shows a system of collecting funds for controlling elections in that one State that runs into the millions. The secretary of the United States Brewers' Association, Mr. Hugh P. Fox, when called upon to testify concerning these assessments or contributions, refused to do so, and was committed to jail therefor.

As a sample of what may be expected at the election, the liquor interests, I am reliably informed, are applying here methods of intimidation and threatened boycott.

They have for weeks been circulating petitions favoring a referendum on prohibition for the District and opposing prohibition by direct action of Congress. They have been urged upon the business men of the city, and in many instances it was sought to coerce men who favor prohibition and who see in the referendum agitation a means of delay, into signing the petition. Threats of the boycott were uttered and in some instances applied. Can it be imagined that this attempt at coercion was in the interest of suffrage for the District? No; rather it was the pursuit of a policy, long since adopted by the liquor crowd everywhere, to frighten and intimidate those who can not be reached by other means. This policy is well understood, and its application in the District of Columbia causes no surprise.

Here as elsewhere all men can not be intimidated. There are among the business men of this city many strong men who will not bend to the will of the proliquor power.

A prominent insurance agent, who is in favor of prohibition for the District, but who is opposed to submitting the question to a referendum under the circumstances, has been approached by holders of policies in his company with the threat that unless he line up with the "wets" by signing in favor of a referendum, business would be taken away from his company. This business man was not frightened and refused the demands and defied the threats. But no policy has as yet been canceled.

A prominent real estate company was approached by a saloon keeper for the signature of the president to a referendum petition. The signature was refused. The company was collecting some rents for the saloon keeper, who remarked upon leaving that he would have to give his business to some friend of the liquor business.
